The Lounger hopes that Miss Margaret Marigold will not do Indian squaws the injustice of comparing them with the women of ball-rooms who paint. A squaw paints palpably, and means that it shall be known. The painted woman of the ball-room paints palpably, indeed, but means that it is not perceived. Sometimes she believes it is not. Poor painted woman!

LABORS OF LOVE.

When a clergyman fills the pulpit of a brother clergyman for nothing, it is called a labor of love. Labors-of-love, as a descriptive term applied to sermons, is not complimentary. When kind friends volunteer to do any kind of work for others, it is, perhaps, a good general rule to take note of the kindness and excuse the service. And yet the various professions are subject to these offers in different degrees. Mr. Evarts or Mr. O'Conor are probably not deluged with gratuitous friendly advice in the management of their cases. The Presidents of Banks and Insurance Companies are often free from the importunities of advertising the fate of offered notes and the rate of policies. Carpenters and masons and housenailers, also, have but few labors of love. The Lounger thinks that's quite another matter.

It is a fond fallacy prevalent among the subscribers to any periodical publication, that they individually understand what should be the management of that publication. They have not elected by reason of peculiar qualifications for the position. It is another fond fallacy that a stated contributor to such a periodical knows what the editor. The Lounger, for instance, constantly receives letters and suggestions which are meant for the editor, but which, falling into the Lounger's hands, fill his heart with sympathy for his well-abused and much-plagued friend.

"Heavens!" the Lounger says to himself, knowing the incessant labor of the editor, "if will this not be the last straw that breaks the camel's back!"

No: decidedly no. And why? Because of the immense recuperative power of the editor? Because of the quality of his mind? Because? No, again; but because nature has provided an exquisite process of mutual balance on the correspondence function. The editor has a pile aside in a drawer the letters of advice which he receives during a single week. Open the drawer on Saturday; turn those papers; open them, and the result is a neutralization.

This is Saturday, let us say. Now we open the drawer.

SIMPKINS. "Thank you for finishing up the series you've been giving. Give short stories: that's what people want."

ANTI-STROPHE. "I have begun Lever's novel, and it is capital; but we all miss Dickens's new one. Long continued stories continue the interest of the paper from week to week."

Again:

ACID. "Your illustration of Master Olof contains a mistake. It is not the Polish costume at all, and other must have got a wrong horse, for surely the clumsy cart-hose in your illustration can not have been meant for the sleek, swift, eight-legged Sleipner."

ALKALI. "How poetic that picture of Olaf is! It is so thin, so watery, so weak! Give us plenty of that kind, please."

Once more:

OUR AUNT. "Dear Sir,—I don't want to interfere, but you make a great mistake in printing those large two-page pictures. Nobody wants 'em."

ANOTHER MAN. "We are all waiting for another of those delightful descriptions of the Central Park. We feel when we get those that we have got our five cents' worth, full measure."

Then there are the signs of praise:

"Please reprint some article upon Queen Boadicea."

"Aerial navigation is a capital subject for a series of articles with illustrations."

"What has become of the Penn-pin column?"

"Please to print a monthly fashion plate."

"Did you think of that horse-criticism by yourself, or did you get your cue (cue?) from some sight-seeing English cockney?"

Of course no objection is made to these hints. Every contributor is grateful to advice his representative. The sole object of this reference is to apprise Scribe and Anti-Scribe, Acid and Alkali, One Man and Another Man, that their kind letters and suggestions are received, and that, having heard all the evidence, the Mr. Weekly will continue to be edited in the way which seems to be best for all.

"WOMAN'S SPHERE."

In the great debate upon Women's Rights, certain points have been definitively settled. It is considered that Mrs. Bloomer has proved that she can if they know how. The use of the tongue, however, except in private colloquy, is forbidden, unless indeed it be employed in singing or the drama. It is decided, since Jenny Lind, and Sontag, and Ellen Tree, and Charlotte Cushman, that a woman may properly sing or recite upon the stage of the Academy, on Monday evening, for instance; but it is equally settled that she is out of her sphere if she speaks upon the stump on Tuesday evening. The reason of this discrimination is clear to the smallest minds. On Monday she sings or recites the music and the poetry of men (generally). On Tuesday she assumes to speak her own thoughts. Thoughts? A woman's thoughts? I beg your pardon.

But she may read in private, and no one can quarrel, and "woman's sphere" doesn't suffer in the least. And that she may read and in private, a Library has been provided and rooms taken in the New York University building, all under the charge of Miss Powell; and eloquent men have made speeches, and generous publishers have given books, so that the five thousand already selected have cost only about a thousand dollars.

So we are informed by, who are skimming these lines, are secretly thinking, "Pooh! women had a great deal rather go to libraries where they are sure to meet the beaux in a social being, especially woman." Undoubtedly, and it only shows the extreme perversity of facts that they insist upon differing from your view. Man is undoubtedly the most gallant of animals. He has always made the laws for society, and how favorable they have always been to the sex, which he tosses with such delightful enthusiasm, we all know. Gallant man opens every avenue to women to make money, and sedulously secures to them all the wages they receive, and above all, carefully consults her when he is going to make his unvarying their welfare.

The perverse fact is, that women who really wish to read prefer to be by themselves, because they know that wherever they are there there is a free mingling of the sexes there is less reading than talk. Man is undoubtedly right to be alone, let them be so, and a kind Providence grant that "woman's sphere" may remain intact while they are so. It is surprising how few men have to be in it, preserving "woman's sphere." It must be a very frail affair after all. It is constantly in danger. But happily it does not materially affect in a woman's history. Nobody has hinted that it is in peril there. And therefore, when the pleasant room in the University overlooking the pretty Washington Square is opened for the use of women who wish to read, the Lounger sincerely hopes that nothing frightful will happen, and that "woman's sphere" will continue to be as lovely as gallant man has always declared it to be.

A WORD ON POLITENESS.

THAT a soft word turneth away wrath is no truer than that a willful solecism" have very few soft words for any body. A man who sells tickets at a railroad office, for instance, or who deals with crowds of people, and who are always at work, using the same questions, must be very much annoyed. It must, undoubtedly, be hard for him to keep his temper and be at all times civil, only men who can keep their tempers and be civil under extreme importunity have a right to accept such places.

The Lounger constantly receives notes of complaint, and his experience enables him to know that they are written under without reason. If, requires some courage to ask any of the employés of a railroad or steamboat company for a favor, "A Britisher" writes to the Lounger:

"During the past week I have traveled in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Maryland, and while I found some attendants very obliging, I found a majority of the persons employed upon the railroads stern in manner, and as to their politeness they are not at all to be taken asking charity . . . Really if our unobtrusive servants seemed to be more unexceptionally, royalty in Canada would not be so popular."

However, impoliteness is not confined to the officers of railroads, and steamboats to travelers, and even to the sex! For instance:

"I noticed in your columns a letter headed 'In the Cars,' and as that was my train, and your comments thereon, I am tempted to send you the following account of an actual occurrence. Eating-house, the other evening, in one of the Hudson River railway cars, your much fatigued lady babe and best of the day, every seat in the car filled, and the passengers both inside and on the platform; the bell rings, and the car stops; in stepped my rather crippled two females, one with a baby in her arms; up got the gentlemen next to me, and gave her his seat; at the same time I also rose to give my seat to the other one, when she turned to a man who, in a desperate, hard gallop in with her coal had not been observed by me), and actually placed him in the seat I had vacated for her. She stood a moment, when a gentleman on the opposite side of the car, my remaining one seated (who, I am satisfied, had not noticed her predecessor), rose from his seat, which she took, of course, accepted, but said nothing; consequently I had to ride standing. BALTIMORE."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE REASON WHY.

SAID Bill to Ben, "Pray lend to me five pounds; or, what is better,

Just make it ten, and I will be eternally your debtor."

"I know you well," said Ben to Bill, "and it's funny—

Just for that reason you can't have the money."

A gentleman one Sunday morning was led to watch a country girl, on her way to the village church, pass the church, by observing that she looked hither and thither, this way and that, from the road, as if she had lost a cow, a bauble or some other valuable. The bells were ringing for prayers, and the gentleman, who was himself on his way to kept the gift and the gentleman, who recognized in her the unmistakable signs of wandering fancy.

"What are you looking for, my girl?" asked the gentleman, as he came up with her, "and don't you hear the church bell? She answered gravely,

"Sir, I am looking to see if my master be gone to church." Her master had a wooden leg.

A competitive examination was lately held for the purpose of appointing fit persons to some of the Government offices in England. One of the candidates inadvertently spelled the word Venice with two n's—thus: Vennice. The examiner, a clever man, but not always a correct speller, remarked to him:

"Do you not know, Sir, that there is but one Ass in Venice?"

"Then eggs must be very scarce there," was the ready reply.

The candidate passed.

THE SUICIDE.

Timothens Jeems Augustus Brown
Took cold took his head.
And sneezed from morn till night, until
He wished that he was dead.

"If I take any sentibus life," said he,
And took his razor down;
He knew he changed his mind, and thought
'Twould easier be to drown.

He walked unto the water's edge,
Long sneezing as he went;
But staid to say his prayers, until
His cold was all spent.

And then he thought of other plans
To cut his throat of life;
And wondered which was painful was,
The halter or the knife.

At length, in sheer despair, he strolled
To where the cars rush,
And, sneezing his apologies,
Before her face he knew.

He told her he was tired of life,
And knew not what to do;
If she would not consent to be
His sneezy-loved-a-maid.

She did consent, though modestly,
And soon became his bride;
Yet still he sneezed when he will end
His life by Sneez's side!

A fellow lately contracted in writing with a woodman for a cord of wood at "11p the week." The man began to deliver it; but it was as full of limbs that the purchaser demurred, saying that it was not good. The woodman replied, "It was just what I agreed to deliver, 11p the week, and I believe this grew on that part of the tree."

A young lady being addressed by a gentleman much her senior, and being averse to the match, the only objection she had to a union with him was the probability of her being left a widow, and thus subject to the sorrows of widowhood. To which he made the apt and delectable reply—"Consider, my dear, that the chances are both a thousand-wife, for the number of his days shall be threescore and ten."

A man meeting an acquaintance, accosted him thus: "Ah, Mike, you're getting quite thick! you've been speaking to? Your old friend Patrick; and faith, he knows every thing that's going on. You're a rogue, you are thin, and I am thin, but he is thinner than both of us put together."

A lady, paying a visit to her daughter, who was a young widow, said to her that she must be wishing much to see

"Dear mamma, don't you see," replied the daughter, "it is never me the expense of advertising for a husband; for every one can see that I am for sale by private contract."

The following is a speech by a successful competitor for the prize at a foot-race: "Gentlemen, I have won this cup by the use of my legs; I hope I may never lose the use of my legs by the use of this cup."

"I'm sorry, Mr. Wilson, to see this splendid field of potatoes so much destroyed," was the sympathizing inspector.

"Ah, well, it's a great pity," replied the farmer, "but there's an comfort—Jock Tamson's is not a bit better."

A DOUBTFUL COMPLIMENT.—An action was brought in the House of Commons a few years ago, to recover the value of two casks of herrings, sworn to be stolen, and the Judge asked the witness if the casks delivered, the plaintiff said he had lost sight of the casks for a short time, and, as he was a fish salesman, he could not vouch for the settlement. He repeatedly asked defendant for the casks, and the latter at length said he'd be up to the devil," upon which, he said, "I thought it was high time to cease my inquiries." The remark was received with roars of laughter, in which the learned Judge joined.

A traveler, passing through Weston, near Bridgewater, seeing a sign over the door with this one word, "Agoograph," was called to the window to know what she sold, when she said she did not sell any thing, but that "Agoo was cured here."

An eccentric wealthy gentleman stuck up a board in a field upon his estate, upon which was painted the following: "I will give this field to any man who is contented." He soon had an applicant.

"Well, Sir, are you a contented man?"

"Yes, Sir, very."

"Then what do you want with my field?"

The applicant did not stop to reply.

Mr. Theophilus Pepys, of Poppville, in Popp County, forgetting himself on the occasion of the Popp County fair, "popped the question" to no under the poplar tree, when he entered into a bet per puppy, who, were elected for his consent, inducing under the influence of ginger pop, signed him out of the stocks to the tune of "Pop goes the weasel."

A story is told of Sully, the painter, a man distinguished for eccentricity, which is well at remember in art. At a party one evening Sully was speaking of a certain lady, who was a great favorite of his.

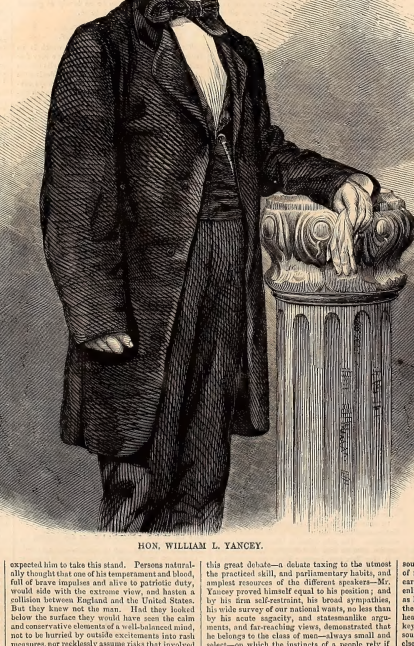
"Ah!" says Sully, "she has a mouth like an elephant."

"Oh! oh! Mr. Sully, how could you be so rude?"

"Rude, ladies, rude! Why! do you mean? I say she has got a mouth like an elephant because it's full of pearls."

Some years ago a man whose marriage had been published in a paper with his name wrongly spelled, called to have it corrected. He said he was one of the most unfortunate men in the world, as a newspaper but twice in the course of their lives—the one time they are married, and the other their death. As he could not see to having the same given correctly on the last occasion, he was very anxious it should be right on the first.

Hon. WILLIAM L. YANCEY.



We publish below a portrait of Hon. William L. Yancey, and subjoin the following sketch, which has been prepared for us by one of Mr. Yancey's intimate friends:

William Lowndes Yancey was born at Ogeechee Shoals, Georgia, August 10, 1814. His grandfather, Colonel Bird, resided here. The home of the family was in Abbeville, South Carolina, where for many years his father, B. C. Yancey, Esq., practiced law, and maintained a reputation for legal ability which, in that profession, is never won without signal merits. A man of lofty patriotism and courage, the elder Yancey warmly advocated the war of 1812, sustaining his friend, the late distinguished Calhoun, in those measures which created a public sentiment against foreign encroachment, and organized the country into an attitude of reliance on its own arm for security and protection.

Born in an exciting period of our history, the son passed his opening years in the midst of scenes calculated to quicken fancy and arouse ambition. A genial, generous mind drawn much of its vitalizing force from surrounding objects, and hence the youthful fancy, eager to hear the conversations of statesmen, and yet more susceptible to the stories of national renown, received that bias which has largely determined the course of his outward life. One can easily imagine how these circumstances affected him. Heroes of the Revolution still survived, and the spirit of our heroic age survived in them. Then, too, the lists war had awakened an enthusiasm which was already shaping American thought toward a broader and grander progress. A sense of our vast resources had suddenly flashed upon us; men's hearts were strangely stirred; and our activity and enterprise, looking westwardly to the Valley of the Mississippi, or eastwardly over the ocean, could see on each side a great field for the triumphs of trade and commerce. Our country had been liberated from those restraints that had imprisoned its thought no less than its energy, and, buoyant with the fresh consciousness of life, sure of itself and sure of its future, it now stood on the threshold of those wonders which have marked for forty years its advancing career. Such influences were precisely those to stir the heart of young Yancey, and to quicken him to high thoughts and noble purposes. The germ of chivalry then began to expand, and from living statesmen and heroes he learned those principles of which he has since been the steady champion.

The elder Yancey died in 1817, leaving to the care of his widow two children—William L. and a younger brother, B. C. Yancey, a gentleman of distinguished abilities, late United States Minister to the Argentine Confederation, South America. The noble-hearted mother, full of womanly spirit, devoted herself to the nurture of her boys, and few mothers have ever shown such strength of will, truth of purpose, and untiring zeal in duty. The religious feelings of her children were early cultivated, and, taught by her ministry, she had to fear God and reverence goodness. But the time had now come for the elder son to extend his education, and for this purpose he was sent to the North. Here he had the advantages of a rigid scholastic training in union with those deeper and subtler influences that mould taste and sentiment. Here, too, we may especially note, he was under the judicious control of Dr. Griffin, whose mind and character left an ineffaceable imprint upon him.

Returning to the South, Mr. Yancey read law in the office of Judge Storrs, Esq., Sparta, Georgia, and subsequently continued his legal education under B. F. Perry, Esq., Greenville, South Carolina. His studies completed, he married a most estimable lady, Miss Sarah Caroline, third daughter of G. W. Earle, Esq., Greenville, South Carolina. In 1837 he removed to Cahaba, Alabama, and devoted a portion of his time to the editorship of the Cahaba Democrat. In 1840 he settled at Wetumpka, Alabama, and, in connection with his brother, edited the Argus newspaper. After serving in the Legislature of Alabama, he entered the Congress of the United States to fill the vacancy occasioned by the transfer of the Hon. Dixon H. Lewis from the House of Representatives to the Senate, and in 1845 was re-elected without opposition. Although a young man, Mr. Yancey's talents attracted the attention of our ablest men. His speeches on the Texas and Oregon questions elicited great commendation. Judge Rugby pronounced Mr. Yancey's speech on the annexation of Texas "the ablest effort he had ever heard on the floor of Congress;" and the Richmond Enquirer, then edited by the elder Ritchie, stated: "It is one of the ablest and most eloquent speeches we have seen upon this or upon any other subject." On the Oregon question he spoke with marked ability. But the most striking feature of this speech was its conservative spirit. Taking ground against the notice to Great Britain as a war measure, he lifted up a manly voice against the clamors of those who activated an appeal to arms. Few conventions, the political parliaments of the land, or directly in contact with his countrymen—he has not failed to show those traits of character which, while they give an air of distinctness to his individuality, yet vindicate his claims on your respect, and assure you of the chivalric spirit and trustworthiness of his manhood. Opposed to the nomination of General Cass for the Presidency by the Democratic Convention of 1848, he had the satisfaction in 1856 of seeing the principle for which he had contended in 1848 at Baltimore adopted in the Cincinnati Platform, and was thus able, in consistency with his Democratic status, to co-operate zealously with his party in Mr. Buchanan's election. In the memorable struggle this year in the Charleston Convention he represented the views of those who demand the recognition of the principle of Congressional protection for slave property in the Territories. The result of this struggle is well known. But we may remark that throughout this great debate—a debate taxing to the utmost the practiced skill, and parliamentary habits, and amplest resources of the different speakers—Mr. Yancey proved himself equal to his position; and by his firm self-restraint, his broad sympathies, his wide survey of our national wants, no less than by his acute sagacity, and statesmanlike arguments, and far-reaching views, demonstrated that he belongs to the class of men—always small and select—on which the instincts of a people rely if grave issues are to be met and great dangers confronted.

The characteristics of Mr. Yancey's mind are very distinctly marked. No thoughtful man ever conversed with him an hour, or heard him deliver a speech, without having the anatomy of his brain laid bare for inspection. Few have such aptitude in showing you not only what they think but how they think. In that highest art of speech by which a man expresses his very nature—utters himself—while he gives you his thoughts and feelings, Mr. Yancey is singularly gifted. His mind is formed for contact. Nor is this so much the contact of one salient faculty, as the direct pressure of his whole intellect on an audience. Nothing intervenes between him and you; and, owing to this peculiar organization, he has far greater force than you would expect from measuring his attributes each in its own proper sphere. A mind of this cast must reason by analogy. If it refuse to disintegrate thoughts, it must set aside all processes of abstraction, and blend the logical and imaginative functions together. Such is Mr. Yancey's method of reasoning; and accordingly facts rather than principles classify themselves in his intellect, and determine his conclusions. Literal and correct in his comprehension of facts, his mind has yet great compass, and while it closely encircles a subject, it is certain to flash through it the light of electric genius. Anglo-Saxon in every leading trait, it is almost as idiomatic as Paley's, and quite as sharply outlined as Cobbett's. When it takes a position in argument, it is sure to bring out the resources couched in the statement, and to intensify them to the last degree of available force. Its prominent opinions are convictions clenched within its brain, and not easily dislodged. Belief is never abated in utterance, nor any parley held with prejudice and opposition. You would accordingly expect that Mr. Yancey has a dogmatic intellect; and such indeed is the fact, if you mean an intellect that holds its sentiments with military firmness, and utters them more to convince than to persuade. Every great orator has this spirit. Chatham and Mirabeau had it in excess, and Henry Clay had it tempered with suavity. Without it, no man can speak effectively. The monarch must be in him and address you from his throne. But if Mr. Yancey has this oratorical temper, he has not a dogmatic nature. So far from this, no man is more open to kindness, or more quickly touched by sympathy; indeed, no man is more easily led, if you know how to lead him.

If he approaches a subject for the purposes of study, one of the first feelings awakened in Mr. Yancey is the sense of truthfulness due that subject for its own sake. Apart from the responsibility which he feels for his opinions as means of influencing others, he has a deep, instinctive love of truth as something to be prized and enjoyed on its own account. A falsehood is his abhorrence, not only as a social but as a personal wrong; and, like Carlyle, he hates shams, and loves to hate them. There is a depth of realness in him, nor can any thing charm him long, whether in companionship or outward pursuits, that lacks this cardinal virtue. The realism of his mind is, in fact, the basis of his strength, and nothing is more alien to his tastes than transcendental ideas and shadowy metaphysics. If an angel came to him in moonshine, he would probably turn away from the message.

Earnestness and self-reliance are well-nigh heroic qualities of his nature. We say of his nature—for they were born with him, and are part and parcel of him and muscle. One sees them very manifest in his character, but sees, moreover, that the feeding source lies behind character in the hidden recesses of nature. Such is the warmth and scope of his earnestness, that he embodies himself in the cause enlisting his sympathies, and accepts its fortunes as his own. Nor does his heart wait to listen for the audible beatings of other hearts ere it lets you hear its music. Likely as not it will strike the key-note and lead off the tune, and do it well the sound, well and good; but if not, there are echoes elsewhere. In the virtue of self-reliance Mr. Yancey has no superior. It is his by nature that always vibrates within his soul; and there is no breeze or storm, blow whence it may, but makes melody there. A doubtful virtue in some, a dangerous virtue in many, a virtue to be watched and guarded in all, Mr. Yancey is so eternally loyal to his own convictions, so brave in defense of what he realizes as truth, and so thoroughly free from any morbid sensibility to personal consequences, that he can well afford to trust himself.

The constituents of Mr. Yancey's mind all appear in his oratory, and perhaps never show to better expected him to take this stand. Persons naturally thought that one of his temperament and blood, full of brave impulses and alive to patriotic duty, would side with the extreme view, and hasten a collision between England and the United States. But they knew not the man. Had they looked below the surface they would have seen the calm and conservative elements of a well-balanced mind, not to be hurried by outside excitements into rash measures, nor recklessly assume risks that involved great interests.

In 1846 Mr. Yancey retired from Congress, and formed a copartnership for the practice of law with J. A. Elmore, Esq., Montgomery, Alabama. He has since resided in that city, devoting himself to the business of the legal profession, in which he has acquired high and enviable distinction. From time to time, as occasion demanded, he has come forth on the public arena to advocate or oppose measures as they bore, in his judgment, on the weal or woe of the country. And whenever he has thus appeared before the people—whether in advantage than when roused to meet a great issue. Put him before an audience, spice the crowd with ungenial critics, dot it here and there with a lowering brow and a curling lip, and then give him a topic—say the Rights of the States—and he can be truly and powerfully eloquent. But we must discriminate. There is an eloquence that mainly looks to the treatment of an interesting theme, and delights in flowing words and fine figures, as if in exclusive deference to the theme itself, and apart from a consideration of practical results to other minds. Then, too, there is an eloquence which has your personal glorification for its object, and, like a coquette, sports with power to twitch your sensations. And again, we have the eloquence that uses thoughts, illustrations, images, pathos, vehemence, just for the purpose of reaching your heart and winning it captive, not to grace its triumphs, but to honor truth and reality. The last is Mr. Yancey's eloquence. It has the utilitarian element, for a work is to be done; while beyond this, not unmindful of the lighter graces of oratory, Mr. Yancey seeks to draw you to his stand-point, and share his convictions with you. Like the elder Pitt, he has that natural oratory which seems a part of his physical constitution—a voice that rings clear and free, and at times sounds as though searching for your ear—a countenance ordinarily rather severe, but quickly relaxed, and prompt to give you the pictorial aspect of the idea as fully as the lips give it emphasis—and a form that, without being tall and graceful, is yet well-framed and dignified, and with a certain Napoleonic air that suggests reserve and respectful fellowship. In some other qualities he reminds us of the descriptions of Fox. Though Mr. Yancey does not possess Fox's wonderful sensibility—ever flooded with emotion, never borne away on a spring-tide of violent feeling—and without the quick start, the instant suddenness, the flying transition, and the vehement gesture that characterized the great orator of England's Parliament, yet Mr. Yancey resembles him in earnestness of purpose, in his utter disregard of petty conventionalities, in his high disdain of every thing but real power, in his entire involuntariness in all the accessories of effect, and, above all, in his complete and absorbed interest in the subject under treatment. Opposition puts him at the top of his ability. Try to crush him, and his dimensions suddenly enlarge beyond your reckoning, and his whole being seems to receive a new accession of vital energy. But the fight is never protracted. A believer in Lord Nelson's tactics he lays the broadside of his gallant ship against yours, and the contest soon ends.

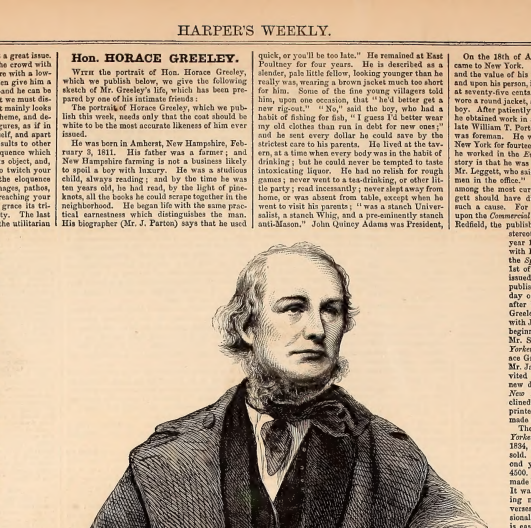
The political position of Mr. Yancey, at his time, is in the front rank of those who warmly advocate the election of Mr. Breckinridge to the Chief Magistracy of the United States. His active co-operation in behalf of this end is a sufficient proof of the fact that he is no disunionist; and while we admit that, in past days, incautious expressions have escaped his lips, and excessive frankness may have betrayed him farther than he would go in cooler moments, we feel perfectly assured that his whole heart, without reservation and without disguise, is thoroughly loyal to that sentiment of brotherhood which our fathers betrothed to us with their institutions, their wisdom, and their memory. One and all they live together in his spirit; one and all he cherishes and venerates them. If the feeling that the Constitution of this Government is the sublimest work of the human mind; that its framers were guided by wisdom higher than their own; that it is a sacred bond between us, to be held as inviolable as religious faith; if such devotion to the Constitution is not a test, but the test of nationality, then Mr. Yancey is a national man. All know him to be an intense Southerner; but he is a conservative and liberal Southerner, nurturing his strength to protect the rights of his section—but the Union—not to assail the rights of other sections, and holding firmly to the primal truth of American citizenship, that the Constitution is the supreme law to every statesman's thoughts as well as actions.



Honoring this distinguished man as we do for his intellectual greatness, for what he considers principle, for his oblivionness to self where rights and sentiments of a higher kind are involved, for that lofty and heroic spirit which would make him, if need be, a martyr to the Constitution of his country, we yet honor him still more for what rests deeper in his heart than these grand virtues, viz.: a sincere reverence for God, and a genuine recognition of Christianity as the divine foundation of all public character and private worth. A member of the Presbyterian Church, and a firm believer in the religion of Christ, he is one of those men who, amidst the duties and strife of patriotic service, gladly turn to the quiet of a Christian home, and there, in sterner fellowship than the outward world allows, strengthen their hearts for life's greatest tasks.

Hon. HORACE GREELEY.

WITH the portrait of Hon. Horace Greeley, which we publish below, we give the following sketch of Mr. Greeley's life, which has been prepared by one of his intimate friends:

The portrait of Horace Greeley, which we publish this week, needs only that the coat should be white to be the most accurate likeness of him ever issued.

He was born in Amherst, New Hampshire, February 3, 1811. His father was a farmer; and New Hampshire farming is not a business likely to spoil a boy with luxury. He was a studious child, always reading; and by the time he was ten years old, he had read, by the light of pineknots, all the books he could scrape together in the neighborhood. He began life with the same practical earnestness which distinguishes the man. His biographer (Mr. J. Parton) says that he used quick, or you'll be too late." He remained at East Poultney for four years. He is described as a slender, pale little fellow, looking younger than he really was, wearing a brown jacket much too short for him. Some of the fine young villagers told him, upon one occasion, that "he'd better get a new rig-out." "No," said the boy, who had a habit of fishing for fish, "I guess I'd better wear my old clothes than run in debt for new ones;" and he sent every dollar he could save by the strictest care to his parents. He lived at the tavern, at a time when every body was in the habit of drinking; but he could never be tempted to taste intoxicating liquor. He had no relish for rough games; never went to a tea-drinking, or other little party; read incessantly; never slept away from home, or was absent from table, except when he went to visit his parents. "I was a staunch Universalist, a staunch Whig, and a pre-eminently staunch anti-Mason." John Quincy Adams was President, sometimes to go fishing with the other boys, but while they fished for sport he fished for fish. It is the key of his career. Horace Greeley has always fished for fish.

HON. HORACE GREELEY.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

In 1821 his father, who had been unfortunate, and failed, removed his family to Westhaven, in Vermont, where for five years Horace continued his hard work and hard study. He gradually grew impatient to learn the printing business, upon which he had long set his heart; and in the spring of 1826 began work as a printer in the office of a small newspaper in East Poultney, Vermont. His shy, gentle, awkward manner, and grotesque appearance, attracted and amused his employer, who supposed that it was impossible such a dull-looking boy could ever become a useful hand to him; but after a little conversation the "last" changed his opinion. At the close of the day one of the apprentices said to him, "You're not going to hire that tow-head, Mr. Bliss, are you?" "I am," was the reply; "and if you boys are expecting to get any fun out of him, you'd better get it and Greeley was already an ardent politician. He was a political cyclopedia, furnishing all the statistical information for the neighborhood; and, although a mere "white-haired, gawky boy," corrected sheriffs and members of Congress without hesitation; and was a "real giant" in the Debating Society.

In June, 1830, the Poultney printing-office was broken up, and one pleasant morning Horace Greeley put his stick through a little red bundle, said good-by to the Green Mountains, and, partly walking, partly dragged in a "line-boat" upon the Erie Canal, reached his father's house in the wilderness in Erie County, Pennsylvania. He tried to find employment in Jamestown, and Lodi, and Erie, and found more work than pay. But at Erie he remained for seven months to fill a vacancy. During that time he drew six dollars for his personal expenses; and when the workman whose place he filled returned, Horace put all his wages but fifteen dollars into a bank-note, which he took to his father, retaining the fifteen for his own use.

On the 18th of August, 1831, Horace Greeley came to New York. He had ten dollars in cash, and the value of his wardrobe, both in his bundle and upon his person, is computed by his biographer at seventy-five cents. He was twenty years old, wore a round jacket, and looked like an overgrown boy. After patiently trying for two or three days, he obtained work in a printing-office of which the late William T. Porter, of the Spirit of the Times, was foreman. He was a journeyman printer in New York for fourteen months. For a short time he worked in the Evening Post office, whence the story is that he was dismissed at the instance of Mr. Leggett, who said, "Let's have decent-looking men in the office." If it is true, it is certainly among the most curious facts that William Leggett should have dismissed Horace Greeley for such a cause. After a few days' work, printed upon the Commercial Advertiser; and afterward for Redfield, the publisher, who was at that time a stereotyper; but at the end of the year 1832 he formed a partnership with Francis Story, the foreman of the Spirit of the Times, and on the 1st of January, 1834, the new firm issued the first penny paper ever published, which died on the third day of the third week. Not long after Mr. Story himself died, and Greeley formed a new partnership with Jonas Winchester; and in the beginning of 1834, having added Mr. Sibbett to the firm, the New Yorker was established, with Horace Greeley as editor. Meanwhile Mr. James Gordon Bennett had invited Horace Greeley to unite in a new daily paper, to be called the New York Herald. Greeley declined, but recommended another printer, with whom Mr. Bennett made an arrangement.

The first number of the New Yorker appeared on the 25th March, 1834, and one hundred copies were sold. At the beginning of the second year it had a circulation of 4500. It was the paper which first made Mr. Greeley generally known. It was strictly a family paper, taking no side in politics. In the verses signed H. G., which occasionally appeared in its columns, it is easy to trace that tenderness of sensibility which early attracted him to Byron, Campbell, and Mrs. Hemans, which is apparent in his face and manner, and which made his almost the first voice to welcome Longfellow's "Hyperion," one of the strictest romances in our literature.

The New Yorker lived for seven years, but was never profitable. The editor was sorely pinched. "I was very poor," he said, afterward; "and for four years really bankrupt, though always paying my notes and keeping my word, but living as poorly as possible." At this time he was a "Grahamite," and a "temperance man," and a Whig in politics. He wrote leaders for the Daily Whig; and in the campaign of 1838 edited the Jeffersonian. In 1840 he established the Log Cabin, a Harrison campaign paper, and the most extraordinary journal of the kind ever issued. Forty-eight thousand copies of the first number were sold, and the issue rose rapidly to nearly ninety thousand. On the 3d of April, 1841, appeared the announcement of a new paper to be called the New York Tribune, to which subscriptions were respectfully solicited by Horace Greeley, 30 Ann Street. The first number was issued on the 10th of April, 1841—a paper one-third the size of the present, and sold for one cent. It began with six hundred subscribers. Five thousand copies of the first number were printed, which were, with difficulty, given away. The expenses of the first week were $025; the receipts, $02. The editor's cash capital was a thousand dollars, and that borrowed! But the effort of another journal to suppress it excited public attention and sympathy. Its seventh week began with an issue of eleven thousand; and in the second year with twenty thousand subscribers and a daily press of advertisements.

In 1848 Mr. Greeley was elected representative in Congress; and the day after he took the oaths and his seat he gave notice of his intention to bring in a bill for discontinuing sales of the public lands, and establish homesteads upon the same. Soon after appeared in the Tribune the famous Congressional Mileage exposure, which made a breeze in Congress. Mr. Greeley perpetually attacked the abuses of which he complained in indirect measures, which, from their insignificance, are usually overlooked.

During the ten years, in which there has been a constant call for lecturers, no man has been more widely sought than Mr. Greeley. He has few of the gifts of the orator, and yet he always holds his audience. His voice is thin and shrill, almost querulous in tone; his manner is sometimes grotesque; but the clear, incisive sense of what he says enlightens if it does not dazzle. Mr. Parton, his biographer, to whom we, in common with all who wish to know the facts of Mr. Greeley's life, are so much indebted, justly remarks his freedom from the "self-demoralizing" habit of speaking for effect. He always has some point to say, and he says it so that every body can understand it, whether he agrees with it or not.

In 1851 Mr. Greeley went to Europe, and was one of the jurymen at the Great Exhibition in the Crystal Palace, and at the banquet of the Commissioners proposed, in a characteristic speech, the health of Joseph Paxton. He has since made another visit to Europe; and in the year 1859 he crossed the Isthmus of California. As an author, he is known by his "Hints toward Reforms," published in 1850; his "Glances at Europe," in 1851; his "History of the Struggle for Slavery Extension or Restriction," in 1856; his account of his California journey, and the life and progress of the great Plains; and a "Political Text-Book," just issued. Mr. Greeley has not lost his love for the soil and its cultivation. Like many men who were born in the absolute quiet of rural life, and have passed their manhood in cities, in the midst of the most exciting struggles, he has a yearning fondness for the repose which is doubly beautiful by distance, and which will always be a dream. He expresses this feeling in a strain of genuine tenderness, full of the truest eloquence, in an address before the Indiana State Agricultural Society, in 1853. But he still remains at his post, the chief editor of the Tribune.

Mr. Greeley's opinions upon all public questions are very decided and well known; but they are often greatly misrepresented. He never refrains from expressing them plainly; and no man in the country is more cordially hated or sincerely loved, although, in justice, it should be said that the enemies are mainly among those who do not personally know him. As an editor, he talks daily upon the most interesting subjects with hundreds of thousands of persons whom he never saw. Yet with many of them, especially in the rural districts of the West and the State of New York, a word from Greeley is truth and law. At public meetings, upon occasions, his presence and his name are greeted with a laughing, good-humored applause, in which, however, the sincerity of the feeling for the man is clearly evident. Indeed, there is probably no man in the country who has so direct and positive an influence upon public sentiment as Horace Greeley. His career is characteristically American. He is the most perfect Yankee that history has produced. His style, his methods, his philosophy, his character, and his success are of the New World and its civilization; and the secret of his influence is unquestionably the profound conviction of the "log-cabin" that he is an honest man.

ALICE FULTON.

ALICE FULTON was a governess to my sister, Carry Barton, a pretty, pouting, petulant young lady of eighteen. I, Phil Barton, was then a young fellow, not quite twenty, with plenty of money, an art-student, a very fair opinion of myself, and whose household in Mount Street, Grosvenor Square, was carried on in a style of splendor commensurate with the juniors of several earls, viscounts, tens, hundreds, thous—, and so on, which my father, a distinguished diplomatist, had bequeathed to her.

Alice Fulton was something marvelous to look upon. She was fair, she had luxuriant hair, a sweet sunny eyes, and a mouth wearing a smile upon it rarely seen among the daughters of men. Her manners were quiet; her tranquil depth at times used to puzzle "mamma;" and her voice was "soft, gentle, and low." She was the most lovely creature I had ever seen, and I had seen thousands every where, and of every class of beauty; and I loved her with such a strength and intensity of passion that I despair of ever being understand its fierce and fervid fanaticism. Of course it was a fool's love.

She sang like Malibran; she played like Arabella Goddard; she painted like a female pre-Raphaelite—and rather—say, worse than either. She was not a bore. My impulsive sister Carry loved her with a generous warmth; and when I happened to be half in the little intrigante I could perceive how deeply I was smitten, she promptly proposed an elopement—a clandestine marriage—a trip to Gretna; she would be so delightful; and effectually manage it for me, all by herself. I confess, however, I stood in considerable awe of my magnificent mamma.

The moment of the explosion came; the train was laid; and one morning I was down on my knees before her in the drawing-room, pouring out of the very fullness of a very foolish heart the odd, also, a very boyish—heart, the devouring passion I felt for her. I told Alice Fulton that I loved her; and she looked at me in almost as angry wits at the deadly pallor that overspread her face.

"Oh, Mr. Barton!" she said, "I had thought you too good—too generous—to insult me by such foolish words and conduct!"

My mother came into the room at the moment, and I was still on my knees. Like him, there was a horrible idea of the absurd was mingling with the positive pain of her cold words and look; but looks; and I knew not how I scrambled to my feet, as my lady closed the door, and looked unutterable amazement.

"Why, good GRACIOUS!" gasped my radiant mamma, sinking upon a chair, "what does this mean? Tell me directly."

"It means, Madam, that I must conclude my engagement with you without another hour's delay!" said Miss Fulton, in her low, steady voice.

"Indeed!" returned the lady, sarcastically, "But, guessing from what I see, perhaps it is as well, and that it will be very good taste on your part to do so."

Alice Fulton, with her white face, glided in a ghostly manner out of the room.

"The treacherous, designing minx!" exclaimed the lady, with bitter emphasis.

"Mamma, please don't; I can't—I won't hear it," I said, hotly. "She is all that's good and virtuous, by George! she is," I went on, and in effect somewhat toned down that impetuous lady by my protestations.

So Alice Fulton left that afternoon. My sister Carry went about the house fuming like a little tempest;" and I was frantic for nearly a week, till Carry found out that she was domiciled at the house of those dreadful Toppingtower girls, whither, on a certain day in spring, I, too, had an interview (fortunately the girls were out) with Alice.

You have guessed how it ended, have you not?

To think how those calm, beautiful eyes could lighten up and flash; those pale cheeks and parted lips could become all of a ruddy glow, and the next moment pale as my ashes; that the voice which was to me a music more sweet than angels' heaven, could become cold and stern even. Never was transformation so complete, ant to me so positively fearful! She was dead, she was behind to me; and my passion only became more fixed and utter. I was fascinated. The chains of the sorceress were adamant, while her face was that of a frozen grave.

A couple of days afterward I was ordered to the Crimea.

Through Carry's aid—she would have helped me to any thing—I obtained a private interview, and had possessed myself of a portrait of Alice—a marvelous likeness, and impressed with that calm and serenely placid expression which, more than any thing was her characteristic, and the highest expression of a type of loveliness so uncommon, and which I can conceive of as ideative, and not to be realized. She was very real, however, was Alice. I loved her—adored her! Those Alice-looking women—so calm—or was it that she was merely cold and incredulous? I saw her once more, and Carry was with us. I knew I was a very child as I repeated my passionate story.

This time she seemed touched.

"If what you say is true, Mr. Barton—well, I will for once call you 'Philip'—if what you say be true, Philip, I should feel grateful for the—for the preference you have shown me. I am poor and friendless, and dependent on the caprice of those who have the misfortune to possess a little wealth in their hands. But it can not be—indeed it can not—and you must know it, too. You may keep my portrait. It is almost as you have said, like you; and I bid you farewell, and pray that God may protect you in storm and battle, and keep you a good and blessed—bright star!"

How her words thrilled in the depths of my inmost soul! How her lips trembled, and her luminous eyes filled with tears! "Alice—Alice—my darling; she loved the wayward beauty, with her passionate temper and her generous impulses—and—and she shook hands with me, and—and I bent over them and cried—

* * * * *

I was at Sebastopol, sitting in one of the parallels on the approach to the Quarries, and reading, for the twentieth time, a letter from my sister, all unsecured, and kissing a portrait which I kept in a pocket I had stitched myself, and fixed just over the heart. Of course I was a fool for my pains. I didn't want to be shot—with this picture on that distinctive bosom. I was young, and very silly, but I hadn't lost pluck—not one of us had, I am proud to say; and oh, my Alice! my heart was warming toward you, as I read my sister's letter.

That letter was from her. I had entreated (through Carry) for a line. It came. It was vivacity—full of feeling, and—and I had hope then and ever.

I was just folding it up; had put the portrait away; when, ping! came something by, and I heard a gasp and a fall, and turning, saw one of my company in the ground, with a bullet-hole on the forehead, and the brave, rash heart was still forever.

"Blast them Quarries!" said a soldier, furiously gnashing his teeth; "that's where the cussed things come from."

That night we were to attempt to dislodge the Russians. The night is come. I have put sentiment aside; I am getting ready for the desperate work; and shall have several men in all our doors beginning the bloody game.

Six o'clock! and we have made a grand rush for our point, and succeeded through an infernal mitraille that is like an awful death sirocco, for such a choice of words I cannot shout so soon because I hope never to see again.

Three times had we to go at it, to cook and eat, for they (as Quarries) fought desperately; but, like a surging hurricane, we literally flung ourselves upon them, and out they bundled like rabbits from a burrow.

The French had the Mamelon; the Zouaves had the Malakoff; and we—we had the Quarries, and wasn't their "pepper" hot? that's all! Gordon's Battery was playing like an organ in a paroxysm of diapason; and we—we were the men in the Quarries. We had got them, and we had to make sire—no less than sire—tremendous bayonet and hand-to-hand fights, this night, to keep them. We succeeded; but, before that pass came, I was mercifully doubled up.

I was hit on the chest, but without any sense of sustaining a violent blow. A rifle-ball came on my breast-case, and, as I afterward found, made a one crack across the glass which covered it, as if it had been cut by a diamond, but driving the frame into my side, and bedding it within the fractures of two broken ribs. Down I went twenty feet, and I knew no more.

* * * * *

I am on board ship at Balaklava, in the "sick bay." My wound was a smasher, and I escaped by a miracle. Do you think, my reader, that this fair picture did not acquire a new virtue in my eyes? that it was a talisman, an amulet, a safeguard—I know not what?

Soon I was able to leave Constantinople, and I take a whim in my head, and, very much prostrated, I, with Jack Brady, am going through the Spitgen Pass. I have changed boat-skin and sabre-tache for the barnacle-cap and "Murray's Hand-Book." And Alice Fulton lives within my heart, as her portrait lies upon my breast; and Jack Brady, I find, has written home to my sister Carry to tell her he can't make me out. Wonders if I am still in love! Oh, Jack, my friend, my brother, more than ever!

We were going to a certain town celebrated for its treasures of art, and its opulent and cultivated society. A carriage of the heaviest Long Acre make was coming down-hill at a speed that startled us both—Jack and me. Jack is not well to-day, either. The drag-chain had given way, and a peril most imminent by each; those fine strong but unwieldy carriage contrivances know very little control in the matter. Instinct made me leap to the leader's head, and, with the aid of the coachman, I pulled the poor brute aside; his companion, unbridled, the whole thing toppled "athwart-ship" on the road, and as soon as I was hurt—getting your humble servant, who (of course) got his hand jammed and dislocated—which first or last I don't know. Of course, no one, but one was killed, and the other fearfully hurt.

I lay dreamily on one of those lovely, breezy, sun-bathed hills, on one of those white-walled dwellings which are to be found on the slopes of the cheerful town. Jack and Jack tended me, and nursed me like a mother, like a sister, like a brother—pooh! lackadaisical! I'm nothing of the kind.

I was dozing dreamily on some cushions Jack had caused to be placed for me; and, hearing an exclamation of pain and tenderness—a sound of unmanned me, "It is him!" I opened my eyes and saw a figure enveloped in a hood and cloak. I knew it at once—Alice!

It was the figure of Alice—my Alice! Oh, so beloved! so unchanged! the dove-like eyes, and her serene, yet sorrowful smile.

"Alice! Alice!" I cried, faintly, as I lifted up my weak right hand (one arm was broken, and bruised) toward her. "Alice! Alice! can it be you? Oh, bear me before I die—I am very ill, they say—bear me before you leave, I love you—I love you—"

"Oh, he loves me!" I heard her murmur; and this time—yes, this time—it was she that was on her knees by my side, kissing my hands and my face, and crying, and laughing.

"He saved our lives!"

"That's beautiful!" cried Jack, as he came on the scene—"a regular—bright star—appearing on the terrace—" that's beautiful! Be happy, both of you!" And he blessed us like a father.

Alice never left me day or night after. My mother, who loved me in her fond and foolish way, was dead, and I was my own sole lord and master. In a twelvemonth Alice was married, and I have been a happy—a grateful—I believe a better man than, alas, I was before. Jack, as the Morning Post used to say, bel my sister to the bayonet altar.

And here they come in: little Alice with big Alice and Jack Brady Barton, aged three; and I am very happy, as I clasp my wife, and, kissing her, say, "Alice, my love, my Alice!" and—and I have nothing more to say.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE POLITICAL CAMPAIGN.

The regular election for Presidential electors and members of Congress took place in Vermont on 5th September, and resulted in a Republican victory. Governor Fairbanks, the Republican candidate for Governor, is probably elected by 10,000 majority, with the full Republican Congressional ticket. The Douglas candidate was John G. Saxe, the humorous poet. The Breckinridge candidate was Mr. Mercye—Vice-President Breckinridge spoke on September 6 in Lexington, Kentucky, vindicating himself from the charge of being a disunionist, and assailing Senator Douglas. His speech was received with cheers. Douglas has been stumping Virginia and Maryland, and appears to be gaining strength. He will probably visit every county every day. On Friday he delivered a long speech at Petersburg, Virginia, to an immense audience. At most of the latter cities of the State.—Senator Seward delivered a set address to the people at Detroit, Michigan. On the gathering to hear him was estimated at 40,000 people. Mr. Seward's speech was mainly on the Territorial question. Mr. H. Stephens delivered a strong Douglas speech in Augusta, Georgia.

INSURRECTION AT SING SING.

An alarming insurrection among the convicts at Sing Sing on Thursday, which resulted in the death of one guard and the wounding of another. The cause of trouble in this movement was a desperate villain named Tom Hyde, who seems to have been the leader of the revolt which he has had a ball and chain attached to one of his legs. The guards appear to have been fully prepared for this impediment, and giving a signal which appears to have been previously agreed upon, one of them struck Hyde at the prison door. A desperate encounter ensued on the yard between the guards and convicts, a number of whom followed him on one side, and the prison keepers and the rest of the convicts on the other. The insurrection was speedily secured, after having mortally stabbed the captain of the shops and severely wounded one of the keepers.

SHARKS AT THE NEW YORK WHARVES.

A number of large sharks have recently been observed around Jones's wood dock, one of which was hooked on Thursday, and after considerable manipulation and much tugging was drawn up on the dock for examination. Length, 9 feet 4 inches; girth around the middle, 5 feet, tailing to nine. The fish manifested great fight and life in the habit of biting in that locality it may be added that, on opening the stomach of the shark, a boy's cap, a large one foot in diameter was easily thrust in. Soon afterward the shark was cut up and the cloth assembled fifteen feet in length.

A MODEL GARDEN AND GARDENER.

A Newport correspondent gives some goodly concerning a garden, a gardener, and a novelist: "One of the greatest curiosities I have seen for a long time is the orchard-house of the Hon. William B. Lawrence of this city. The system of culture is, I believe, rather newly discovered. The house is a lean-to, 300 feet long, built in the most substantial manner. The trees are planted in boxes of peculiar construction, and is divided by glass partitions into three parts, each. Here are one hundred and fifty trees in the house. Of these, 50 for the last two years have borne the entire year, and their fruits, such as pine-apples, apricots, cherries, &c., have appeared with a great abundance and variety of the fruit of more northern climes, such as strawberries, pears, peaches, grapes, etc. All these fruits are growing in pots; and what is most remarkable, the pots are simply filled with moss gathered from the woods. Some of the trees grow in hanging baskets, which, I believe, was original with Mr. Alfred Chamberlain, who has the care of the house. Mr. C. formerly had the care of the garden of Sir Lyston Bulwer, the novelist, who has since been sent out of London. His account is, that 'Bulwer was accustomed to rise about seven and hour or two with him in the garden, and then he would return to his study and write with all his might.' The pots and baskets are generally painted, and filled with moss, and, with the trees trained in every imaginable shape, some of them laden with the choicest fruit, present a picturesque and novel appearance."

THE POLITICAL MANAGERS AT WASHINGTON.

On occasion," of the Philadelphia Press, gives the following account of the proceedings of the National Committee at Washington: "Preston King, Chairman of the Executive Committee, in the absence of Mr. Morgan, at the house of brown, with his long coat reaching almost to his ankles, and looked more like a country parson than the manager of a political machine. He presided over the meeting under the special charge of Governor L. Stevens, of Washington Territory. The Bell and Everett party was represented by Alexander E. Botcler, Member of Congress from the Richmond district, Virginia—a gentleman of high character and deserved popularity."

TERRIBLE CATASTROPHE.

One of the most startling and appalling catastrophes yet marking the dangers of the deep occurred on Friday night. The steamer Lady Elgin, in the Lake Superior line, which left Chicago on Friday night at 11 o'clock, was run into by the propeller Augusta, when about twenty miles from shore, at 2½ o'clock on Saturday morning, and sunk in twenty minutes in fifteen fathoms of water, having on board between three hundred and fifty and four hundred passengers, over three hundred of whom were drowned. Among the passengers were the Union Guard of Milwaukee, a large part of the political and city corporations of that city—a terrible blow to a single town. The vessel struck on the starboard side, the paddle-gangway, on the larboard side. At the time, dancing was going on in the forward cabin. The collision of boats to save the passengers, and the guard-jacking generally appeared to expose the boats to the least of the average bad kind.

THE WINANS STEAMER AT SEA.

The Baltimore Patriot says: "On Saturday last, about noon, as we were quietly seated beneath an umbrella on the starboard side of a boat anchored near the mouth of the Patapsco, opposite to Lazaretto, lazily fingering a line that we had just thrown into the water, waiting and looking out for the capture of some foolish stray perch, our attention was aroused by a quick and sharp puffing, similar to the Mississippi high-pressure steamboats, and, turning to see what it was, we beheld—bright star!—the Winans steamboat, black, whale-looking monster, on a trial trip; but whether we could prepare to get out of the way or it would pass astern of us, and so we drew in our line, set down the pole, and watched her approach with some excitement. The boat was about two hundred feet long, and, as she passed up and down the river, we had a fine view of her whole length. It was evident, from the majesty of a huge mill-wheel, right about the centre of the hull, and so beautifully set in that it could scarcely lifted the water at all as the emerging side. There was every practicable ingenuity at work to avoid the friction of the propeller, evidently arising from the cranks causing the dead points. When the boat passed, the short round also slightly listed, but it was surprising to see in what a short space she could go round. As the wreck swung in her velocity was terrible, if one may so speak."

STRANGE FREAKS OF A MADMAN.

Quite a little excitement was created in New Orleans a few days ago by the following freaks of a lunatic. He managed to mount to the top of a two-story grocery, and began to amuse the astonished bystanders with an itinerary, breaking them with a hatchet, and then hurling them in the pavement below. He had demolished about part for some hours a great crowd collected in the vicinity, and it became a very interesting pulling policemen how they should remove the madman from his peril. Finally, one of the officers brought a ladder, placed it on the spot and directed a powerful stream upon him. So prepared one of this two men ascended the ladder, but the lost his foot-hold, slid down the roof and came to the ground in a dislocated condition. Before he had recovered from the effects of the jar he was in custody.

SOME SUPERSTITIONS.

The Boston papers narrate a strange incident. A young girl, of pleasing face and interesting appearance, about seventeen years of age, with a companion, went to the office of the well-known Dr. Dixi, and asked that a good lawyer might be engaged to defend her, saying that a well-authenticated charge of witchcraft. The names of several legal gentlemen were mentioned, and some attorney was finally employed—a gentleman who resides in another county, but has an office in Boston. The case excited much interest in the city where he has. This attracted the curiosity of the officer to whom she had invited to be employed. He initiated inquiries about her, and learned that the girl was an orphan, and that the lawyer before whom she was to be arraigned was, having charge of considerable property belonging to her in a certain way. She ran away to escape it, and came direct to Boston. She was taken before the police court, escorted to the Lunatic Asylum, and placed in the House of Correction for six months. Subsequently, upon learning something of her history, the lawyer got her out of sentence, and the case was continued in order that place may be adopted with a view to ensuring her from a life of vice.

PERSONAL.

The following letter is published in the Southern papers:

"SHERIFF'S OFFICE, LEXINGTON, KY., Aug. 16, 1860.

"Messrs. Williams & Co., Jacksonville, Fla.

"GENTLEMEN: I have been requested to answer your inquiries in relation to Hon. J. C. Breckinridge's ownership of slaves. I do so with pleasure, that, for many years, he has lived as property, either personal or real estate, in the Commonwealth of Kentucky, and that he has at the present time a family residing here and board at the Ashland House in this city. Respectfully,

"JAMES H. CROSS, Sheriff."

An admirer of Hon. John Cavode, of Pennsylvania, has had a cane made from wood found upon the Hermitage, Andrew Jackson's late residence, presentation to that gentleman. The handle of the cane bears a silver plate, on which is engraved a dog keeping watch over treasure. Beneath is the word "Fidelity."

The Rev. A. Bewley, Methodist Superintendent and missionary in Texas, was hung by a mob a short time since, on the charge of being an Abolitionist. The New York Christian Advocate says he was a devoutly pious and inoffensive man.

The humors of Savannah find expression in odd methods, as appears from the following advertisement of a boot-maker, printed in the Republican: "I hereby notify the public that I have taken the habit of walking down from the outside of store 147 Broughton Street—who, when caught in the act, wish to pass off as practical jokers —that I will henceforth presents such as common thieves."

Letters have been received from Mr. Yancey, stating that he will come North about the middle of this month, when he will put himself at the disposal of his political friends for services in stumping until the close of the Presidential election.

In December, 1858, J. W. Tucker, a California jeweler, sent to the Emperor of Russia some fine specimens of gold-bearing quartz. Recently he received from the Emperor, as a return for the books, a magnificent massive gold ring, enriched with an oblong amethyst, surrounded by ten diamonds weighing a carat each. The gold of the ring is from the Ural Mountains. The amethyst is colorless, and of the purest color. It has been presented, by an expert, worth as much as any ruby of three times the size.

Martin, the Boston wherryman, arrived at Albany on the evening of the 5th in good health and spirits.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT.

The British Parliament was prorogued on the 28th ult. The Queen's speech was read by the Lord Chancellor. She says that her relations with foreign powers are friendly and satisfactory. She trusts there is no danger of the interruption of the general peace of Europe. She regrets that the powers are not yet united in their views of affairs, the tranquility of other States will remain undisturbed. She will abstain, in any negotiations which may take place on the Savoy question, the neutrality and independence of Switzerland will be maintained. She laments the civil war which has unfortunately upon the Christians in Syria, and cheerfully responds to the appeal of the Powers of Europe for contributions for the relief of the unfortunate sufferers. She regrets the failure of the Italian conference, and says that her country will support the demand for a full and faithful execution of the treaties of Vienna. She thanks Parliament for the supplies, and for the liberal provisions for the fortifications, and congratulates the country on the abundance of the harvest. She concludes by expressing the heartfelt pleasure and satisfaction she has experienced in the cordial and enthusiastic reception the Prince of Wales has met with in her North American provinces.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

In the Commons, on the 28th, Lord Palmerston said in the Government had received official information of the landing of Garibaldi in Calabria, but had received a dispatch contradicting the fact. He also said that it was no truth in the statement that Austria had threatened to occupy Naples. She adhered to the agreement not to interfere with the Neapolitan movement.

On the same day he acknowledged the services rendered the Christians in Syria by Abd-el-Kader, and said the British Government have instructed to tender to him the thanks of the British government.

THE MAHOMITES THE AGGRESSORS IN SYRIA.

In Parliament, on the 30th inst., Lord Palmerston said he did not deny that the Turkish authorities in Syria post the government had not suppressed themselves. It was believed that the Maronites were the first aggressors, because large quantities of arms had been distributed there, and the attack begun by the Maronites upon some mixed villages of Druses. The authorities to expel the Druses and not long ago Lord Cowley, in a conversation with M. Thouvenel, expressed that fact and entreated that he commenced by the Maronites, and M. Thouvenel replied that he believed so.

RETURN VOYAGE OF THE "GREAT EASTERN."

The Great Eastern, on her return voyage to Milford Haven from the Bay of Baltimore, made the passage in nine days four and a half hours—the shortest time ever made by any steamer with all her advantages and recent improvements in machinery and shipbuilding, and that, too, with the wind reserved with horrocies, and so foul as that of any ship that ever crossed the ocean. If she were only one of the light speed, she could make money and become the most popular ship afloat.

A NEW BRITISH ENVOY.

Mr. Lindsay, member of Parliament, has been authorized to proceed to Washington, and lay before the American Government the views of the British government relative to the navigation laws, belligerent right, etc., and to enter into negotiations for the negotiation of a new treaty of trade, etc. Mr. Lindsay sails on the 8th of September.

FRANCE.

ANOTHER PEACE SPEECH FROM THE EMPEROR.

The Emperor has made a speech at Lyons in response to addresses by the authorities. He condemned the unjust attacks excited which, and declared that his conduct should make him deviate from the path of moderation and justice. He said he was the true friend of peace in France, and he urged them to give themselves up with confidence to his guidance. He was determined, he said, to maintain, that France should not degenerate under his guidance, and the nature of his speech caused an advance on the Bourse. Rentes, 68f. 70c.

SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE CHINESE.

An Imperial decree has been issued opening the French ports for the reception, during five, of all kinds of foreign grain and flour, irrespective of flag. Vessels thus entering would still be exempted from tonnage dues. This is regarded as an admission of the free trade doctrines the French harvest. Many commercial conclusions very wet.

THE EMPEROR ON HIS TRAVELS.

At latest dates the Emperor Napoleon and Eugénie were at Colmberg, and met with an enthusiastic reception there.

A HINT FOR HAM-EATERS.

The Academie de Medecine of Paris has just received a communication, which has literally caused the quills upon that fretful porcupine to stand on end with horror. A student of Wurtzburg, M. Wirchow by name, announces the terrible discovery he has just made of the existence of a dreadful microscopic animal, the trichina spiralis, in ham and pork, no matter how prepared, whether you call it pork, ham, bacon, sausage, or polony. When any human creature is eat of this animal in abundance, he is observed to grow pale and emaciated in a few days afterward; his strength diminishes, and he dies at the end of the sixth week. A post-mortem examination discovers the muscular system to be filled with trichina spiralis, which proves that death must be occasioned by universal consumption, owing to the attack of this horrible little monster. Messrs Kreeg will what he was about when he invented the use of swine's flesh to his countrymen.

GERMANY.

AUSTRIA WILL NOT INTERFERE IN ITALY.

According to the Cologne Gazette, an Austrian note is being prepared, which the Foreign Minister announces that the designs of the Emperor are not aggressive, but that he will defend his Italian possessions to the uttermost.

ITALY.

THE INVASION OF CALABRIA.

The advices of Garibaldi's invasion of Calabria are fully confirmed. The town of Reggio was attacked by the invaders and capitulated on 21st, the garrison being allowed to withdraw with their muskets and personal baggage only. We also hear of the capture of Lagonegro and Castel-a-Mare. Four hundred Calabrians also are said to have joined Garibaldi.

Garibaldi had been proclaimed Dictator at Palermo. Large numbers of Calabrians were joining him. The latest dispatches report that the Royalists have again been defeated at Reggio, and repulsed at Scylla on the 29th that the King of Naples had quitted there on the previous evening on board the frigate Stromboli, and that the Piedmontese occupied the forts. This requires confirmation. Disturbances at Naples were imminent. Appeals to the people to revolt were being publicly distributed. The Neapolitan Minister of War and General Bosco had left Naples for Calabria with six battalions as reinforcements. A revolutionary movement at Salerno was imminent. The Pope, it was said, had expressed his intention to excommunicate Italian Confederation.

THE POPULAR ENTHUSIASM.

A letter from Sicily contains the following: "We read with much interest the letter of the correspondent written by a father who climbed his son. It was couched in affecting terms. We, too, have had a father who, before he was in Sicily, that he did not wish to prevent his remaining there, but that he could not be with him. He sent him, and to provide him with money, and to this end he made an arrangement with Mr. Ingham, of Marsala, Rouse. The boy was thirteen years of age. The Government of Naples received the deputation with scorn, and refused to succeed in doing. At Milan, last week, I met the same deputation, and was told by some of them themselves how they were refused upon various pretexts. They even went so far as to refuse passports to the boys to go to Genoa, on the ground that they pay for their equipment—a green license fixed with red cockades. Such is the Neapolitan Government. Of the 50 or 60 boys who gave them without the least hesitation; all could not be received, and many of the rejected were obliged to return home, and if the sum required was not complete they enlisted. Of these, to be brief, I can tell you that I saw 15 or 16 volunteers set off. Half the population accompanied them to the gates of the city, and cried out again, 'Long live Garibaldi!'"

A PROCLAMATION TO THE LADIES OF SICILY.

The Sicilian journals publish a proclamation addressed to the Sicilian ladies by Garibaldi, in which he says the following is the concluding paragraph:

"Ladies of Sicily, you who are young and rich, greatly beloved, and most charming lady—had four sons. One of them died a martyr to the holy cause, and the other three he had kissed. The eldest, Benedetto, is now lying ill of his wounds in the hospital of the Grandi Infermi at Palermo. The third, Enrico, had his skull cleft in the battle of Calatafimi. The second, Giuseppe, is now in order of his incomparable mother. Women! call also your children to the holy cause. Sicily is dying in this harbor, following through his glass the movements of the vessels. Then, in the moments of supreme anguish, which I give you, without, however, vouching for its truth, a Garibaldian, who had come to ask for the mercy of the pace-quato, or sword-fish, affords occupation to the fishermen. One day, as the fishermen of Marsala scattered along about the coast from Messina to Pozzallo, they saw a sword-fish coming from Africa. The fishery is performed in the most ingenious manner. A man ascends the mast of a boat, and sits on the middle of it, boat, and when he sees the sword-fish passing through the water, he throws the harpoon at it with all his force, and the sun at the stern, who is armed with a long and sharp knife, jumps into the water and kills the fish. The sword-fish Garibaldian appeared for two hours, and it is stated that, having received the harpoon, he turned furiously upon his opponent, above that from the pole he was able to encounter. He then made a desperate effort to escape, but the Garibaldian knew how to force the subject of all conversations in the camp, and succeeded in bringing the sword-fish to land. Its endless carcass occupied under a scorching sun on the sandy beach yesterday."

ONE BRAVE NEAPOLITAN.

The Herald correspondent in Turin says that the letters belonging to this Messina Convention or capitulation are not without interest. Among them is one from an officer in the Neapolitan government, in order to place him. The officer, Colonel Bosco, refused to do this, and was found, to his surprise, the town occupied by the Garibaldians. Thereupon Colonel Bosco sent a letter to Garibaldi himself, and ask permission to pass on his way. Garibaldi at once accorded him the right of marching the Neapolitan the medium of certain proposals to be brought to the town of Messina by a Garibaldian officer and a trumpeter bearing a white flag. At a certain distance from the city the white flag was sounded and the white flag was waved, and the eyes of the Garibaldians were bandaged. They were then led into the private room of the commandant, when the bandages were removed. The Garibaldian officer then laid down his own and your officers to embark, but not with your arms. I will give you 48 hours to embark, and hours I will blow it up." "No," replied Bosco, "I will not abandon my post without orders." Upon this Garibaldi bid me the situation of his mine, and with the highest spirit of chivalry said, "Go, Colonel, to Naples with my last breath. All I ask is that the blood of my soldiers be not shed." Colonel Bosco then stated only to return to it again with propositions more in unison with the honor of Italy. The bandages were again worn, however, in like manner refused. As the messenger was leaving the room, Garibaldi, with a white suit, then another, then another, with finally a squadron of four Garibaldian cavalry with a white standard, presented—bearing at her nose-band a flag of truce. She was conveyed away from the city with her escort, with propositions such as I have given in article 2 of the capitulation, which, however, was, in fact, almost identical with those proposed by Garibaldi."

WHAT'S THERE?

Several chests, containing ingots of silver, have been received at Genoa from Naples, being the product of the "Peter's pence" collected in Spain. The amount exceeds 4,000,000 francs. The coin does not include various offerings in the shape of plate, etc., which are estimated at 4,000,000 francs more.

THE PRINCIPALITIES.

THE MURDER OF PRINCE CARLOTO.

The full name of the assassin of Prince Caloto is Demetrius Tzoni, and he is a native of Janina, in the Montenegrin prince, named Panisca. Some time ago he entered the service of Prince Caloto, and by him was introduced to Zara, and was there joined by Rashid, Zara. Zara Caloto's wife, and by her was introduced to his sister, but allowed herself to be seduced by the advances of the latter. Caloto, however, remained faithful, remarried. Kadich then went to Constantinople, and there received the second husband of his sister. After that affair, Kadich went to Galatz, where he caught the assassin's eye, and by him was introduced to Caloto, whom he could recognize him; he afterward proceeded to Cattaro, from which he returned to Galatz, and took up his residence at Sestari. He afterward returned to Cattaro to consult with Caloto, and then proceeded to Albanian, was able to approach the Prince without being suspected. The motive which prompted him to the crime appears to have been, first, the dissension between the Prince and Panisca, and next, the conduct of the Prince's adherent to the assassin's sister.

CHINA.

THE PREPARATIONS FOR WAR.

Lord Elgin and Baron Gros had gone to the Gulf of Pechell. It was suspected they would attempt to renew hostile negotiations, while every thing indicates the intention of the Chinese to fight. All quiet at Canton. The rebels continued to advance toward Shanghai.

THE BRITISH PROVINCES.

PROGRESS OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.

On 1st September the Prince laid the corner-stone of the new Parliament buildings at Ottawa, of which we gave an illustration in a recent number), held the usual levee at the Governor's house in the evening, and a ball and went down the dials. In the evening the city was illuminated, and there was a grand torchlight procession. On 2d he attended service at Christ's Church, which was crowded. The Prince was in full Masonic regalia, and he drove out to the Masonic Hall, after a visit to Aylmer, he took the cars and came through with some stoppages to Montreal, where he arrived at 9 P.M., and was well received. He slept that night on board his steamer, and on the 3d left at 6 A.M. for Kingston, where he arrived at 4 P.M. Here a difficulty awaited him. The Orangemen, who had been specially invited, had resolved to parade at the Prince's reception. A meeting of Roman Catholics was held, a resolution requesting the mayor to stop the parade, as offensive to their feelings, and sent a copy of the resolution to the Duke of Newcastle. The Duke replied that if there were any Orange demonstrations the Prince would not land. Thereupon the city council of Kingston met, and the Orangemen were outside, to discuss the propriety of abandoning the parade; but at last by a decided vote they resolved to proceed. The Prince arrived at 4 P.M., and the whole Kingston moved out of sight, anchored, and the Prince landed in state. The Duke of Newcastle and suite travelled in the city, and landed all night. At 9 A.M. on the morning of the 4th the procession started again, and Kingston without agreeing to modify their programme. The Prince, however, was not insulted, and passed through the streets. Previous to the Prince, who reiterated his determination not to land. At 8 P.M. accordingly the Prince embarked for Belleville, where the Orangemen announced their intention to parade, and where the Prince arrived at 10 P.M.

On Thursday, 6th, the Prince of Belleville reviewed the Orangemen of their Kingston brethren, and the Prince refused to land. The Orangemen paraded the streets, and the Prince admired their city. but would not break through the rule about the landing. The Orangemen accordingly left, and arrived at Cobourg, where the Orangemen had prepared a procession. The Prince landed, received an address, a ball, and slept there. On Friday morning he left by rail for Peterborough, and Toronto.

THE PRINCE LAYS A CORNER-STONE.

At Ottawa, on 1st, at the laying of the corner-stone of the Parliament buildings, the Prince took a silver trowel, carved with the Prince of Wales' feather and motto, proprium humanum ignoscere, and spread the cement on the corner-stone, which is of Canadian marble. The trowel was handed to the Prince, and the Prince applied it three times with a Masonic mallet. The corner-stone was then lowered into its place, and declared laid. Beneath the stone were placed coins of the realm. Rev. Dr. Cook, Speaker of the Parliament, offered up a prayer.

The crowd maintained no order during the ceremony, shouting "Down in front!" "We want to see him!" "Get off the roof!"

The Prince, who had been standing in the sun all this time, then walked to the Speaker's chair under the pavilion, where the contractors, architects, builders, and others engaged on the works presented to him. The Prince inspected a model of the building, and walked around the pavilion, examining the plans. He then left in his carriage, he stopped out of the back way to build a levee at the Speaker's house. The people gathered around the carriage and declared him more to see him.

In the room of the Speaker's house, the Queen's portrait was thrown down and much defaced.

HE PUTS A SOVEREIGN IN THE PLATE.

On Sunday, the 2d, at Christ Church, which was crowded with people, though they hardly knew him in his Masonic regalia, he walked in that he lives and moves in uniform. Each of the suite put a sovereign on the plate. The Prince also put down a gold piece, and the tenor talk of erecting a new church from the proceeds. So much money was given that in Ottawa before.

HOW HE TAKES HIS MEALS.

At Ottawa, on 1st, says the Herald correspondent, the Prince breakfasted at half-past 8 o'clock. Sandwiches, luncheon, had great difficulty in getting provisions enough. The Prince has a fine appetite, and the table had to be kept got dinner ready; and that an American could get it in the United States, and that he pleased. I believe the Prince always breakfasts with a small party of fourteen of the principal persons of the suite.

HE BURSTS INTO TEARS.

When he found he couldn't land at Kingston, says the Herald correspondent, the Prince burst into tears to have to his future subjects, who went out to excursion boats, and effected the most unexpected opportunity to see him by sitting on deck all day, resting his head wearily upon his hand. Disappointment, chagrin, and fatigue had benumbed, and oppressing greatly discomposed! When the Prince arrived at Toronto, he looked pale and fatigued, he repeatedly waved his handkerchief, and at last burst into tears. He was overcome by the fact that his people are not lost on the people, who believe him to be constrained by the Duke of Newcastle's command in his refusal to land.

HE SHAKES HANDS WITH EVERY BODY.

At Peterborough the Prince was received by a procession, which escorted him to the Court-house, where the city and county presented addresses. At Cobourg, the Prince read replies. One man, running by the side of the Prince's carriage, had his hand in the Royal Highness's, who shook it heartily. Elated by his good luck, the man ran away from the crowd, and returned to work, with a similar honor; and for some minutes the Prince was shaking the astonished bystanders' hands, but no man turned away, and the demonstration ended.

WHAT'S THERE? AGAIN.

The furniture used by the Prince of Wales and suite at St. John, New Brunswick, has been sold by auction. The Prince's bed brought 20l.; the Duke of Newcastle's bedstead, 42l 5s.; reception chair, on which the Prince sat, 5l.; sofa, 5l.; dressing-table, with glass and marble top, 6l.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE AND THE N'S ACKNOWLEDGE MASONS.

The Herald correspondent says: "A deputation of a dozen Masons waited upon the Duke of Newcastle at Ottawa to take part in the ceremonies of laying the corner-stone, but the Duke declined—all of his Masonic regalia present. It appears that the Duke of Newcastle and the Prince John Hamilton are members of the Masonic Lodge, the stone, after the Prince, with their peculiar ceremonies. The Duke declined that the Masons must have absolutely refused to have any thing to do with the affair."

THE PRINCE'S RECEPTION.

The Herald correspondent says: "I have been shown the report of the reception of the Duke of Newcastle and the Governor-General, which is the most extraordinary piece of the Governor-General. He says:

"I have the honor to inform you that the Masonic Society intend erecting arches and decorations with the insignia of their Order. I have also been informed that the Grandmaster intend appearing in procession in their full regalia. It is very evident that any such display is likely to lead to religious feuds and breaches of the peace, and I am not assured that the Prince shall be mixed up with any such scenes, so foreign to the intention of his visit. I, therefore, as you would inform the parties concerned of my feeling in regard to this matter, and by no means authorize any such display, and trust that there may be no writers, I shall advise the Prince to pass through no streets where such arches are erected, and if the demonstrations are persevered in, to avoid landing in such towns altogether."

"A prototypical oldie!

"I have also been informed, though not with as much certainty, that the Orangemen intend to parade at Kingston. Of course my remarks apply equally to that city."

THE DUKE WON'T BE BULLIED.

At Belleville the Grand Master of the Orangemen had an interview with the Duke of Newcastle, and told him that the Orangemen were truly loyal, and endeavored to persuade him to land. The Duke's only reply was that he could not land, and the spirit that evinced already begins to have its effects.

ATTITUDE OF THE ORANGEMEN.

The Orangemen are determined. During the morning of the 4th the Orangemen gathered in the streets to the number of about 2,000, with banner, and drums other places. They are a set of fierce-looking country fellows, dressed in orange sashes, regalia, and arms in red, blue, and white gowns, white others wear drawn swords, and carry loaded muskets, and many of the drums carried on the shoulder. "No Surrender—we support the Protestant religion."

"No words can convey an idea of the feeling here. There are two distinct parties—Protestant and Roman Catholic in Canada, and the excitement catches like fire. Many of the Orangemen have their wife the Orange-Roman Catholics, and for the peace of the community, the Orangemen have resolved to remain at home, and allow the Prince to land in peace. Then the ministers refused to fight their battles for them. The ministers are divided in various fractions, and unanimously refused to present any of the horses owned by the Government to convey the Prince, and was walked along the Orange ranks calling out, 'God bless you, my boys!' and 'Hurrah for the Grand Master, Solomon!' Such talk had along a line of about three thousand strong, and the Prince was received with cheers. The Prince was received from the Grand Master, Connors, at Toronto: 'Sorry that you have not landed.' Reply: 'Sorry myself. Let your people be assured of my sympathy. No surrender!' We will follow him wherever he goes! Hurrah for the Grand Master, Solomon!' Reply: 'Thank you. This event will be ever remembered by me.' 'Thank you. This event will be ever remembered by me.' 'Thank you. This event will be ever remembered by me.'

THE DRIVE IN THE CENTRAL PA

ERK, NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER, 1860.

THE DRIVE IN THE CENTRAL PARK.

We publish on the two preceding pages a fine picture of the drive in our Central Park, which will be one of the first sights shown to the Prince when he comes here. It will, even in its unfinished state, give him a good idea of what we are doing in the way of civic comforts, and of the wealth and luxury of our citizens.

Our Park, which is progressing very satisfactorily under the management of the Commissioners, will undoubtedly be, one of these days, one of the finest places of the kind in the world. We hear from time to time cavils at the course pursued by the Commissioners and engineers; but these can almost always be traced to disappointed applicants for place, or to personal spite and malignity. Public opinion on the subject is decidedly favorable to what has been done. Those who saw the Park before the engineers went to work on it are amazed at the beautiful sites which have been contrived with such unpromising materials; all fair persons believe that the enterprise is managed with honesty and good taste.

GOOD FOR NOTHING.

CHAPTER I.

"No, Ma'am, she will never be good for anything," said a rough, ungentle Dr. Aloe, fingering the knot in the halter that tied his old horse to the post in front of the widow Linn's cottage. And as he applied the comfortable pipe to the old chaise, added: "Sorry, Ma'am, to say so; but I am always candid." Then he shook the reins, nodded "Good-day," and took himself away.

Ah, not only himself, but with that vanishing old gig went hopes that had been long cherished by the whole mother—went dreams and fancies, baseless, perhaps, yet they had sustained her in many a dark hour; and more tangible than all these there went away, in the depths of the black bombazine vest-pocket, a gold piece that had been hoarded, and saved, and with it, after all, had only purchased this doleful verdict.

Like many well-meaning people, Dr. Aloe had fallen into a mistake quite common among those who consider candor the first of all virtues—that of speaking unwelcome truths in the most unwelcome form, or never softening or toning down a repression if it conveyed his meaning clearly. As may be gathered, for instance, from the old grave old; but the officious friend who salutes us with such an announcement is not one we always care to meet, nor does it do any possible good to address a despairing invalid with a remark on his pallid face and rayless eye. Dr. Aloe congratulated himself unreservedly in having cut off all hope from the pitiful mother whom he left a few moments since. "No nonsense about me," he muttered to himself as he drove away.

Quite true, Dr. Aloe: but suppose there has been a little nonsense—just enough, as people say, "I fear, Ma'am, that little Allie will never be well, but she may be a great deal better at times"—wouldn't have gone, Duty, have never come to her well, while the pang was softened to those poor hearts?

It was no wonder that Mrs. Lane felt sick at heart as she leaned over the little white gate, and the hot tears splashed down on the ball and chain that closed it. For she remembered, long ago, Allie had there swung to and fro, laughing with childish glee meanwhile. Then came the recollection of that dreadful time when her father, with unsteady hand and muddled brain, had tossed her up in play, and let her slip on the pavement below, from whence she was taken up insensible and almost lifeless with an injury to the spine. Then the long dreary convalescence; the pain of months and days of pain; the helplessness of limbs and weariness of spirit that followed—dark days, lightened only by one blessing, for out of that great sorrow came one joy.

By the child's bedside, with her hand clasped in his, that erring father turned to Heaven, and asking help where alone it could be found, he repented a solemn vow. For the child of his vows that completed his earthly course Joseph Lane was a new man; no fumes in his brain, no taint on his breath, no stammering on his tongue. His companions looked and wondered, but he heeded them not; and when he saw the face of wife and child light with joy at his return, he felt that his "old things had indeed passed away." When Allie would ask for his kiss and say, with cheek in her loving way, full many a time the strong man brushed away a tear, partly of bitter remorse for the selfish past, but he had revived a full portion of thankfulness that God had not taken her from him until he could prove himself a tender father. Was Allie good for nothing then?

And when at last he was called away to travel down the dark valley, whose children he had contributed and comforted him—whose voice sang the songs of those redeemed and ransomed by the blood of the Lamb, or read the promises so fadeless and true? Who was it, who, laying her cheek beside his, silenced his bitter self-reproaches with her childish wisdom as she read, "If a man sin in corruption, it is raised in incorruption; it is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power"—reading softly her own comment: "You know, father, I will not be weak or crushed then. I shall have a glorious body." Was Allie good for nothing then? And when the dark days of his death came, who supported her and mother through those times of trial but this brave, true spirit in its weak and ailing frame?

Such were the memories that came over her as Mrs. Lane stood crying, just when the harsh words of the Doctor had reached her ear; and after the first grief she grew indignant at his "candor," and repeated, latterly, "Good for nothing! what does he know what our Allie has been or will be to us?"

Mrs. Lane, ever unselfish in her grief, dried her eyes and turned to go in, for she feared that the Doctor's words had penetrated to the room where the child sat watching the sunset from the window. In truth Allie had heard them, and until night kept coming in her eyes that the sunshine made rainbows therein, and she could only see the outline of the western hills dimly when she brushed them away with her little blue-veined hand. Though she prayed most truly to be resigned to her lot in these years since accident to her, and this was one when relentless thoughts came quick and fast. Putting her face to her mother's bosom, "Oh, why was I born! never to be good for any thing! No lady to dear mother, when she is so tired and so poor—never to help her work, nor when he is lonely: oh, how will I live? I wish I were in heaven with father!" But even while she looked at the western sky there alone and calm and still the evening star, as peacefully bright as though no sorrows of earth were abiding, or no hearts sorry and sad. Its calmness soothed her, and by the time her mother came in she had fought and conquered her copious unbelieving fit, and with a meek, and, humble and subdued, she laid her hand on her mother's arm, saying, "Never mind, mother, I don't mind it," and the kiss that followed said daughter grew peaceful and trustful once more.

CHAPTER II.

THE widow Lane and her children lived in a small cottage painted white, and guarded by two splendid maples that were her special pride. Passers-by commented upon the fine foliage and beauty even, in summer time, and when Jack Frost had tinted them in his own dashing way they looked like great bunches of scarlet and yellow lilies. They were the most noticeable features in the long straight street of the village of Meriton. They were planted long ago when Joseph Lane took a bride to the little white house by the way-side, and commenced business as a carpenter and builder, and as ever a thrifty young lawyer need to do. He owned this spot with its garden, stretching back until it joined the meadows of Squire Denton, Anne Moore. The furniture was all their own; and at time rolled on a junior Joseph and our little friend Allie were added to the household—so say the setting of the maples that throve so well.

It would be an old story to tell how the glass of wine that at first but quieted nerves and tongue for some effort of forensic display, became at last the unquenchable habit; how clients were refused to act clogged with its poison; how friends now and then spoke a word of caution to hold him back in his mad career, but how he was found until the hour when the suffering child had lain him, with her weak hand, through God's grace, to the safe high ground of self-control. Then, for those happy years after that, even despite their sorrow, and Mrs. Lane recalled their peace and quietness long after he slumbered in the village church-yard, leaving her with two children and but meagre support. For a time the neighbors generously helped her by doing errands for her, but she could hardly re sign her hopes of giving him an education that would fit him for a profession, and secure to him the best school the village afforded. This exhausted her slender means, and the time had now come when she must ask some one to do something for something that would procure bread and butter, and clothing better than the plain but neat home-made garments that she could make for him.

This it was that made Allie and her mother so sad and still as they sat together in the twilight side by side them lay the Meriton Eagle, and a long advertisement set forth in glowing terms the prospectus of the "Meriton Academy for Young Gentlemen." Increase! facilities for students, with no increase in the terms; superior teachers in every department. Then were the advantages of the village, and with a weary sigh the widow had laid down the paper and resumed the work that required but few shillings to add to their stock, already so scanty for winter expenses. Allie's busy fingers were flying fast, for in these days she had grown quite handy to help in such light tasks. She looked weary and sad though, as she said, "Oh, mother, can't we do something to earn a little money—some way so Jessy won't have to stop going to school? Oh, if I were only strong!" And here her lip quivered.

Just then in came Squire Denton, and eyes bright; for he had been diverting himself between the intervals of his engineering with a frolic with a little chap about his own age.

"Oh, mother, they are going to have the greatest times at the 'Corner' next week. Jack Denton is going to be in my class too. Just think of it! Oh, won't it be fun? Jack told me about it in the paper; and when I'm going, I'm a great lawyer as father one of these days, and—" Why, mother, what's the matter, ain't you glad?" And the boy sprang to her, and pulled his little hands and her neck, he looked in her face, beseeking her to tell him what was wrong. But she, when, half heart-broken, she had made him understand their poverty and inability to meet the expense of such luxuries, her little heart did quail for a moment at this first encounter with trials.

He had studied so hard the last term to win a high place—had fitted for his going to college—was a weary disappointment for him to lose it now. He opened and shut his jack-knife twenty times from pure nervousness before he could speak; but it had the brave, good boy conquered his selfish wishes, and tried to make them believe he did not grieve so much.

"Never mind, mother, never mind; I'll study at home, and you and Allie shall help. Allie knows more than any body else—Jack Denton's big brother says so, and he is an older boy than I am."

And Arthur Lane put said Allie, looking up from her work for a moment.

"Yes, he did; and he says that you could teach any body just as well as the regular teachers."

Allie said no more, but her needle flew faster and faster on the shirt-sleeve, and the color came in her face as she pondered some new thought in her mind. Jessy buttoned up his threadbare coat, trying to whistle manfully (he broke down very soon), and said:

"Well, mother, I'll get the kindling-wood all ready for morning, and then I'll get the milk;" and he was gone out, taking as heavy a heart with him as ever boy carried under an old blue jacket. Then he left the house "not to let mother know how bad he felt."

While he was absent, and while Mrs. Lane was attending to some household work in the back kitchen, Allie sewed on until it grew too dark. She had just put up her work, and was thinking intently of her half-formed plan when a loud knock at the door startled her. She opened it directly, and was confronted to find that it was twice no other than Squire Denton—the richest man in the village, the owner of the biggest house, the finest horses, and, perhaps, somewhere within miles. A self-made man, he was fond of boasting that he had nothing to be ashamed of—"not his two fingers," and, by-the-way, the said two fingers were big enough to fight their own way up where. He boasted, too, that he had "got on in life" without any education at all." In spite of his loud, boastful tones he was a kind-hearted man, and a liberal patron of the schools, and Arthur Lane's chief and very scholarly and no one was more proud than the man "with no education" when Arthur Denton took off the first prize at the Academy examination.

"Good-evein', Miss Allie," said the robust Squire, grasping her little hand in his big fist—"good-evein'. Where's Miss Lane? I just call'd in a minit about a little school business."

As Allie ushered in her mother, he said, in his loud way, "Why, how you've grown! I declare you look most as well as if—" The Squire was about committing an unseeming adverbial to say, so he stopped short and pretended to cough—a cough that was quite enough—loaded up with "ahem" just as "Miss Lane" and Allie returned to the little parlor. He said, "How d'ye do?" (we have not yet told how he entered—and "hemmed" again. Mrs. Lane lighted the lamp on the shelf, and he seemed immensely relieved to perceive by its light that Meriton Eagle lying on the chair.

"Ah!" said he, taking it up, "this puts me in mind. Well, you trustees you've read this 'boat about. Well, we trustees thought we had it all fixed, and the teacher to be left by Doctor's departure has give out, and we don't rightly know what to do. There's a class of little fellers that are to have only three hours' school, and that's it's them that I'm left without a teacher. Now my Arthur put it into my head that your Allie could just as well take the place as not. She's been to school to Jessy, but she's always studyin', they say, and if she is strong enough to go I think it will do her no harm. What do you say, Jessy from here, you know?"

Mrs. Lane spoke not a word, but watched the girl's face, which in the sparkling eyes and low cheek would answer. Gratefully and earnestly she thanked the old trustee for his kindness. The amount paid would be a little more than Allie's tuition would cost. This notice was enough, and it was settled then and there that Allie Lane, in spite of her fifteen years, should be instructing teacher, should take the place offered. The Squire took his leave soon after, leaving grateful hearts beside the hearth-stone. There was much realization of her dream, and though angels don't come in blue coats and brass buttons to tell people that "Allie's good," and let little less, to come in this dark time with such hopes of usefulness to others. She felt fully equal to the new task in hand, and, in truth, had been longing for something to do, to feel that she was more than a floating leaf on life's current. Her health was fully restored to her services as she spoke much lessened since the rapid growth of the past two years. To say that she did not dread the first examination of her pupils, and wish to prenounce her far more strong-minded than she was, is but to tell an every-day fact for her purpose.

Wasn't that a bright tea-table in the white cottage behind the maples that night? With its every-day fare—the home-made bread, thin, cakes, and frizzled beef; with the luxuries somewhat rare in those days to Mrs. Lane—"good old Hyson" that she had brought from the tea-leaf-hoarding and the wood fire crackling; with the happy faces around it, Joey's merry laugh and bright smile—as he drank his tea "to the health of our new setter and the smartest teacher in the county;" Allie's pleasant remembrance of Joseph Lane, Esquire, Senator from said county," while the happy mother looked on with a glad smile. Ah, that was a happy time! It was a holiday meal, and they had holiday hearts to welcome it; so the hours sped on until the little clock ticked "nine," and remminded them that they must go home. Joseph it was the unwonted dintiness of the supper I can not tell, but something made them dream all night. Joey encountered several big giants in battle and about to attack Allie, and demolished them entirely with his sword-cane, and laid them out wrapped in Meriton Eagles, the prospectus uppermost. Allie was following a blue coat with brass buttons up and down hill, trying to catch up, but just as she came near it, resolved itself into ten huge fingers, which, dream-like, soon turned to ten little jingle children—and then Allie herself was small and woke and found herself with a slight headache, the result of the excitement of the previous day.

CHAPTER III.

THE time of Allie's installation came round before she could realize it all. Joey carried her books as well as his own as they marched off toward the Academy. Allie's heart beat fast as she entered the room. No. 3, where the restless atoms of barnacles, eyelept boys, were ranged in a row. They were undoubtedly a little afraid of her; but in truth she was much more afraid of them. She knew their whispered comments as she removed her shawl and bonnet, and shrank painfully as she saw them point to her stooping figure. True, she had nearly outgrown it; but the little elves, feeling that instinctive hatred to teachers common to their years, soon espied it, and made up their minds then and there to be unsparing in their remarks if she should prove "hateful" in any degree. Kindness and firmness overcame them at last; and, on the whole, when the first week was over, she felt that she had been happier in spirit and had better health than she ever before; and so two years rolled on, checkered with lights and shades as human lives are wont to be.

But all unconsciously to herself there had come a new interest in life since the day when Arthur Denton had first given her the shelter of his umbrella as she prepared to return home in school one shower afternoon. His path homeward was just by their door, and he used to find the gate inviting walk homeward, and many a lingering good-by in the shade of the maple-trees. Allie had been an invalid from young people hitherto had a friendship with and for a fresh strong spirit like Arthur's and all the charms of novelty. He had read so much, could tell her so many things she had been strange and wonderful in science or art, liked the same books that she loved, and mingled with it all a chivalrous devotion to her. Then were flowers, such as grew in his father's garden, found lying on the sill of the cottage window; then were books she liked left on the door-step; there were copies of the latest and sweetest poems found in the folds of her parasol; there were a thousand such trifles, that yet made up a sum of happiness greater than had ever dawned upon her before.

Arthur Denton was her senior only by years—"just nineteen years old" and the widow began to grow proud of the manly, handsome, kind lad girl, who had walked to and fro in such a pleasant dream, were boy and girl no longer. It troubled her greatly, and she could not banish the pleasant draught from the girl's lips by reminding her that her misfortune must set her apart from the gift of human love, except in a sister's and a brother's heart. She could not even help beguiling herself with the light in the handsome face, with its starry eyes and soft brown hair, would atone for the drooping figure in a loving heart; and yet she feared. Arthur was destined for a high place in the world, in a few short weeks he would leave for colleges, and she trembled as she thought of the blank that was coming in Allie's life.

CHAPTER IV.

"Good-by, Allie."

"Good-by, Arthur."

Such farewell words must be spoken in this world of changes. Alas that though we look forward to them with wistful eyes and beating, perchance they may seem but tomb-stones when we look back!

Arthur stood leaning over the gate, and watched the rumbling, rattling stage, that grew less noisy and less distinct in the increasing distance, until it turn in the road and it from sight. Then, for the first time, the little teacher realized what had passed away with that boy. She felt instinctively that the kind protection of his presence would be hers no longer—that the walks home from school would seem tedious and lonely, that no more the pleasant dainty fruit would be laid on her casement—that all those things were of the past. She dared not look at her own life's future interest lightened, she dared not indulge a maiden's dream of love. When such a thought came to her unbidden she walked to the little mirror hung in the window room, and brushing aside the rich brown curls that clustered around her forehead, looked steadily, and rebuked her image thus: "Allie Lane, see there; 'you will never be good for any thing,' never; 'don't dream, don't listen to any other thoughts than that he said so, and it is true.'" It was a stern discipline and bitter, but she was no coward. Her saddened life had made her a girl of seventeen, and probably she shut out the bright hope of Arthur's love; but as resolutely it sprang up again, fresh and full in the germ of that. She knew he liked her society better than any other, and she resolved never to misinterpret it.

And so these years had gone by forever—years so bright that they were never forgotten amidst the cares and sorrows of after days. Joey was advancing rapidly in his studies: and if the teacher in room No. 1 sometimes flagged and grew weary, the pupils had bright faces and grateful words, "that she was just the dearest little sister in the world" that "I'm sure we cannot be take care of her one of these days," to reassure her.

Spring time came at last, and but a short time before Arthur Denton came for the vacation visits Squire Denton presented himself one morning at her school-room door, holding by the hand little Dick, his youngest born, and the pet child in all Christendom. He was seven years old, round, fat, with a saucy turn-up nose and a pair of twinkling eyes mischief-laden. The schoolmistress him, and added,

"I'm 'fraid you'll find him a little spoiled. You see he's got no mother to look after him, and old Betts don't manage him very well. Mebbe you can do something with him, you seem to git along with every body." Gently, Nick. He is a good boy, and don't be easy to him Allie."

So saying the Squire left the youngest scion of the house in her charge, much to her distress, for his reputation would have justified any one in preferring "Old" to his confidence of Nick. He was born around a tub full of water, trying to drown a little chicken, which of course was fluttering and cackling for its life. To put the Maltese kitten in the pounding barrel, because, he said, "the dirty kitty must go in the wash," and he made faces at the washer-woman's baby until it almost went into fits.

Such was the unenviable notability of Nick Denton. It was small wonder that his father thought it was time to do something desperate. He was one of those clear-headed business men, who can by no means comprehend a child's nature —to whom they are only queer, incomprehensible little things. He would whip Nick heartily sometimes, and laugh at him at others; old Betts the housekeeper threatened him with "nagurs" and goblins, and consoled him with jam and cake. It was just nothing that poor motherless Nick was not, like a wild vine with no kind hand to prop it up or keep it from the poisonous weeds. This was to be Alice's task, and a hard one it proved.

Little Nick seemed quite peaceable the first month, but the second Alice's troubles began. She had put down her arm in Willie Mine's cap at recess, and there was the tow head stuck fast in it. As schulars laughed, she and as the little fellow grew red in the face and twisted and turned in her efforts to get it off. A pair of scissors and a sacrifice of an inch of Willie's hair consoled this mishap; but it was only a prelude to others. At last he became so unruly that she was obliged to punish him. A night or the ruler was her extreme infliction; but as she called him up, he twisted it out of her hands and hid it triumphantly behind him, walking backward with it toward the door.

She fixed her soft gray eyes on him and said, quietly:

"Nick, give me that ruler; you must mind me, or I shall be obliged to expel you."

His eyes never waver, and as she took a step nearer him he threw the ruler at her, just grazing her temple, shouting:

"I won't mind anybody, and I don't care for you, old Miss Crooked; you ain't good for any thing and I hate you!" Alice said no more, and the little imp was gone, banging the door and whooping down the street.

There was a profound silence for a moment as the pale teacher sat cowering down behind her desk, her fragile hands over her eyes, her frame shaking with fear and pain, and a tear now and then trickled down on the copy-book before her, strangely enough blotting out the word "friend" from its pages. The little scholars, half-frightened and wholly sympathizing, whispered together, softly—and Lucy Crane carried a great big apple that he had been hoarding for recess time, and set it up, directly in front of her on the desk, while Robbie True brought her a cup of water to bathe her bruised temple. These were little attentions, but they were very grateful nevertheless; and she wiped her eyes and smiled pleasantly on her little scholars, and after a while the routine went on the same as ever.

Nick did not come back. The Squire called to say "that he h'dwest Nick might as well stay home a little longer"—and from the mildness in his manner, she feared that the little rascal had misrepresented her. But oh! what was this to the wound which he had inflicted by a child's careless hand? "Arthur said so!" The words rung in her ears day and night. She recalled the slogan, that "Children and fools always speak the truth," and believed it true. It was a great sorrow to come to her, and yet she reflected that it was better to be awakened early—far better than that the little dream should go on; and bravely and resolutely she set her way, and lived the life of duty and care. Every one said that the teacher was growing thinner and paler; but she only smiled, and said that she was very well. Her mother and Josey knew nothing of her last trial—she did not wish them to.

At last Arthur came back, taller, handsomer, and more friendly than ever; but Alice met him coolly, or avoided him entirely. He was at first puzzled, then piqued, and tried to find another friend to be what she had been, but what she would be no longer. She would not explain to him the shadow that had come over her lest it might imply a wish to hear him speak in her favor; she could not complain to the little brother; and, now than all, she dared not risk the renewal of the pleasant old intimacy. She tried to forget him with a fair, graceful wife beside him, but the image was always blurred with her tears. No, no, she could not, she dared not; and thus it came to pass that Arthur came and went, and she never saw him except at a distance—the estrangement was complete.

It was one dark day in the October vacation that Alice was startled from her afternoon reverie by the voice of Squire Denton, who had come to ask her services. Nick—poor, wicked, vexatious little Nick—very, very ill, and the father's voice trembled as he said:

"I thought nothin' you would come up a little while and read to him. He is so kind o' lonely, and he says you can read better than I can. I ain't much of a reader."

It did not take her long to put on bonnet and shawl, to tell her mother where she had gone, and was soon under the sorrow-stricken old man's roof. All his faults, he loved the little boy—to reach the big house and the bedside of the child. He was in truth very ill, burning with fever, and old Betts, in mistaken kindness, had covered him up with blankets and given him warm tea to drink. His mouth was crimson, with a line of white around it, his eyes glittered strangely, and the restless hands moved to and fro.

Allie quietly threw back the heavy covering, bathed his hands and head, prepared ice-water for his parched lips, and fanned him until his grew quite calm. Then he looked at her languidly, saying,

"Are you my mother? Other boys have mothers when they are sick. Where did my mother go —I looked for her—Betts said she was in the church-yard, but I couldn't find her. Did you ever see her there?"

Then his pitiful ramblings went on. He recognized no one. The doctor came and went, but the medicines refused to act—the fever rioted through his veins, and all, except the father, knew now that little Nick must die. It was almost too much for Allie's composure when the poor old man came to the bedside at twilight, and, in a choking voice, said,

"Nick don't know no prayers—mebbe you'll say one for him."

Before she could answer a faint, weak voice from the bedside spoke,

"Yes I do, Allie, she told me one." And slowly and imperfectly he repeated, "Now I lay me;" then sighed with the unwonted effort, and relapsed into a state of quietness again.

Five days had gone by since Allie had come to nurse the boy. Never once relieved her, but he clung to her strangely. In his lucid intervals he had made his peace with her, and would lie quiet while she prayed for him. Then he knew he loved holding her hand. She tried to lead him to think of the bright heaven where his mother was waiting for him; but he shrunk away sometimes wearily, saying,

"I spect I'm too wicked to stay there with her! If she could have staid down in the church-yard I could be there; but I don't b'leeve they will want me in heaven—I'm very bad you see. Betts says I am the worst boy ever was."

Then would come on feverish phantoms and muttered words. They were on the Sabbath night. He began to ask for Arthur and Jack—they were already on their way home, and were expected every moment. They came in the morning—his hours were growing few. They came when the sunset was almost over, and the dying British soul was trying to look upward where the teacher would fain lead him. He smiled feebly and returned their kiss; then he went on in his childish supplication, asking for pardon for "teasing old Betts; for hurting the dogs and cats;" and "please God forgive me for saying naughty words." Again he told her a lie 'bout Arthur's saying she was good for nothing, and crooked; and please let me come where Jesus will take care of me and Mary and Ben mother, and please let father—" They listened not to the words, but watched the sweet, childly agony, and little Nick could neither be sick nor troublesome any more.

Time flies on regardless of human joys and sorrows: the years come freighted with changes. Three years have passed away since the house under the maples there have come new faces. Josey Lane has a situation in a mercantile firm in the city, and lives together in keeping-room for him; for Allie is Allis Lane no longer. In the big house she reigns its honored mistress, with the brawny arm to shelter her and the truest heart to love her in all the land; while the Squire, grown very grave and still, has not a new face to look upon, and a new purpose in his life, blesses the hour when Arthur married the girl who was "Good for Nothing."

THE PRINCE OF WALES IN CANADA.

HAMILTON AND LONDON, CANADA WEST.

We publish on page 589 a view of King Street, Hamilton, and on page 589 a general view of the city of London, the two principal cities in Canada West after Toronto. The Prince's visit has familiarized our readers with the names of both places.

Hamilton, the second city in Upper Canada in wealth, population, and commerce, is beautifully situated on the shores of the splendid lake of water at the western extremity of Lake Ontario. Its present population is about 25,000, and as the city is rapidly increasing in size the prostration of the late commercial crisis its number is already increasing. The town is built on an inclined plain rising gently from the shore of the lake for about two miles, where it is terminated by a ridge of high land known as "the Mountain." From this elevation it affords a most magnificent panoramic view can be obtained of the surrounding country. Toronto, though, lying at right angles, wide and well built, the buildings presenting a clean and handsome appearance from the whiteness of the stone used in their construction, which is quarried in the neighborhood. The public buildings are extensive and handsome, and the wholesale warehouses unequaled in the province. The Annual Exhibition of the Provincial Agricultural Association is this year to be held at Hamilton, the inauguration of which will be graced by the presence of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. Our view represents the scene of King Street on the occasion of opening the fountains which have recently been erected, and add much to the appearance of the street. The fountains are supplied with water from Lake Ontario, by the waterworks which the city has lately constructed at a cost of over $800,000; the water being pumped by enormous engines from Lake Ontario to a reservoir four miles distant on the mountain, from whence it is distributed to the city three miles off.

Queen water-works far exceeding in size those of any other city in America.

London, Canada West, is a city beautifully situated almost equidistant between Hamilton and Erie, in the County of Middlesex. It was laid out by the Canadian Government in 1826 as a country town, and from the beauty of its site, and the richness of the country around, soon began to increase in population. In 1839 there was a population of about 600 souls in London, and in 1851 it had risen to 1000. It became a garrison town in 1837, owing to the then serious rebellion in Canada, and from that time until 1853 there was always one and frequently two regiments stationed in the town. At each regiment consisted of about 1000, officers and men, the presence of the military caused a large expenditure, and thus aided greatly in adding to the importance and prosperity of the town. At the outbreak of the Crimean war, in 1853, the military were altogether removed, and the handsome and commodious barracks have since been the tenantless. London was incorporated as a city in 1855, and the population that year must have been more than 12,000 souls, to which large number it had gone on steadily increasing during previous years. The city suffered severely from the bad crops of 1856–57–58, being almost entirely dependent on the agricultural community, and the great crisis of 1857 helped to aid to the general depression. In 1859, however, there was a fair crop, and the crop of the present year is unusually abundant. The city has accordingly fast been reviving, and there is now a general and increasing desire on the part of every one to pursue their business steadily and energetically.

The population is not so great as in 1855, being now about 11,000, but the continuing prosperity is already bringing in new-comers, and the city will soon go ahead once more. Within the last few years many handsome buildings have been erected, among which may be specially noticed the Bank of British North America, the Post-office, the Commercial Bank of Canada, and the City Hall, all of which are beautifully faced and ornamented with stone work. The Church of England, with its recently-erected cathedral in College, and the Old Church of Scotland, the Wesleyan Methodists, and Roman Catholics also possess elegant structures. The streets are wide and handsome, and in Dundas and Richmond streets the stores and buildings will vie with any in the Province. There is a large produce market in London, where considerable business is done every day, and on Wednesdays and Saturdays there is a large market square, covering some five acres of land, is crowded with teams, and in their respective seasons immense quantities of wood, hides, cattle, and grains, fine and coarse, change hands. Agreat many American boys buy in London, including steel, wheat, and wheat. In the markets building itself, which is a neat and commodious structure, there is always a tempting display of fish, game, fruit, and fowl. Apart from its situation and the rich and fertile country with which it is surrounded, may well be said, as is frequently said, to be seated in the midst of the garden of Canada.

WANTED—A DIAMOND RING.

I SAW it kicked by the careless Balmorals of a jaunty nurse; I saw a fat morsel of humanity make for it with a hey!—broken into divers hey-ey-eys by pudgy fingers; I saw it stooped and secured it, thereby causing the fat one to pull up short, stare at me with two black carraways stuck in a dreary expanse of dough, make a dumpy thumb in six orifice of the same expanse, and trot back again with that article of dress under discussion—a moment which is the peculiar attribute of the London infant population.

Having ascertained the nature of my prize, I proceeded to meditate on the proper course to be taken, which meditation resulted in the following advertisement:

FOUND this evening, Wednesday, in the Regent's Park, nearly opposite the New College, a valuable diamond ring. The owner may recover it by calling at No. 19, Witton Place, etc.

Before noon on the following day I was making my most sweeping bow to a somewhat-jocular old gentleman whose white hairs and benevolent smile added a double charm to the grace with which he stepped forward, and, waving ceremony, extended his hand, saying:

"You have taken a weight from my mind, my young friend, and I know how to thank you."

The insinuating delicacy of the adjective (I am not more than forty-five) was, perhaps, not without its effect. I accepted the offered pledge of amity in respectful silence.

"A young friend," continued the patriarch, "may possibly find it difficult to understand how the loss of a trinket can be a source of positive suffering to an old one, but I am willing to my lost ring—there are associations connected with it which—ahem! This is childish, you will excuse my emotion."

I bowed profoundly in the presence of this natural agitation.

"I have passed some hours of sleeplessness and distress, from which you have been the means of relieving me; and believing you to be honest, I only remains nothing now but to reimburse you for—"

Here the old gentleman drew forth his purse, and proceeded to unclasp it.

"Excuse me, Sir," I stammered, rather hurriedly, "but if I am to be a party, you can doubtless describe the armorial bearings?"

"Armorial bearings, Sir! It was a diamond ring."

"Certainly."

"A plain diamond ring!" repeated the old gentleman, sternly. "Do not attempt to play tricks with me, young man. I will point out to you directly—"

I beg your pardon," said I, drawing back from the outstretched hand, "but, as the ring in my possession is accurately engraved with a crest and motto, I conclude it can not be the one you are in search of."

The old gentleman eyed me for a moment keenly.

"I am afraid you are right," he sighed, in a tone of deep dejection; "I must seek further. Alas! what a melancholy termination to my hopeful journey."

Spoed the parting, welcome the coming guest," is a very good motto. I made no attempt to detain my venerable friend; but, as he turned toward the door, I was certain I saw beneath the silver hairs a look of dark and shining brown.

My next visitor was a lady extensively get up, of imposing height and carriage, rouged, scented, spectacled.

"We meet under singular circumstances," began this lady, with confascending haughtiness: "I am the principal of a college for young ladies—"

With a deferential acknowledgment of the honor done me, I begged to know what had procured it.

"In the hours of recreation we are accustomed to promenade in the Park—a delightful spot, a suggestive of the blushing country!—during our ramble of yesterday, a young lady under my charge was so unfortunate enough to lose her ring. You, Sir, are the fortunate finder."

"I certainly did, madam, pick up a ring; but—"

"Ah! how grateful shall we dear girls will be at beholding it again!" exclaimed the teacher of youth, raising her hands, ecstatically.

"May I trouble you to describe the ring?"

Describe it! A diamond ring, Sir—handsome and massive, but plain."

"And the crest?"

"The crest! Ah! but my young charge were with me. Stupid! to have forgotten. The crest of the Debonaires. It it a lion passant or? No; I am wrong. I remember that she should to me unwell to accompany me! But it is immaterial. I will take it for her inspection—she will be able to recognize it at once."

"Pardon me, madam; but I should scarcely be justified—"

"Sir!!"

"I feel it my duty," I said, firmly, "under the circumstances, to take every precaution against mistake. I am sure the young lady is not too scrupulously indisposed to give you the necessary description."

"Very well, Sir! Exceedingly well! It is I who have been mistaken. I fancied—yes; actually fancied—that I was speaking to a gentleman! You will find, Sir, to your cost, that the lady principal of a college is not to be insulted with impunity! I shall write you a good-morning."

Very harrowing this. I can scarcely recovered from the lady principal when there is a dash of wheels in the street, and a young fellow, flicking the reins to a groom in livery, sprangs up the steps to the front door.

"Oh, dash it!" he begins, breathing out a volume of stale tobacco; "I beg your pardon, and that, too! Mistaken—dash it! I mean you and then—told me I should find my ring here, so I ordered out the vessel and the cats, and spun along like nimrods for it!"

"I shall be very glad to restore the ring I was unfortunate enough to find when I can discover its owner."

"Discover! dash it! Didn't I tell you it's mine? I—I wish you wouldn't be so precious slow—I don't want the cats to get cold. I've just had 'em shampooed, you know, naphthaed and dashed."

"What sort of ring was yours?"

"What sort! Oh, come, as if you didn't know —that's good."

I intimated that I should be glad to find out if he knew.

"Not know my own ring, eh! I know it's worth a couple o' ponies. Come, let's hear the damage, and I'll settle up."

"You can describe the device?"

"Device, eh? What, the governor's? Bless me, I've worn it here for every hunt in the day, to do me out of my rightful allowance. Device! Oh, come, you don't expect me to do the heraldic dodge, dash it!"

"I can not give up the ring unless you describe it."

"Oh, dash it, don't chaff a fellow, now. I shouldn't care a rap about the thing, only it belonged to mother's last party, and the governor's cut up so deuced rough. I've got heaps of 'em. Come, I'll swop you any one of these for it, because of the governor."

I respectfully declined the proposal.

"Well, dash it," exclaimed the young fellow, as though struggling with a sudden idea, "make a couple of muffs we are! Why don't you turn the thing? I could tell in a minute if it's mine, dash it!"

I replied that I was sorry I could not oblige him, and added that I had better not obtain an exact description of the "thing" from his governor, I recommended him not to keep the cats any longer in the cold.

Mem. I am getting exceedingly tired of my treasure-trove. I retire to my room with a view of dressing for dinner. I am informed that a lady wishes to see me, and I am afraid my mental ejaculation was not complimentary to the lady in question.

A tall, graceful figure, draped in heavy mourning, rises as I enter the room. She opens the negotiation in some confusion. She is very, very fair. She has come to me in the hope of regaining a ring, exceedingly dear, the parting gift of a fond father to her brother and herself.

My eye rests on the crape about her dress, on her pale cheek and fair face, from the flush of confusion and timidity has faded. Deferentially I request her to describe it.

"A large diamond, handsome," she believed, "but valuable to her for far other reasons."

"But," I said, gently, "shared on the gold inside the ring there is—"

"A crest, I am aware of it," she answered, sadly, "but I know nothing of the motto, and have never given it more than a casual glance. My brother is dying, Sir," she said, lifting up her pale face to mine. "Only this morning he missed the ring from my finger uneasily; we are alone in the world: it is the only relic left of one so kind to us, how can I tell him it is lost?"

"I am sorry to pain you," I said, striving to be firm; "but it would be more satisfactory for all parties, and cause but little delay, if you could obtain the description from your brother."

Without a word and turned, the mournful resignation of her air and attitude touched me, and, as she turned, I saw a tear roll silently down and fall upon the hand stretched out to the door-handle. I couldn't stand that.

"Stop!" I exclaimed, "one moment. I am sure—I feel certain—I may trust you. You will tell me—"

I take the ring from its security, I hold it out timidly for the blue eyes to examine.

I see yet the look of delight overspread her fine features—I see the expression of almost childish pleasure in her eyes as she looked up at me, as she clasped her hands, and cried out, "The ring, the ring! Oh, Alfred, my dear brother!"

Her hand was upon it; such a tremulous happy eagerness in her glance; such a caressing fondness in her way of fingering it. How pretty she was!

"My dear child" (I am forty-five) "it gives me sincere pleasure—" Then I stammer, then I spring after her. "At least, you will leave your address with me."

What a look shades her face now! Wounded integrity mingled with pity for me.

"Ah, Sir," she says, sadly, handing me the card on which she has been pencilling, "some day you will be sorry for this. You do not trust me."

Certainly, I am a brute. The accent of reproach in her voice haunts me; the sorrowful glance of her eye—how pretty she is! I sit down to my breakfast in the morning, half inclined to call at the address given, and apologize for my heathenish distrust. How delightful to see her in her own peculiar atmosphere, ministering to the sick brother who is all she has in the world, to look upon if one can not enjoy the beautiful tenderness of a gentle sister to an afflicted brother. But my letters wait, and I toy with them. This is a hoax I know. What does Fred want, I wonder? I tear it open: I read:

"DEAR JACK.—What a queer chance if you have stumbled upon my ring. I was obliged to run down to Romford late last evening, and never missed it till we slackened at Ilford. A pretty taking I've been in. If it's mine, the crest is inside: you know it—a mailed hand holding a lance, and the motto 'Armed at all points.' Verily, truth is stranger than fiction. Keep it for me.

"Yours,
"TOM VYVYAN."

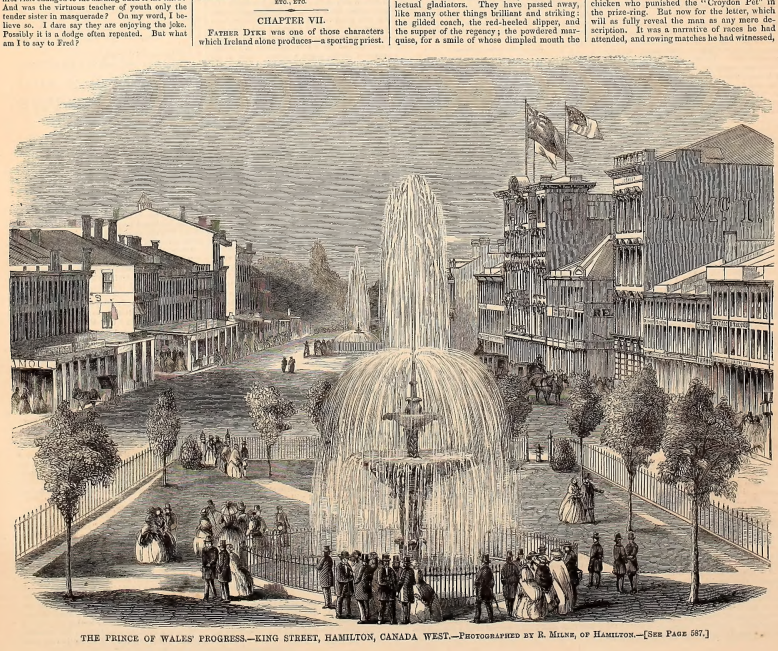
Idiot! Gull! It is quite useless to call myself names. It is almost superfluous to add, that when I called at a certain address in Eaton Square to inquire for Miss Lucy Hamilton, the lady was not found. Probably, the "dear Alfred" had required speedy change of air; probably, brother and sister were even now embracing in rapturous gratitude over the precious relic of that one lost to them so lately. Was that dear one not lost, but transformed? Had the silver-haired patriarch of the first visit changed to the dashing buck of the third? And was the virtuous teacher of youth only the tender sister in masquerade? On my word, I believe so. I dare say they are enjoying the joke. Possibly it is a dodge often repeated. But what am I to say to Fred?

"THE RING, THE RING! OH, ALFRED, MY DEAR BROTHER!"

A DAY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER.



AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER VII.

FATHER DYKE was one of those characters which Ireland alone produces—a sporting priest. In France, Spain, or Italy, the type is unknown. Time was when the able, elegant, witty, and well-bred, was a great element of polished life: when his brilliant conversation and his insidious address threw all the charm of culture over a society which was only rescued from coarseness by the marvelous dexterity of such intellectual gladiators. They have passed away, like many other things brilliant and striking—the gilded conch, the red-heeled slipper, and the supper of the regency; the powdered marquise, for a smile of whose dimpled mouth the deadly rapier has flashed in the moonlight; the perfumed beauty, for one of whose glances a poet would have racked his brain to render worthily in verse; the gilded salon where, in a sort of incense, all the homage of genius was offered up before the altar of loveliness—gone are they all!

An fond, the world is pretty much the same, although we drive to a club dinner in a one-horse brougham; and if we meet the cure of St. Roch, we find him to be rather a morose middle-aged man with a taste for truffles, and a talent for silence. It is not as the successor of the witty abbe that I adduce the sporting priest, but simply as a variety of the ecclesiastical character which, doubtless, a very few more years will have consigned to the realm of history. He, too, will be a by-gone! Father Tom, as he was popularly called, not ever needing any more definite designation, was tam Martæ quam Mercurio, as much poacher as priest, and made his sporting acquirements subservient to the demands of an admirable table. The thickest salmon, the most curdy trout, the fattest partridge, and the most tender woodcock, smoked on his board, and, rumor said, cooked with a delicacy that more pretentious houses could not rival. In the great world nothing is more common than to see some favored individual permitted to do things which, by common voice, are proclaimed impracticable or improper. With a sort of prescriptive right to outrage the ordinances of society, such people accept no law but their own inclination, and seem to declare that they are altogether exempt from the restraints that bind other men. In a small way and an humble sphere, Father Tom enjoyed this privilege, and there was not in his whole county to be found one man churlish or ungenerous enough to dispute it; and thus was he suffered to throw his line, snap his gun, or unleash his dog in precincts where many with higher claims had been refused permission.

But it was not alone that he enjoyed the invigorating pleasure of field-sports in practice, but he delighted in every thing which bore any relationship to them. There was not a column of Bell's Life in which he had not his sympathy—the pigeon-match, the pedestrian, the Yankee trotter, the champion for the silver sculls at Chelsea, the dog "Billy," were all subjects of interest to him. Never did the most inveterate blue-stocking more delight in the occasion of meeting a great celebrity of letters, than did he when chances threw him in the way of the jock who rode the winner at the Oaks, or the game chicken who punished the "Croydon Pet" in the prize-ring. But now for the lovers, which will as fully reveal the man as any mere description. It was a narrative of races he had attended, and rowing matches he had witnessed, with little episodes of hawking, badger-drawing, and cock-fighting intermixed:

"'I came down here—Brighton—to swim for a wager of five-and-twenty sovereigns against a Major Blayse, of the Third Light Dragoon Guards; we made the match after mess at Aldershot, when neither of us was any thing to speak of too sober; but as we were backed strongly—his father the favorite—there was no way of drawing the bet. I beat him after a hard struggle; we were two hours and forty minutes in the water, and netted about sixty pounds besides. We dined with the depôt in the evening, and I won a ten-pound note on a question of whether there ought to be saffron in the American drink called 'greased lightning;' but this was not the only piece of luck that attended me, as you shall hear. As I was taking my morning canter on the downs, I perceived that a stranger—a pokey-like fellow, not quite a gentleman, but near it—seemed to keep me in view; now riding past, now behind me, and always bestowing his whole attention on my nag. Of course I showed the beast off to the best, and handled him skillfully. I thought to myself, he likes the pony; he'll be for making me an offer for him. I was right. I had just seated myself at breakfast when the stranger sent his card with a request to speak to me. He was a foreigner, but spoke very correct English, and his object was to learn if I would sell my horse. It is needless to say that I refused at once. The animal suited me, and I was one of those people who find it excessively difficult to be mounted to their satisfaction. I needed temper, training, action, gentleness, beauty, high courage, and perfect steadiness, and a number of such-like seeming incongruities. He looked a little impatient at all this; he seemed to say, 'I know all this kind of nonsense; I have heard shiploads of such gammon before. He frank and say what's the figure; how much do you want for him?' He looked this, I say; but he never uttered a word, and at last I asked him,

"'Are you a dealer?'

"'Well,' said he, with an arch smile, 'something in that line.'

"'I thought so,' said I. 'The pony is a rare good one.'

"He nodded assent.

"'He can jump a bar of his own height?'

"Another nod.

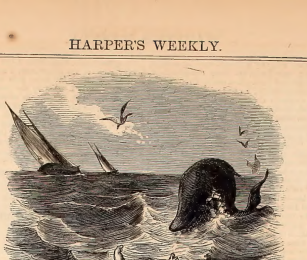
"'And he's as fresh on his legs—'

"'As if he were not twenty-six years old,' broke he in.

"'Twenty-six fiddle-sticks! Look at his mouth; he has an eight-year old mouth.'

"'I know it,' said he, dryly; 'and so he had fourteen years ago. Will you take fifty sovereigns for him?' added he, drawing out a handful of gold from his pocket.

"'No,' said I, firmly; 'nor sixty, nor seventy, nor eighty?'



"'I am sorry to have intruded upon you,' said he, rising, 'and I beg you to excuse me. The simple fact is, that I am one who gains his living by horses, and it is only possible for me to exist by the generosity of those who deal with me.'

"This appeal was a home thrust, and I said, 'What can you afford to give?'

"'All I have here,' said he, producing a handful of gold, and spreading it on the table.

"We set to counting, and there were sixty-seven sovereigns in the mass. I swept off the money into the palm of my hand, and said, 'The beast is yours.'

"He drew a long breath, as if to relieve his heart of a load of care, and said, 'Men of my stamp, and who lead such lives as I do, are rarely superstitious.'

SWIMMING FOR A WAGER AGAINST A MAJOR BLAYSE.

"'Very true,' said I, with a nod of encouragement for him to go on.

"'Well,' said he, resuming, 'I never thought for a moment that any possibility could have made me so. If ever there was a man that laughed at lucky and unlucky days, despised omens, sneered at warnings, and scorned at predictions, I was he; and yet I have lived to be the most credulous and the most superstitious of men. It is now fourteen years and twenty-seven days—I remember the time to an hour—since I sold that pony to the Prince Ernest von Saxenhausen, and since that day I never had luck. So long as I owned him all went well with me. I ought to tell you that I am the chief of a company of equestrians, and one corps, known as "Klaus kunk ridens," was the most celebrated on the Continent. In three years I made three hundred thousand guilders, and if the devil had not induced me to sell "Schätzchen"—that was his name—I should be this day as rich as Herman Rothschild! From the hour he walked out of the circus our calamities began. I lost my wife by fever at Wiesbaden, the most perfect high-school horse-woman in Europe; my son, of twenty years of age, fell and dislocated his neck; the year after, at Vienna, my daughter Gretchen was blinded riding through a fiery hoop at Homburg; and four years later, all the company died of yellow fever at the Havana, leaving me utterly beggared and ruined. Now these, you would say, though great misfortunes, are all in the course of common events. But what will you say when, on the eve of each of them, "Schatzchen" appeared to me in a dream, performing some well-known feat or other, and bringing down, as he ever did, thunders of applause; and never did he so appear without a disaster coming after. I struggled hard before I suffered this notion to influence me. It was years before I even mentioned it to any one; and I used for a while to make a jest of it in the circus, saying, "Take care of yourselves to-night, for I saw 'Schatzchen.'" Of course they were not the stuff to be deterred by such warnings, but they became so at last. That they did, and were so terrified, so thoroughly terrified, that the day after one of my visions not a single member of the troop would venture on a hazardous feat of any kind; and if we performed at all, it was only some commonplace exercises, with few risks and no daring exploits whatever. Worn out with evil fortune, crushed and almost broken-hearted, I struggled on for years, secretly determining, if ever I should chance upon him, to buy back "Schätzchen" with my last penny in the world. Indeed, there were moments in which such was the intense excitement of my mind, I could have committed a dreadful crime to regain possession of him. We were on the eve of embarking for Ostend the other night, when I saw you riding on the strand, and I came ashore at once to track you out, for I knew him, though fully half a mile away. None of my comrades could guess what detained me, nor understand why I asked each of them in turn to lend me whatever money he could spare. It was in this way I made up the little purse you see. It was thus provided that I dared to present myself to-day before you.'

"As he gave me this narrative his manner grew more eager and excited as he went on, and I could not help feeling that his mind, from the long-continued pressure of one thought, had received a serious shock. It was exactly one of those cases which physicians describe as leaving the intellect unimpaired while the faculties are under the thralldom of a dominant and all-pervading impression. I saw this more palpably, when, having declined to accept more than his original offer of fifty pounds, I replaced the remainder in his hand, he evinced scarcely any gratitude for my liberality, so totally was he engrossed by the idea that the horse was now his own, and that Fortune would no longer have any pretext for using him so severely as before.

"'I don't know—I can not know,' said he, 'if Fortune mean to deal more kindly by me than heretofore, but I feel a sort of confidence in the future now; I have a kind of trustful courage as to what may come, that tells me no disaster will deter me, no mishap cast me down.'

"These were his words as he arose to take his leave. Of his meeting with the pony I am afraid to trust myself to speak. It was such an overflow of affection as one might witness from a long absence when on being once again restored to his own. I can not say that the beast knew him, nor would I go so far as to assert that he did not, for certainly some of his old instincts seemed gradually to revive within him on hearing certain words; and when ordered to take a graceful farewell of me, the pony planted a foreleg on each of his master's shoulders, and, taking off his hat with his teeth, bowed twice or thrice in the most deferential fashion to me. I wished them both every success in life, and we parted. As I took my evening's stroll on the pier I saw them embark for Ostend, the pony sheeted most carefully, and every imaginable precaution taken to insure him against cold. The man himself was poor clad and indifferently provided against the accidents of the voyage. As he appeared to feel that the disparity required a word of apology, for he said, in a whisper: 'I'll soon furnish me with a warm cloak; it'll not leave me long in difficulties!' I assure you, my dear Crofton, there was something contagious in the poor fellow's superstition, for, as he sailed away, the thought lay heavily on my heart, 'What if I, too, should have parted with my good luck in life?' How if I have bartered my fortune for a few pieces of money?' The longer I dwelt on this theme the more forcibly did it strike me. My original possession of the animal was accomplished in a way that aided the illusion. It was thus I won him on a hit of backgammon!'

As I read thus far, the paper dropped from my hands, my head reeled, and in a faint dreamy state, as if dragged by some strong narcotic, I sank, I know not how long, unconscious. The first thing which met my eyes on awakening, was the line, "I won him on a hit of backgammon!" The whole story was at once before me. It was of Blondel I was reading! Blondel was the beast whose influence had swayed one man's destiny. So long as he owned him, he world went well and happily with him; all prospered and succeeded. It was a charm like the old lamp of Aladdin. And this was the treasure I had lost. So far from imputing an ignorant superstition to the German, I conceived in every speculation, every theory of his invention. The man had evidently discovered one of those curious problems in what we rashly call the doctrine of chances. It was not the animal himself that secured good fortune, it was that, in his "circumstances," what Strauff calls "die unringende Begebenheiten" of his lot, this creature was sure to call forth efforts and develop resources in his possessor, of which, without his aid, he would have gone all through life unconscious.

Thewvolgar notion that our lives are the sport of accident—the minute too early or too late—the calm that detained us—the snow-storm that blocked the road—the chance meeting with this or that man, which we lay such stress on—what are they in reality but trivial incidents without force or effect, save as they impel to action? They call out certain qualities in our nature by which our whole character become modified. Your horse balks at a fence and throws you over his head; the fall is not a very grave one, and you can scarcely hurt; you have fallen into a turnip-field, and the honest fellow who is hoeing away near comes kindly to your aid, and, in good Samaritan fashion, bathes your temples and restores you. When you leave him at last, you go forth with a kindlier notion of human nature; you recognize that tie "that makes the world akin," and you seem to think that had toil hardened not the heart, nor a life of drudge shuts out generous sympathies—the lesson is a life one. But suppose that in your fall you alight on a bed of choice tulips, your descent is made of a rich parterre of starry anemones, and that your first conscious struggles are met with words of anger and reproach, instead of sorrow for your suffering; you hear accusations on your horsemanship, and insults on your riding. No sympathy, no kindness, no generous anxiety for your safety, but all that can irritate and offend. More thought, in fact, for the prize-bed of a flower than for the ligaments of your knee. There, too, is the lesson—a life one—and its fruits will be bitter memories for many a year. The events of our existence are in reality nothing, save in our treatment of them. By Blondel did I recognize one of those suggestive characters which mould fate by moulding temperament. The duty-spirit of German saw this: I can see there he knew that in that animal was typified all that his life might become. Why should not I contest the point with him? Blondel was charged with another destiny as well as his.

I turned once more to the letter, but I could not bear to read it, so many were the impertinent allusions to myself, my manner, my appearance, and my conversation. Most were insulting were the speculations as to what class or condition I belonged to. "He puzzled us completely," wrote one, "for while unmistakably a gar in many things, there were certain indications of reading and education about him that refuted the notion of his being what Kildrum thought—an escaped counter-jumper! The Guardsman insisted he was a valet: my own impression was, the fellow had kept a first-class cleaning library, and gone mad with the three-volume novels. At all events, I gave him a gruel him a lesson which, whether profitable or not to him, has turned out tolerably well for me. If ever you choose to hear of fellow—his name is Podder or Fedder, I think—pray let me know, for my curiosity is still unslaked about him." He thence went off to a sort of running commentalogue of my sign and token, so positively insulting that I can not recall it; the whole winding up—"I'll bet a trifle that the fellow is a deputy of tone, with a lisp and a Dublin accent, and you can scarcely mistake him." Verd I say, benevolent reader, that fouler calumnies were never uttered, nor more unfounded slanders ever ventured?

It is not in this age of photography that a man need defend his appearance. By the aid of sun and collodion I may perhaps convince you that I am not so devoid of personal graces as this foulmouthed priest would persuade you. I am, possibly, in this pledge, exceeding the exact limit to which this publication may enable me to sustain. I may be contrasting an engagement which can not be, consistent with its principles, fulfilled. If so, I must be your artist; but I swear to you that I shall not flatter. Potts painted by himself, shall be a true portrait. Meanwhile, I have time to look out for my canvas, and you will be patient enough to wait till it be filled.

Again to this confounded letter:

"There is another reason," wrote he, "why I should like to chance upon this fellow." ("This fellow' meant me.) "I used to fancy myself somewhat in the imaginative department of conversation, by the vulgar called lying. Here, I own, with some shame, he was my match. A more fearless, determined, good-natured liar, I never met. Now, as one who deems himself no small proficient in the art, I would really like to meet him once more. We could compare with each other like the sagurs of old, and agree to be candid and free-spoken together, exchanging our ideas on this great topic, and frankly communicating any secret knowledge each might deem that he possessed. I do not, however, wish to pass an evening with him alone, to hear from his own lips the sort of early training and discipline his mind went through, who was his first instructors, what his original inducements. Of one thing I feel certain: a man thus constituted has only to put the curb upon his faculty to be most successful in life, his perils will all lie in the exuberance of his resources: let him simply bend himself to believe in some of the impositions he would force upon others. Let him give his delusions the force acquired by convictions, and there is no limit to what he may become. Be on the look-out, therefore, for him, as a great psychological phenomenon, then once more call on me."

"Your sincerely attached friend,

"THOMAS DARCY DUFF."

"P.S. I have just remembered his name. It was Potts: the villain said from the Pozzo di Borgo family. I'm sure with this hint you can't fail to run him to earth; and I entreat of you spare no pains to do it."

There followed here some more impertinent personalities as clews to my discovery, which my indignation will generously excuse me to let I do not stop to record; enough to say they were as unfounded as they were scurrilous.

Another and very different train of thought, however, soon banished these considerations. This letter had been given me by Crofton, who had already read it; he had perused all its insolent narrative about me before handing it to me, and, doubtless, in so doing, had no other intention than to convey, in the briefest and most emphatic way, to me that I was found out. It was simply saying, in the strongest possible space, "Thou art the man!" Oh, the ineffable shame and misery of that thought! Oh, the bitterness of feeling by my companion should now be viewed and pursued at once!

"Only think, Mary," I fancied I heard him say—only think who our friend should turn out to be—this same Potts: the fellow that vanquished Father Dyke in extempore lying, and outlied the priest! And here we have been lavishing kindness and attentions upon one who, after all, is little better than a pickpocket, who, under false colors and fictitious credentials; for who can now credit one syllable about his having written those verses he read for us, or proposed that tale of which he told us the opening? What a lesson in future about extending confidence to utter strangers! What caution and reserve should it not teach us! How guarded, all should be be not to suffer ourselves to be fascinated by the captivations of manner and the insinuating charms of address! If Potts had been plain, prepossessing, unpretending, ungifted and agreeable—if, instead of being a consummate man of the world, with the breeding of a courtier and the knowledge of a scholar, he had been a pedantic puppy with a lisp and a Dublin accent—" Oh, ignominy and disgrace! these were the very features of the priest in describing me, which came so aptly to my memory; and I grew furious with myself as I recalled them. I next became angry. Was this conduct of Crofton's delicate or considerate? Was it becoming in a friend that treated me as his friend thus abruptly to conclude our intimacy by an insult? Handing me such a letter was saying, "There's a pariah, can you say any one it resembles?" How much more generous had he said, "Here's one all about this wager of yours with Father Dyke—he'd like to hear your account of it, for old Tom is not a bit more veracious of late years"—the most merely-mouthed of commentators. Just give me your version of the incident, Potts, and I am satisfied it will be true to the letter." This is what he might, that's what he ought to have said. I can swear it is what I, Potts, would have done for him, or by any other considerate and respectful manners and pleasing qualities had won my esteem and confidential regard. I'd have said, "Potts, I have seen enough of life to know how unjust it is to measure men by one and the same standard. The noble, unconscious nature can not be ranked with the cold and calculating spirit. The imaginative man has the same necessity for the development of his creature faculty as the strongly muscular man of bodily exercise. He must blow off the steam of his invention or he bursts. You are certain to Von and Le Sage and Alexandre Dumas are a category. You are not the Clerks of a Census Commission, or Masters in Equity. You are the chartered libertines of fiction. Shake out your reefs and go free—free as the winds that waft you!"

To all these reflections came the last one. I must be up and doing, and that speedily. I will recover Blondel, if I devote my life to the task. I will regain him, let the cost be what it may. Blondel upon that occasion, I will ride up to the Rosary; the time shall be evening; a sun just sank behind the trees shall have left in the upper atmosphere a golden and rosy light, which shall tip his mane with a softened lustre, and shed over my eye-vision a rich Titian-like tint. "I come,' will I say, 'to vindicate the fair fame of one who once owned your affection. It is Potts, the man of mystery, the child of enthusiasm, who now presents himself before you. Poor, if you like to call him so, in sordid rank or skill, poor in possessions, but rich, boundlessly rich, in the stores of an ideal wealth. Blondel and I are the embodiment of two ideas. These fancies you have characterized as lies are but the plot bulloons by which great minds calculate the current in the upper air they are about to soar in.'"

And, last of all, there was a sophistry that possessed a great charm for my mind, in this wise: to enable a man humble as myself to reach that station in which a career of adventure should open before him, I thought must be won, some position gained. That I assume to be something that I am not, is simply to say that I trade upon credit. If my future transactions be all honorable and trust-worthy—if by a friend, only known to my own heart, I assume that eminence from which I can distribute benefits to hundreds—who is to stigmatize me as a fraudulent trader?

Is it not a well-known fact that many of those now acknowledged as the wealthiest of men, might, in some time of their early lives, have been declared insolvent had the real state of their affairs been known? The world, however, had given them confidence, and time did the rest. Let the same world be but as generous to myself, I say, and the success may say is confidently and boldly—the day will come when I can "show my books," and "point to my balance sheet." When Archimedes asked for a base on which to rest his lever, he merely uttered the great truth that some one fixed point is essential to the success of a motive power.

It is by our use or abuse of opportunity we are either good or bad men. The physician is not less conversant with noxious drugs than the poisoner; the difference lies in the fact that the one employs his skill to the destruction, the other, to work out evil and destruction. If I, therefore, but make some feigned station in life the ground-work from which I can become the benefactor of my fellow-men, I shall be good and blameless. My heart tells me how well and how fairly I mean by the world; I would succor the weak, console the afflicted, and lift up the oppressed; and if to carry out grand and glorious conceptions of this kind all that is needed is a certain self-delusion which may extend its influence to others, "God is," I say, "Potts; be all that your fancy suggests."

Dives, bonaparte, polecier, rex decisque regum—be rich, honored, and fair, a prince or a beggar—but, above all, never distrust your destiny or doubt your star."

TWO LOVE STORIES.

I.

LAURA LESLIE has a lover;
She is lovely, loving and fair;
The summer birds that sing above her
Scarcely are so blithe as she.

Happy days! when she awakens,
Flowers from him are by her bed;
Every lonely hour she reckons
Brings a gift in Harry's stead.

Every sunset, through the flowers,
Laura and her lover stray,
Careless of the idling hours
Heedless of the waning day.

Laura's parents watch, admiring
Love so tender, so complete;
While a little orphan hireling
Flies her needle at their feet.

What should now delay the marriage?
Every comfort they prepare;
House and gardens, horses, carriage,
Fall to Laura Leslie's share.

Soon, upon a summer morning,
Mary stands by Laura's side,
Little orphan hands adorning
Harry's young and happy bride.

II.

Orphan Mary has a lover;
Miles away from her is he;
The wintry clouds that hang above her
Scarcely are so sad as she.

Every morning when she wakens,
Prays she for her absent John;
On a knotted stick she reckons
Every lonely day that's gone.

Twice a year he leaves his labor,
Walks across the country wide,
And waits for Mary in an arbor,
By the Leslies' garden-side.

First, when she had seen him weary,
Worn and wasted by the heat,
Simple-hearted orphan Mary
Ask'd him in to take a seat.

Twenty little minutes, stolen
From her working, fled away;
Then she rose, with eyelids swollen:
Laura rang; she must not stay.

Mary gave one kiss at parting,
Turn'd, and lo, across the hall,
Angry looks at her were darting;
Angry eyes had seen it all.

Laura's parents watch'd regreting
Time so shamefully misspent:
What example she was setting
To the whole establishment!

Mary blushed and stood convicted;
Often had she heard it said
Followers were interdicted;
Wherefore had she disobey'd?

What though John was true and loving?
What though he was all to her?
In the sphere where she was moving
He was but "a follower."

Twice a year, now, orphan Mary
Waits till every servant sleeps;
Then, with footsteps slow and weary,
To the lonely arbor creeps.

There, or nowhere, she must meet him;
Ere the morning, he must go;
There, unseen, her kiss may greet him;
There, unchid, her tears may flow.

Thus, an angry witness dreading,
Mary thinks her love her shame:
Should it never end in wedding,
Who shall bear the bitter blame?

The People's Great Book.

Everybody's Lawyer
AND
Counsellor in Business.
BY FRANK CROSBY,
OF THE PHILADELPHIA BAR.

70,000 Purchasers. Endorsed by 70,000.

IT IS COMPREHENSIVE, and treats of almost any business, profession, or pursuit in life. It is entirely reliable, and easily understood, and, although but a few months issued from the press, has received the unqualified approval of upwards of SEVENTY THOUSAND purchasers, who, one and all, pronounce it to be the best work of the kind ever published.

Everybody's Lawyer
AND
Counsellor in Business.
BY FRANK CROSBY,
OF THE PHILADELPHIA BAR.

70,000 Purchasers. Endorsed by 70,000.

THE PRESS everywhere unite in recommending the work for its practical every-day usefulness and rich value to everybody. They say it contains information that can nowhere else be procured in so useful a form, while the price is sufficiently cheap, in all conscience, for an amount of law, that may prove a source of trouble for a lifetime. They advise Everybody to buy it.

Everybody's Lawyer
AND
Counsellor in Business.
BY FRANK CROSBY,
OF THE PHILADELPHIA BAR.

70,000 Purchasers. Endorsed by 70,000.

IT CONTAINS forms adapted to sell by, for every possible business contingency, accompanied by plain and simple instructions for their use, together with the Laws of all the States, for Collection of Debts, Insolvency, Proverty, Exemption from Execution, Statutes of Limitation, Landlord and Tenant, Master and Apprentice, Guardian and Ward, Mechanics' Liens, Preserving of Patents and Inventions, Rights of Married Women, Dower, Divorce, Execution of Bonds and Mortgages, Wills, &c., &c.

Everybody's Lawyer
AND
Counsellor in Business.
BY FRANK CROSBY,
OF THE PHILADELPHIA BAR.

70,000 Purchasers. Endorsed by 70,000.

BE SURE and get the genuine book, published only by John E. Potter, Philadelphia. Old and imperfect works of a similar name, but much inferior character, have been issued upon the public in place of ours, and much dissatisfaction has been caused thereby. Give strict orders for Frank Crosby's book, and refuse all others, if you wish to better, and supply direct to the publisher. You will then get the only correct Law and Form Book that is equally adapted to all the States, and universally popular.

Everybody's Lawyer
AND
Counsellor in Business.
BY FRANK CROSBY,
OF THE PHILADELPHIA BAR.

70,000 Purchasers. Endorsed by 70,000.

AGENTS everywhere have found this the quickest selling work ever issued. Everybody buys it, and the better it is known, the greater the demand for it. It is the most salable money-fost, and give satisfaction to their customers, should send for terms of this and other popular works of ours, known as the "PEOPLE'S BOOKS."

Everybody's Lawyer should be in every household to any address, postage paid, on receipt of $1, or in low style, $1.75. Address, as above,

Fellow of the Royal College of Physicians and Licentiate of the Royal College of Surgeons, Edinburgh.

AMERICAN EDITION.

REVISED AND RE-WRITTEN AND ADAPTED TO THE UNITED STATES.

One Vol. 8vo, 500 pages. Price, $3 00.

This volume has been pronounced, by leading physicians and the press throughout the country, as the best medical work for family use. It presents in simple language, a clear and concise view of the nature, causes, and symptoms of disease, and the most approved, safe, and effective modes of treatment, in all directions concerning diet, nursing, and the mother and child. Also, the preservation of health, as well as the management of the sick room, and the preparation of food and drink for the sick. The directions for cases of accident and poisoning, Asphyxia, Poisoning, Drowning, Burns, Convulsions, &c., are worth many times the price of the book. The department relating to the Lying-in-Room and Nursery contains information important to every mother.

THE TWO SICK MEN.

POPE.—"They have sent you my Wrench Doctor, I see. His Course of Steel hasn't done my System much Good."

THE TWO SICK MEN.

In Europe two sick men do dwell,
Of whom none's little hope;
The SULTAN one: as far from well
The other is the POPE.
This wreck a triple crown, and that
A Royal forlorn weare;
Two wrak the head in either hat
To manage its affairs.

The first has been a sufferer sad
For many a weary day;
And leads of physic he has had
To keep grim Death at bay.
The second 'gan to limp and reel
Some dozen years ago,
When his French doctor threw in steel
Maintained his system so.

Eruptions, here and there, about
Each leper's surface rage;
And either is well nigh worn out
By frequent hemorrhage.

Yet their physician still declares
That both must more be bled,
And take more steel, by which he swears,
Exhibited with lead.

The POPE cries, "Heathen friend, I see
You've got my doctor too;
He hasn't done much good to me,
May he do more to you!"
"My Grocer," the groaning TURK replies,
"We're past physician's skill;
To cure us if your doctor tries
He'll all the sooner kill."

Gone are both systems to decay.
Effete old POPE and TURK!
No Constitution left have they
Whereon the Leech might work.
Could they but break up quietly,
And leave the world in peace,
Blest would the dissolution be,
And happy the release.

The New American Watch.

IN ORDER TO MEET THE REQUIREMENTS OF gentlemen who prefer a thinner watch than those usually made by us, we have lately issued a new style of watch on the three-quarter plate model, especially designed for this purpose.

In establishing this new series, it has also been our design to produce a watch in every way superior to the best and highest priced products of the most reputable of English and Swiss watch manufacturers; and no labor or expense has been spared to this end.

In all respects of fine and durable material, of external and internal finish, of accurate compensation and adjustment, of mathematically just proportions, and of practical results, our new three-quarter plate watch challenges comparison with any in the world.

"DARK GORDON IS STANDING BEFORE THE FAIR!"—[BY MILLAIS.]

DARK GORDON'S BRIDE.

YOUNG Helen has heard the fatal order,
Her English lover must banished be,
For Gordon, Chief on the Scottish border,
Comes hither to bend the wooer's knee.

She wildly vows to the heaven's above her
She'll wed young Nevill, whate'er betide;
But her father has banish'd her landless lover,
And the haughty chieftain claims his bride.

In after-days they have met: far better
That parted lovers should meet no more,
When one is bound by that golden fetter,
With the love still warm at each true heart's core.

So sadly he touch'd her lily finger,
Weeping she look'd on her ring of gold:
Ah, fatal thus by his side to linger!
Fatal to sigh for the days of old!

"I saw thee kneeling before the altar,
My haughty rival was by thy side,
But I could not hear thy dear voice falter
When vowing to be his faithful bride!"

"What, Nevill! canst thou be cruel-hearted?
A father's blessing I could not win,
Unless we two for aye were parted—
But, oh, I have wept for that deadly sin!

"Vowing to honor, I scorned and hated,
Dreaming on all I had loved and lost,
But, ah! more bitter, more darkly fated,
That ever again our paths have cross'd!"

She felt the clasp of his hand so tender,
One kiss he press'd on her cheek so fair—
Hark to that curse! May Heaven defend her!
Dark Gordon is standing before the pair!

Proudly he lifted his Scottish bonnet,
Oh, but his smile was dark to see:
"What ho! Sir Nevill, my life upon it,
Thou comest to win my bride from me!"

Now foot to foot, as the sun was sinking,
Both lover and husband frowning stood,
The fiery chieftain's blade is drinking
The brave young Nevill's knightly blood.

She tore the ring from her lily finger,
With, "Nevill, beloved, I come to thee!
In the Gordon's halls no more I linger
If this weak hand can set me free!"

She pluck'd the dirk from her bleeding lover,
She buried it deep in her breast so white—
With, "Nevill, beloved, our woes are over!—
To the Gordon's thrall a glad good-night!"

The chief look'd down on the hapless lovers—
Oh, but his frown was dark to see:
"I would give the best of my lands, proud Nevill,
To hold the heart thou hast lured from me!"

He knelt him down as her life was ebbing,
On the trampled heather he bent the knee:
"I would pluck the heart from my breast, false Ellen,
For one soft smile of love from thee!"

THE KING OF NAPLES.

We publish herewith a portrait of Francis the Second, who at the time we write is believed to be still King of Naples. We hasten to place his portrait on record, as it is evident that in a very short time his reign will have ended.

There is very little to be said about him. He is quite young; during his father's lifetime he was kept away from the court and political life, was watched by spies and nursed by Jesuits. The treatment seems to have pleased him. When he ascended the throne of Naples, about a year and a half ago, he gathered the Jesuits round him and still further augmented their privileges and power; he likewise increased his army of spies. Like his father, when Palermo revolted, he bombarded the city, causing incalculable misery and bloodshed; when his officers failed to bombard Messina, he dismissed them in disgrace. Like his father, when he saw that the game of brutal tyranny was over, he tried conciliation and meditated treachery; issued a constitution, and took oaths about as complete and as little calculated to be binding as those to which his father swore in March, 1848. Let us hope that his people will not trust him as they trusted the father; but that the work now begun will go on until the Bourbon dynasty in Naples is a thing of the past.

We subjoin a brief memorandum of the father's oath and its performance, in order that people may judge what might be expected of the son:

On the 10th of February, 1848, Ferdinand II., being in much the same kind of position as his son at the present moment, took a right Royal oath. Ferdinand II., being by the grace of God King of the Two Sicilies, of Jerusalem, and many other places, in the first place swore very heavily to defend the Catholic, Apostolic, Roman Religion—and, so far, no doubt he was sincere. He then went on with the swearing, as thus: "I promise and swear to observe, and cause to be inviolably observed, the constitution of this Monarchy, promulgated and irrevocably sanctioned by me on the 10th day of February, 1848, for the same kingdom. I promise and swear to observe, and cause to be observed, all the laws actually in force, and the others which shall be successively sanctioned within the limits of the said constitution of the kingdom. I promise and swear never to do, nor to attempt, any thing against the Constitution, and the laws which have been sanctioned, as well for the property as the persons of our most loving subjects. So may God help me, and preserve me in His holy keeping!" This is pretty hard swearing; the guarantee of the 10th of May were the commentators upon the Royal oath.

We are speaking of only twelve years ago. Those matters are fresh in the recollection of the Neapolitan people. Trust to the word of a Neapolitan king! Why, upon the 24th of May, when he had blown a good number of his subjects off the face of the earth, and further by poverty was quite soothed, Ferdinand II., of blessed memory, published another proclamation, in which he declared it to be his fixed resolution "to maintain the constitution of the 10th of May pure and unstained by any kind of excess, which, being the only one compatible with the real and present wants of this part of Italy, will be the Holy Ark upon which the destinies of our most beloved people and our crown must repose." After this preliminary falsehood, Ferdinand II., in an unctuous, paternal kind of fashion, tells his subjects to resume their usual occupations; "to trust with effusion of mind to our loyalty, our religion, and our holy and spontaneous oath; and live in the fullest assurance, etc., etc., etc." The good King wanted to catch his loving subjects, and he caught them. In 1851, when Mr. Gladstone visited Naples, there were still between 15,000 and 20,000 state prisoners in the Two Sicilies, although a good number had been worked off in the interval. Settembrini and the other leading prisoners of the time have left an account of what these prisons were; and how they were dragged through the streets by the hair of their heads, bound, spat upon, plundered for days together, and made to sit in chairs in the presence of soldiers, who told them they had orders to shoot them. Settembrini, after being sentenced to death, was confined in a room fifteen feet square with eight other persons—one of them a notorious assassin. Poerio, with fifteen others, was shut up in a small room, where they were chained two and two together.

It is well to remember these things at the present time, when there seems a probability that the Neapolitans may be able to rid themselves of a family, where the son is like the father—and this is what the father did.

FRANCESCO II., THE KING OF NAPLES.

ON BOARD THE STEAMER.

SEPTEMBER winds are soft and warm,
September nights are clear;
The weird moon flies in haste to greet
The autumn of the year.
Her beams are wrestling with the waves
On Michigan's broad lake—
They struggle, faint, and fall away
In many a silver flake.

Our steamer, gay with waving flags,
And banners rich and rare,
Swept proudly from Chicago's wharves,
While music rent the air.
Out to the lake, with mirth and song,
Went many score of souls;
Along the line of laughing waves
The jovial breeze rolls.

The moonlight fell in shimmering streams
Adown our steamer's deck,
And glanced on many a nodding plume,
And many a snow-white neck.
Quick feet were moving in the dance
To music's liveliest strain,
While whispering lovers breathed their tales
Of old love's ev'ngain.

'Twas long beyond the midnight hour,
And white sails flitted by;
While still the music, laugh, and song
Went ringing to the sky;
Till one white, ghost-like, hurrying craft
Swept on with wind and tide,
Crashed, reckless of our warning, through
The gallant steamer's side.

I've read in some old fairy tale
Of cities vast and lone,
Where every living, moving thing
Turned suddenly to stone.
And so, that instant with the crash,
All life seemed hushed in death,
And stony forms stood staring pale
With horror-chilled breath.

The heavy surging of the sea,
The rushing of the steam,
Was heard instead of green or prayer,
Of shriek or of scream.
And then, as though the silence waked
The stony-footed crowd,
Our decks were wild with pallid forms,
That wept and sobbed aloud.

O God! it was a fearful time—
Short time for thought or prayer—
When every score of deathly cries
Rang out upon the air.
North, east, south, west, they strained their eyes
Along the moonlit waves;
Then, hopeless, knelt in stolid fear
Above their waiting graves.

Then how they clung in shivering groups,
As pitched our steamer through
The deep trough of the silent sea,
So deep and dark and blue!
Then how they held their shrieking breaths
With every passing toll,
And each poor, shrinking, stricken wretch,
Feared him his utmost soul!

I would not for the wealth of worlds
See such a sight again,
Lest all the horror of that night
Should burn into my brain.
To stand, with neither hand nor call
Within my straining eye,
And see some twenty score in life
Preparing them to die.

So soon the minutes fled away
They seemed seemed to be,
Before our ship and living freight
Went down beneath the sea.
Down, down, fell forty fathom deep,
With quiet upon my tongue,
My hope a shred of splintered spar,
To which I madly clung.

The next I knew the moon shone down
Upon a shipless sea,
Where scores and scores of drowning men
Called hopelessly to me.
The wind blew fresh toward the shore,
And curled the silver wave;
The wind that wafted me to life
Lapped many a deep-sea grave.

I stood alone upon the beach,
As broke the morning's gray,
And watched with frozen heart the specks
That floated far away;
And while I prayed for those afar,
Beneath God's awful frown,
I prayed that I should never see
Another ship go down.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 22, 1860.

THE SLAUGHTER ON LAKE MICHIGAN.

ON the night of Friday, 7th instant, on Lake Michigan, off Winnetka, the steamer Lady Elgin, with about 350 human beings on board, was run into by the schooner Augusta, and sunk, with over 300 of her living freight. The news appalls by its suddenness and the enormous sacrifice of life. Among those who perished were some of the best men of Milwaukee and other Western cities, and a gentleman who had long appeared from the world of letters and art—Herbert Ingram, the proprietor and editor of the London Illustrated News.

When the first shock caused by so appalling a catastrophe has been overcome, and the mind seeks soberly to trace out the details of the accident, horror gives way to amazement and indignation.

At the time of the collision the Lady Elgin was steaming northward, against the wind, which was blowing very freshly. The Augusta was sailing south by east, under all sail except the gaff topsail. The night was stormy; it was raining, but it was not very dark. The steamer had all her lights set; the schooner had none. Just half an hour before the collision the second mate of the Augusta, whose watch it was, saw the steamer's lights, and watched them. Ten minutes afterward he called the captain, who went forward, examined the steamer's lights, but gave no order. Thus these two vessels rapidly rushed toward each other and to destruction, the crew of the schooner actually gazing for twenty minutes on the vessel which they were about to sink. The steamer's officers were of course unconscious of their danger; though the night was not very dark, it was dark enough to prevent the schooner, without lights, being seen from the deck of the steamer five minutes after the collision. Though the rule is that vessels going northward should pass vessels steering south on the larboard side, the captain of the Augusta seems to have been bent on passing to starboard of the Lady Elgin; and, with the full view of the steamer before him, it was not till within three to five minutes of the collision that he ordered his helm "hard up." Some of the witnesses think that the steamer, instead of obeying her order, put her helm "hard down." The first mate states that the Augusta steered so badly that she could not answer her helm with any short notice. At any rate, the fact is that she did not bring up, as she should have done, but came straight on to the steamer—larboard side—striking her at an angle which is variously stated at 45 to 90 degrees, and knocking a hole in her side which caused her to sink in a very few minutes.

There are, as we gather from the evidence taken before the coroner's inquest, it is hardly necessary to point more directly at the conclusion to which they tend. We have, however, that the Milwaukee jury will do their duty. It is certain that the steamer could not have saved herself; it is equally certain that the collision might have been avoided had the schooner altered her course five, ten, or fifteen minutes sooner, or obeyed the law and passed the steamer on the other side.

It is very important that these circumstances should be duly considered. When a shipwreck takes place we naturally devote our sympathies to the circumstances of life-boats, small boats, life-preservers, and the like, and neglect the great consideration of the original cause of the accident. Experience has never proved that, when a large vessel is lost, boats and life-preservers are seldom of much use. It takes so much time to get ready for the service, and in the excitement of the moment they are so often damaged or swamped, that they generally prove a very sorry reliance. As to life-preservers, the Lady Elgin had plenty of them, yet lost over 300 souls.

The true way to avoid accidents is to insist on better navigation on the part of men who have charge of sea, river, and lake craft. So long as men are allowed to command vessels who will run their lives, and who pay no regard to avoid running into a vessel which they see for half an hour before they strike her, the long list of slaughters by sea and flood can not be considered closed.

PHYSICAL TRAINING.

THE Homeric combat between Heenan and Sayers set all our youth a-dreaming about physical training. We pointed out, at the time, that pugilism was very far from being the best or a good exercise for the body, and that other gymnastic sports were far better calculated to develop the muscles, and promote health and strength. The subject appears hardly to have attracted general attention, and others have come to the same conclusion as ourselves. Dr. Winship, the strong New Englander, who carries a barrel of beef by way of light exercise, lifts half a ton in his hands, has entered the arena as a champion of the dumb-bells. For by mission a day, sports of active dumb-bell exercise, will, in his opinion, make any man strong, and in many cases will cure him of disease.

The subject is well worth study. For years men of thought and experience have united in declaring that physical education was the one thing needed for the American people. They all say that our people are naturally equal to any other on the face of the globe, but that, from neglect of muscular development, the race is deteriorating, especially in the large cities. No one who compares the young men of New York and Boston with those of forty of the same age can deny the truth of the statement.

The remedy is obvious. Dr. Winship says, use the dumb-bells for half an hour a day. Others recommend other physical exercises. Foot-ball, base-ball, cricket, rowing, foot-races, wrestling, all are calculated to produce the end desired. Young men are generally ready enough to devote time to these pursuits. But the difficulty is that neither schoolmasters nor employers give them much countenance. The typical schoolmaster regards athletic games as disorders—to be tolerated during play-hours under cover protest, but by no means to be encouraged. The merchant hears with horror of his clerk devoting time, during business hours, to any thing but the business of the office. All this must be altered if we want to render physical education general and popular.

Schools must encourage bodily as well as mental development. Employers must not grudge half an hour a day for the health of their employés. Fathers must see to it that their children become proficient in such bodily games as require strength and agility. When this is the case, we may almost hope the physical education of our people has begun. But not till then.

THE COMMISSARIAT AT WEST POINT.

WE are gratified to learn that the officer commanding at West Point has acted upon the hints thrown out in this journal a few weeks since, and instituted a thorough investigation of the mess arrangements of the cadets with a view to the reform of the abuses which we pointed out. A few days since our contemporary the World announced that the investigation was in progress; now a correspondent of the Times informs us that the abuses which we pointed out have been cured. We are very glad to hear it; though the evidence of the Times correspondent would have been more valuable had he shown more concern for the cadets, and less zeal for the reputation of the West Point managers. He has allowed himself to be deceived on some minor points. Let us hope, however, that in the main his statements with regard to the food of the cadets under the new régime are correct.

The officers in charge of the West Point Academy have a responsibility which can not be exaggerated. To them are committed the health and future hopes of the flower of the American youth. It is in their power to convert the pupils under their charge into lazy, vigorous, manly, able men—fit compeers for the best scholars of Oxford or Paris or Berlin or Vienna; or into sickly, feeble, distort them intellects, and destroy their hopes of repaying their country for what she has done for them. And though some may consider it almost culpable to take food which would otherwise go to the hogs and eggs, and butter, and hash, in preference to such sublime topics as military engineering, and conic sections, and the Spanish language, we can answer for it that the one is as important as the other, and that boys who are bodily fed will never become expert scholars. It is an easy to destroy a boy's future usefulness by feeding him badly as by teaching him badly. Let the West Point managers remember this, and let us hear no more about rancid butter, stale fish, and objectionable hash.

THE LOUNGER.

THE WEEK.

IT has been a week of unusual interest. The Prince of Wales has been making many a courtesy difficulty among the Orangemen in Canada, which is very fortunate when we remember that quarrels are so scarce and unfrequent among princes. It is pleasant to observe the British pluck of the Duke of Newcastle when the mob threatened him with the Queen's name. As they were walking along the city. The sergeant of police offered to protect them, but the Duke told him to go away, that he was not afraid of mobs. There was something of the hauteur of the old French marquis in the act, but country gentleman of Yorkshiman, it meant pluck. Mr. Jenkins, the court historiographer, describes the Toronto celebration as the occasion at which the assembled people of the kind the world has ever witnessed—or was it only this continent? Mr. Jenkins evinces a solidarity of during the statement, for he would seem to have used up the brightest pigments upon his pallet in a single sketch. But as hope is ever a hardy annual upon conscious fertility of superlatives, and believe—as the Lounger for one firmly does—that he will be entirely equal to our own great bull.

MR. HOWE has secured a renewal of his patent. As he confesses to the receipt of half a million of dollars already, it is fair to presume that he has been amply paid. But such an instance would not should be allowed him for his invention does not appear. A patent right is simply a premium upon invention granted by law. Society surrenders claims to be the judges of its value, with a due regard to the interests of all. It has not a perpetual and inherent real claim upon a favor; and when he has been profusely paid for his commodity, whatever it may be, he has no right to look injured because he is not overpaid. In this particular case the tax falls upon the most laborious class—that of women-sewers, and public sympathy is therefore the more interested. Of course nobody is surprised that a person in the receipt of a fortune, monthly, from the labors of others, is very perpetual in his claims. Of course every body would be surprised if a man worth a million were not anxious to be worth two millions. Certainly nothing could so surprise Christendom as a little practical Christianity, and an acknowledgment that we have not a right to all we can get.

THE loss of the Lady Elgin is one of those frightful disasters which have become periodical. "The Wreck of the Pacific" is being rapidly overtaken. When a few months elapse without some terrible accident the public mind becomes apprehensive, like a sensitive person in a time of sultry weather. He is looking for the thunder-burst, and feels it in the air. So the public mind involuntarily prophesies misfortune when accidents are rare. There is no satisfactory explanation of the collision upon Lake Michigan. It is questionable with the whole country is interested, and will be brought to trial by a suit of the owners of the Lady Elgin against the schooner Augusta. With ordinary care, and, except in unusual circumstances, a collision should be impossible. In ninety-nine cases out of the hundred it is, no doubt as on Lake, the consequence of carelessness. How many people in carriages on every year run over at railroad crossings by the trains; and how many of them are due to a dead halt and listen carefully for any sound of the cars? How often, on the other hand, do the train dashes across lonely country roads without a sound from the bell or whistle! Our legislation which looks to the preservation of life is fragmentary and inadequate. Government is bound to regard, first of all, and in every detail, the protection of the inalienable rights of every man—life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. It is not necessary that there should be a railroad between New York and Philadelphia, for instance, until every possible precaution is taken for safety. If it can not pay with these precautions, it should be prohibited from paying without them. Let us hope that the new President of the Illinois Central will distinguish himself by his policy of absolute safety to his workers, and then if there be any thing left for the stockholders, so much the better for them.

AMONG the victims of the Lady Elgin was Herbert Ingram, the proprietor of the Illustrated London News—the great pioneer of the illustrated press. Harper's Weekly, in common with the others, offers a natural homage to his memory, and that the literary summary and comments upon current life are valuable and interesting. The price of the paper is beyond that which we, in this country, choose to pay for such a periodical, and it is too exclusively for the English way, to be of interest to us. But the project of an illustrated paper, which will be and has been modified to the taste and demands of this country, will be found to be invariably associated with the name of Herbert Ingram.

THE singing birds are trooping back to their perch in Irving Place. The nightingale Patti has been regaled with the full-throated warbles of more than ever. But the audience of September is different from that of January. Wandering Cubans, and Southerners of Southern sympathies, are in force, and lingering in the Western Paradise of fashion and gayety, till the pretty house, and applaud the tender tones. Not the languishing, half-sad, intense reign of a primo tenore! If he be a handsome man, like Mario, and a Count, what can surpass his complacent superiority and kindly notice? How evidently he regards women as a candle contemplates moths! "Yes, pretty insects," he seems to say, "I can not help being bright and beautiful; I can not help singing your poor little wings; and you, O winged nothing! are welcome to hang singed. Fly on, flutterlings, and cheer yourselves in my light! But if you fall, blame not me." So the candle comments on the moth's theory of facial expression, of dramatic probabilities. "I am candle Number One: my business is to shine and singe. Allons! He is not a moth himself: he is always the candle; and, oh woe! when he burns down!

"GENERAM GEORGE" has burned down, and out. Familiar to all the old-fashioned playgoers; the fine gentleman of the old comedy; a player who preserved the traditions of the days of Garrick and Macklin, and departed upon the curtain has fallen, and Barrett is gone! Even those who never saw him upon the stage may remember it still, grave, portly, a little pale, and a little sad-ness pensiveness in his face, walking on Broadway. He was not a great actor, but he was a man of high breeding, who acted strictly to the conventional English school; but neither that school, nor any other theatrical style, has ever succeeded permanently among us: and it was that consciousness, perhaps, which gave him a little feeling of sadness, and fostered the gravity of his aspect. Why is it that there is something so peculiarly sad in the old age and decay of an actor? Time of the most lauding wishes of any in periodicals have been glimpses of the private life of public performers. The Old Playgoer has given us a fair memoir of the Weekly, was one of them. The point seems to lie in the contrast of the actual worthlessness and sorrow of a man or woman who is at the very moment to personate a person of airy gayety and utter content. Is there any thing more piteous than the harlequin in his clown's costume leaping with a light jest out of the arena to hold the head of his dying wife or child? Is there any thing more wretched than Grimaldi's death? Did it not arise from his identification with characters which are passing and unsubstantial, and of no use?

Coodles does not die—but was not Burton Coodles?

THE Great Eastern will be back again before the Presidential election. She made a very short, if not the shortest, passage home to Milford Haven, and leaves upon the 17th October. Her whole career having been a miracle of mismanagement, and a passage through the lesions of nature, and a change of directors—we shall yet see her emerge as a useful and paying enterprise. She is a failure and while she was in New York, and she seems to be manageable and swift. She may yet serve En-glanced at a pinch in the sudden transport of large bodies of troops. If she is to be exhibited here again, however, it would be wise in the consignees to insist that she shall be placed entirely in the hands of native managers. John Bull has not the least comprehension of his cousin. When his Excellency Yankee Doodle dines with Lord Mayor Bull at Guildhall, he puts his hand on his heart and says, "What a land of wine is the common language!" and when Lord Bull, her Majesty's Ambassador at Washington, dines with the St. George's Society in New York, he solemnly and truly says that "Shakespeare be-le-te-le-longs to b-b-b-both the great na-na-na-tions." But a practical knowledge of each other does not belong to the nations.

That ridiculous rascal and gray-eyed man of destiny, Mr. William Walker, has been sent out of Truxillo, by Commodores, by the order of a British commander. Why he is not caught and punished is one of the political mysteries. He is the chartered libertine of the Gulf, and if some of the States which he so absurdly invades—yet not without great suffering to other people—should hang him out of hand, there is nobody who would think him ill-used. Mr. William Walker seems to be amusingly destitute of every quality essential to a leader. He has neither commanding nerve, nor power of attaching men to his fortunes, nor the least military skill, nor the slightest civil capacity. A man of ordinary talent would have represented Nicaragua. But he maintained a short hold there by the basest means, and was then kicked out; and yet Mr. William Walker has just as much claim to consideration and sympathy to-day as he had four or five years ago when large meetings were held in New York to send aid to him. Mr. William Walker in Truxillo is exactly the Mr. William Walker in Granada, in Nicaragua, for whom the present Secretary of State telegraphed his sympathy. Civil war ceased, if the man is not crazy, he is utterly criminal.

The monument to Commodore Perry, of which an illustration was published in the Weekly of September 8, has been inaugurated with as much attention and interest as is ever exerted or expressed in the mid-summer fury of a Presidential canvass. The historian Bancroft was the orator, and his discourse has a most impressive and brilliant close, which should create an era in the history of such occasions. It was very plainly meant for the ability of the Northwest boundary difference with Great Britain, and declares that "the men who honor the memory of the dead will always know how to cherish the domain of their country." To the point of the present political crisis the orator says: "Has any foreign power been so foolish as to listen to the calculation of the tales of impending disunion? . . . Our little domestic strifes are no more than momentary disturbances on the surface, easily settled among ourselves." The whole discourse is distinguished by that serious, ringing rhetoric which marks all Mr. Bancroft's public addresses, with that constant clearness of statement in which such orators are usually accustomed to indulge. The State of Rhode Island was peculiarly interested in the celebration, and honorably represented by the Governor of the State, the Mayor of the Episcopal Diocese, the Mayor of the city of Providence, the Secretary of State, Dr. Usher Parsons, one of the four survivors of the battle, an honored citizen of Providence, and the First Light Infantry Company, composed of representatives men of the same city, and a corps which might be called by a pert and pretty name for the novelty of its metaphors, the Seventh Regiment of the Empire. The State of Rhode Island is a very small State, but there are three names in her history of which her sons are proud: Roger Williams, William Ellery Channing, and Oliver Hazard Perry.

A PRACTICAL POET.

Garibaldi continues his triumphal career, and seems to excite no jealousy. Naples is in his power. The nobility are living upon all sides; and the King has parted up his fine yacht and vessels. A soldier of the National Guard, when the chase was given that the Liberator was at hand, escaped to a French ship. The officers of the Navy declare themselves are apparently only waiting to be quite sure that Garibaldi is the man of the future to offer him their service and service. The general, abhorrant, superstitious dynasty of the Bourbons in Naples has at last rotted out. One of the loveliest regions of the world—one of the finest ports, and sea-ports—graced with all charms of climate, soil, and position—it has been ruled by and supposed until it is even now doubtful whether the hand of the Liberator will be powerful enough to make it safe there.

The King of Sardinia can not much longer withhold his open sympathy from Naples. When a ruler finds a people of Naples so plainly outraged, his crimes as to get ready to run the moment an independent leader lands upon his shores, his governors left stranded by its own flight and panic. Here is a beautiful province of Italy without a regular government. It desires to attach itself to an Italian kingdom, which is regarded as the virtual head of the Italian nation. What Power can seriously interfere? Austria will not dare. France glared does not wish to. France is the ally of Sardinia. Prussia stays at home of late years. Russia will not interfere. There seems to be no reason to doubt that by any steamer we may hear of Garibaldi in Naples, and of the union of Northern and Southern Italy.

There remain, then, only the Pope and Venice. Garibaldi at the head of Italy, with Victor Emanuel, will free Venice. The recognition of nationalities is too strong at this day for Prussia to help Austria retain her. Prussia has no interest that Austria should occupy Venice. Her interest is that Austria should be strong so long as Austria is her natural ally against France. But Austria is strong enough to smite the pope, which must be covered with sulphuric ether and stopped tight to prevent evaporation, "allow it to stand for six days, renewing the ether every forty-eight hours. This substance permeates the pores and dissolves all the oil, but leaves a thin coating of a light-brown color. Next take equal parts of chloroform and water, in which the pipe must remain at least six hours. It is then to be taken out and dried in the sun, and then 'there's not best gift in man,' the ever-soothing nicotiana, will be itself again."

A. S. K. writes: "I have a pipe a pipe may be disordered at the pleasure of the smoker, thereby compelling reverence to him the opportunity of coloring it again.

AFRICAN TRAVEL

It is going hard with the sources of the Nile. They can not hide themselves much longer. Every year the knowledge of them becomes smaller; and before the century is ended the question of ages will doubtless be answered, and the vague, old tradition which Herodotus received from the Egyptians will, turn out to be true.

Of late years Africa has been invaded by travellers upon every side. Dr. Livingstone's book is one of the great book successes of the time, both in its own intrinsic merit and the unusual interest of the subject. Dr. Barth's long work, with its profuse and curious illustrations, has appealed to the same interest, and terms with it in the public attention. Dr. Krapf's is much briefer, but deals with the same regions and people. Richardson, also, who, with Captain Burton, penetrated Eastern Africa from Zanzibar, has written an interesting story of his travels, which was published in Bentley's Miscellany; and now Burton's book, full of entertaining adventure and interesting discovery, is almost ready.

But among all the works of African travel none has more claims upon a wide popular success than the one just issued by Mr. Du Chaillu. Mr. Du Chaillu, the conqueror of the gorilla, whose unique collection was exhibited several months since, in New York, has written a very clever book. He went where white men have never before penetrated. He was a young man when he started upon the report of civilization: and his work will be a treasury of knowledge. His collections and sketches are so unusual that the interest will vivify the story, so that, quietly reclining upon summer sofas, we too shall be African explorers. The old charm of new lands and new men will be shed over the dusky continent, it not yet dissolved. The equator and the pole are the two points of deepest romantic interest to us. The one is the land of the clear light of common knowledge, a charm will run from travel and its story which no genius can restore.

NEW CLIMPSES OF IRVING.

In the Autobiographical Recollections of Leslie the painter, one of the most pleasant gossiping books of literature that has appeared in England, there are several letters and anecdotes of Washington Irving at the time when he was making love to Matilda Hoffman, and afterward. Leslie and Irving mounted the top of an Oxford stagecoach in London and bowled away into the lovely English country. It was a delightful journey, as they left, and the moon was full, and shone upon the reapers in the fields. It was eleven o'clock when they reached Oxford, and the inn was so near how the mind of Irving must have been peculiarly stimulated by the scene!

The next day was a wet Sunday at Oxford. All day the travellers moped in the inn. The following morning Irving was called to breakfast, and found something about a stout gentleman who had come with them from London on Saturday. Irving said it was a capital story, but Leslie, as soon as the coach stopped, and whoever it stopped, had come into Oxford with more vigorously. They stopped at Stratford and elsewhere, while Leslie sketched Irving netted himself upon a stile or a stone, applying to his pencil occasionally, and laughing to himself from time to time, and occasionally reading the manuscript to Leslie. They went to Canterbury, and visited the inn at Dover where they were caught by the weather.

In Irving's letters to Leslie, when they were brilliant effect of his own color. The impression of a wayward genius is produced you scarcely know how. Irving is the same as we have all known him—only younger, full of care for his future, and enjoyment of it, the few letters showing how charming his biography will be.

The Marquis de Favieres, a great wit and a notorious lady paymaster, called on Samuel Bernard, the great financier, one morning, and said: "Sir, I am going to astonish you; I am the Marquis de Favieres; I do not owe a penny, and I come to borrow five hundred louis of you."

"Sir," replied Bernard, "I am going to astonish you yet more; I know you, and yet I am going to lend them to you."

He came, I will find a way to stop for it." Slipping out with the sets were forming, she found room for all, and was soon in the midst of a hand a bar, and threw it out of the window. COLUMBIA MAKING HER TOILET TO RECEIVE THE PRINCE.

ODE TO H. R. H.

On! Albert Edward, many-titled Guelph,
Lord Renfrew, otherwise the Prince of Wales,
Or whatsoever else you call yourself—
Your glorious advent each New Yorker hails;
All other things are laid upon the shelf,
For you nor loyalty nor homage fails—
Of Hanover's illustrious house young scion,
The old, established, genuine British lion!

We stanch republicans do "love a lord,"
And catch the modes of courtly salutation
As readily as any common word
For civil or for military station;
"Sir Robert" or "your Grace" do but accord
With "Captain," "Colonel" of our Yankee nation:
And we can say, without a touch of shyness,
Either "your Lordship" or "your Royal highness."

And so we shall not lack in proper phrase
Wherewith to recognize a prince so great;
For unto one so worthy of all praise
To bow has never been our happy fate—
Monarch at once of all that he surveys,
Expectancy and rote of the fair state—
Though many a royal "party" heretofore
Has glorified Columbia's blessed shore.

Poor Louis Philippe once taught Telemaque
To little Jersey scholars, fille et fils;
Napoleon Trois lived in "a two-pair-back"
In Gotham here, before Savoy and Nice
Had entered his imperial brain, alack!
But then they hadn't half a crown apiece;
And Joinville, pensive, melancholy, slow,
Went through the country just three months ago.

But one who has a title to a throne
Proudest of all—we say it without flattery—
So glad a day New York has never known
As that which lands him safely on the Battery:
Were he but heir presumptive, let us own,
To this inheritance, for such a matter, he
Would find a thousand beauteous creatures willing
To make him heir apparent for a shilling.

Oh sweet young Prince! indeed I mean no harm,
And plead for liberal speech the poet's charter;
As for the fair ones that around you swarm,
Why Honi soit qui mal y pense—the Garter
Is for your modesty a potent charm:
But they will give, just as they ask, no quarter;
And I would kindly warn you that you have a new Peril on every square of the Fifth Avenue.

You are not quite so handsome as your pictures,
Nor as your late grand-uncle, George the Fourth,
On whom Tom Moore and Byron wrote some strictures:
But even photographs may flatter worth
And majesty; and artists thus have tricked yours
In all the Saxon beauty of the North;
But mark the caution this wise rule evinces—
Put not your trust in any prints of Princes.

Still you are young, good-looking—for the rest,
'Tis written that "thou shalt be King hereafter."
(A letter-writer says you're badly dressed,
And that your pantaloons provoke to laughter.)
Then let us in your welcome try our best,
Throw wide from basement to the topmost rafter
Our houses open, and our pockets too,
Which means our hearts, and more we could not do.

Eight gladly for your service might we spare
Twenty palatial mansions all complete,
Gas, water, speaking-tubes, a porte-cochère,
Billiards, and Gobelin carpets, and a suite
Of chambers frescoed with devices rare:
Guido's auroral steeds—they can't be beat,
Save by the pair that in the stable shine,
Which do their mile in just 2.59.

For reasons, some of which do not appear,
Would we thus minister to your delight:
'Twould give the house a princely souvenir
—And two great nations lovingly unite:
And then, you know, our family, next year,
Might come and see you on the Isle of Wight;
Besides, it would be perfectly ridiculous
To lodge you at the Everett or St. Nicholas.

Alas! the cruel Duke rejects our prayer,
And says the Prince of Wales his bills will pay
Like common people; so that now the Mayor
Will have your Royal Highness all the day—
A vile monopoly, we must declare;
And yet the Duke stands, as the lawyers say,
In loco parentis—for mamma, the Queen;
His word is final, and it's "all serene."

But then we'll give you just the finest ball
At the Academy—oh, such a lark!
Show you the firemen and "the Seventh"—all
The thousand objects we can boast of mark,
The "Aqueduct"—so spelled upon the wall.
Do praise the ride along the Central Park—
A public hobby, which much more we dote on
Than engines, soldiers, or the crystal Croton.

Another favor, if I might be bolder,
Of you, O Prince! I humbly would implore—
Don't hit a shoulder-hitter on the shoulder,
And bid him rise Sir Something from the floor;
Don't make a knight of b'hoy or bottle-holder,
Because he is an Alderman, galore!
And why? Indeed, we think the class just cited
Already quite sufficiently benighted.

And now, illustrious Prince, Hail and Farewell!
May all your aims be high, each strong endeavor
Of real majesty and merit tell;
May England prosper 'neath your rule, and never
One jot or tittle of her freedom sell:
You would not have me drink "the Prince forever!"
But I will pledge, what laureates well may sing,
Long flourish Albert Edward, Prince or King!

REV. W. WOOD STAMP.

THE portrait on the following page is that of the newly-elected President of the Wesleyan Methodist Society of England for 1860-'61, the Rev. William Wood Stamp. Mr. Stamp is a native of Bradford, Yorkshire, where his father was for some time a Wesleyan minister: he was born in 1801, and is consequently at the present time 59 years of age. He was educated at Woodhouse Grove School, of which institution his father was at the time principal, and on reaching manhood decided to become a minister. The first scene of his labors was a small room near Lincoln's Inn, London, where, as he humorously describes it, he used to preach to "six old women and a mangle:" but his abilities soon led to his preferment to stations of higher importance. It was soon discovered by the leaders of the British Methodists that Mr. Stamp possessed that rare gift among preachers, business ability and financial tact. The discovery made, Mr. Stamp was employed in various business negotiations where the property of the Church was concerned, and acquitted himself so ably in all of them that his fitness for the high post he now occupies was universally conceded. Mr. Stamp has written some small works; some of his sermons have been published. They are like himself—sound, practical, and logical.

COLUMBIA'S WELCOME.

PRINCE. "To greet the Goddess Liberty I come!"
COLUMBIA. "Welcome, sweet Prince—then make yourself to him."

THE AMERICAN COLLEGE AT ABEIH.

WE publish below a picture of the American College at Abeih, near Dheir-el-Kamar, in the Lebanon; the view also shows the house of the humane Shiek who saved the American missionaries from the Druses. Our countrymen have been some years settled in Lebanon, and have done a great deal of good by educating the children of the Syrians at their College. Children from Dheir-el-Kamar, Beledine, Abeih, and the vicinity, for miles round, enjoyed the benefit of their instruction. So high was the esteem in which they were held, that, when the Druses attacked the place, the Sheik, at considerable personal risk, went to the American College, collected the missionaries together, and escorted them to the sea-shore, from whence they were able to reach Beyrout without difficulty. The scene is one which will possess historic interest.

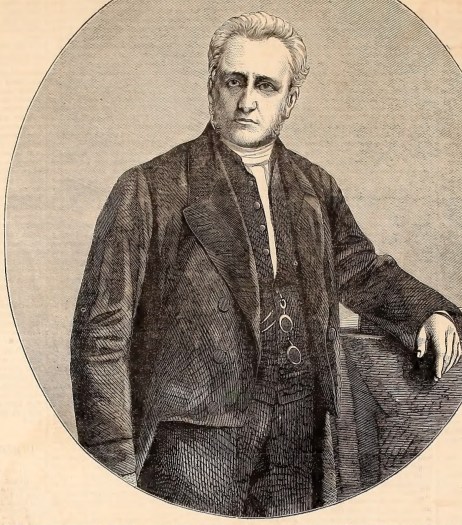
WHALES ASHORE.

ON one occasion a large whale appeared off Weymouth, and was seen by several fishermen. The affair was talked over at night in the public-houses; and one of the company, who happened to have a new seine-net which he had never used, was much taunted about it, and he was dared to go and net his whale with his new net. At first he took it as a joke, but, under the influence of beer and the chaff of his comrades, he struck his hand on the table, and said: "Well,——me, if I don't go and shoot the net after him, catch or no catch!" Accordingly, a sentry was posted, and the next morning the whale was signaled as being in the offing. So the owner of the new seine put it into the boat, and, rowing quietly along, shot the net round the unsuspicious whale. At last, Master Whale put his nose into the net, and feeling something strange, charged against it, dragging men, boats, and all along with him. He then plunged and dived, and, ultimately taking the new seine-net, rolled about his body, right away with him, in spite of all the fishermen could do. They looked after the whale, who had gone off with the net, much as an angler looks into the water when a fine fish has escaped from his hook; but, however, the whale was gone, and the would-be captors rowed home disconsolate and whaleless.

Some three or four days afterward, as a coast-guard was going his rounds in the dead of the night, he saw a huge black mass come rolling in with the tide; it looked like a wreck, yet it was not a wreck, for a wreck has not a tail wherewith to flop the water as the object had. The coast-guardsman waited till the tide turned, and as it went down, he got near to this strange object, which had got hard and fast among the rocks. He then saw that it was a whale, and, what was exceeding strange, the whale had a net entangled round about him in the most complicated manner. "First come, first served," said the coast-guardsman to himself, as he pulled out his knife and cut two great slashes in the whale's fat sides, during which operation the whale kicked and evinced signs of life. The finder then shut up his knife, and posted off with the news. Of course, as there was a net round the whale, his identity was established directly, and the owner of the net claimed the carcass, because his net had caught him; the coast-guardsman claimed it, because he had found him. Meanwhile, when the dispute was still going on, the lord of the manor put in his claim, as it was found between high and low water-mark; gained it, and took possession of the whale: cut him up, and boiled all the oil out of him, getting forty barrels—worth a lot of money—and there the matter ended.

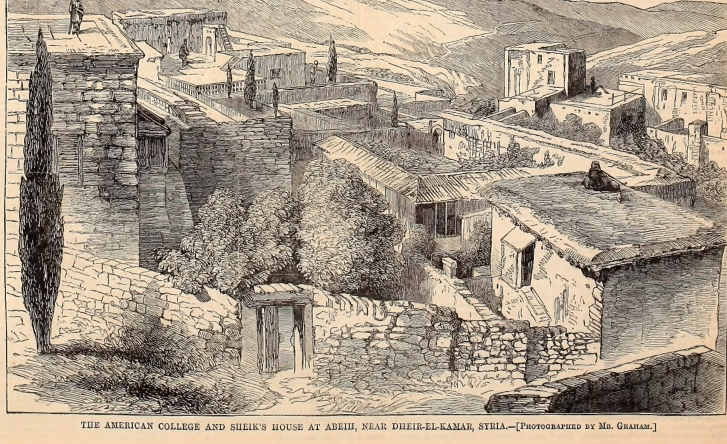
Some weeks afterward, as the coast-guard was sitting on his "donkey"—the term applied to the portable stool used by these men—a respectable-looking gentleman walked up to him, and said: "My man, don't you recollect the whale that you found hereabouts some time since?"

"Yes, Sir," said the man; "it was me as found him."



"Well, now, can't you recollect whether, when you cut him—as they tell me you did—he kicked and wiaced under the knife?"

"In course he did," was the answer; "he nearly knocked the knife out of my hand with his tail."



"Well, then," said the old gentleman, bristling up all of a sudden, "now I am a lawyer, and mind that you tell the same story to-morrow, Sir; for as sure as to-morrow comes you will have to swear that in court."

On the morrow the coast-guardsman swore that the whale was alive when first he saw him on shore, and that he knew it by the knife-test, as stated above. It was now the lord of the manor's turn to sing small, for he could not claim a thing if cast up alive. He had to refund the money he got for the oil, having taken all his trouble for nothing; so that, after all, the owner of the new seine caught his whale, got his new net back, and nearly a hundred pounds besides.

The captain of a French vessel once saw a whale floundering upon a sand-bank at the Nore. He passed by the boat to tell tightly round above his tail, and as the tide rote the whale floated, and he was towed in triumph, as the crew imagined, on his way to Calais harbor. Mistaken Frenchmen! They had not got far before the whale showed symptoms of returning life, by wriggling, twisting, and not following the ship in the orderly manner becoming a dead whale. At length, the dragging through the water, and the pulling at his tail, roused him up completely; he came quite to life, and threatened to damage the ship. The Frenchmen, finding they had caught a Tartar, cut the rope as it passed over the stern of the ship, and away went the whale one way, back again toward the mouth of the Thames, with a great, long, thick rope still tied to his tail and dragging behind him; the ship went the other way, toward Calais, having lost their prize.

The whale was seen occasionally for some days after that, with that rope on his tail. At last, he foolishly came into Whitstable Bay. The men in the oyster-boats saw him, and, by shouting and splashing, forced him up into shallow water, where the tide left him. They then wisely made sure of him by killing him outright. No pig-sticking knives were big enough or long enough to cut his throat, so they fixed styes on to poles, and pierced him till he died. Then came the operation of getting him to be done with him? and at last a deputation of fishermen went up to Messrs. —— & Co., in the city, the great dealers in whale-oil, whalebone, etc., etc., who gave the fishermen £80 for their capture, and sent down men, blubber-knives, iron pots, etc., to boil him up. A scientific gentleman went down to dissect the creature, and was getting on capitally, although he was once very nearly smothered in the deep into one of the openings of the heart. Nothing daunted by the smell or other disagreeable circumstances, he continued, and a section till he had made a valuable and interesting collection of preparations. One morning, when he was still working away, and the men looking on or "trying down" the oil, a very official-looking personage came up, and in a haughty manner said: "I claim this fish of you, directly! I want nothing more to the whole. I claim this fish (he was no naturalist, for a whale is a warm-blooded animal, and no fish) in the name of the law of the land, and nothing whatever must be touched or removed." He seized but just taken out the head of the whale, in which exhibits remarkable structures, and offering it to the bow-wower said: "Well, I suppose the lord of the manor doesn't want a whale to eye?" "You may keep that, Sir," was the answer. This disagreeable intruder then departed.

While the boiling went on, both statistical and commercial, were recovering their wonder, from another quarter of the compass lo! another Jack-in-office, who sent down into the assembled crowd, and with a wave of the stick proclaimed: "Touch nothing—move nothing—I claim all this in the name of the Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports!"

Vultures smell the stinking carcass from afar; so, too, the lawyers have the smell of the unfortunate whale had found its way so far as London, and even to the crown authorities, for yet another human being appeared on the wings of the wind, and, spreading his official papers over the putrid mass, pronounced: "This is a royal fish, and I claim it in the name of the crown." Here, then, was a pretty mess, both literal and physical; the three claimants set to work disputing with each other for possession, the fishermen quietly wiped their oily hands, packed up their traps, and adjourned to the public-house close by to cut their oily hands and talk over the matter. My friend, seeing nothing could be done, packed up his whale's eye, and went back to London in an oyster-boat, as he carried such an aroma about with him that they would not take him in the coach. The three volunteers then adjourned to their respective seats, and transferred the cause to the lawyers, who managed to spin out their disputes for a whole year. Long before the legal question had finished, however, a fourth claimant appeared in the person of the sea lion's wife, who came up with an unearthly yell, carried the whole property away, both blubber and bones.

WHAT CAN I DO?

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

HE was a poor cripple—lovely lingers twisted out of all useful shape, and lower limbs paralyzed so that he had to drag them after him wearily when he moved from the short distance of his small humble his sphere of locomotion—a poor, unhappy, murmuring, and, at times, ill-natured cripple, eating the bread which a mother's hard labor procured for him. For hours every fair day during spring, summer, and autumn, he might be seen in front of the little house where he lived, leaning upon the gate, or sitting on an old bench looking with a sober face at the jumping village children, and drearily regarding the passengers who moved with such strong limbs up and down the street. How often either very young the poor cripple's heart! How often, as the thoughtless village children taunted him cruelly with his misfortune, would he fling harsh maledictions after them. Many pitied the poor cripple, many looked upon him with feelings of disgust and repulsion; but few if any ever tried to do him good.

Not far from where the cripple lived was a man who had resided in the city for years, but was not likely to remain so to the end of his days. He was supported by the patient industry of a wife.

"If good works are the only passport to heaven," he said to a neighbor one day, "I fear my chances will be small."

"Well done, good and faithful servant, is the language of welcome," was replied; and the neighbor looked at the sick man in a way that made him feel a little uncomfortable.

"I am sick and bedridden—what can I do?" he spoke, fretfully.

"When little is given, little is required. But if there be only a willing mind, it is approved."

"I have no talent," said the invalid.

"Are you sure of that?"

"What can I do? Look at me! No health—no strength—no power to rise from this bed. A poor, helpless creature, looking to others for care for me, and for all, if I were in my grave."

"If that were so you would be in your grave. But God knows best. There is something for you to do, or you would be no longer permitted to live," said the neighbor.

The sick man shook his head.

"As I came along just now," continued the neighbor, "I met a poor cripple at the gate. Poor Hicks, the cripple, as he stood swinging on the gate before his mother's house, looking so unhappy that I pitied him in my heart. Now, I say to you as with yourself all through these long days, Tom," I asked. 'Nothing,' he replied, moodily. 'Don't you read sometimes?' I queried. 'Can't read,' was his sullen answer. 'Were you ever at school?' I went on. 'Once for a few days, but I'm no school?' 'Why don't your mother teach you?' 'Because she can't read herself,' replied Tom. 'It isn't too late to begin now,' said I, encouragingly; 'suppose I were to find some one willing to teach you, what would you say?' The poor lad's face brightened up for a moment with hope; but it fell, and he answered, 'I would say that nothing could please me better. I promised to find him a teacher, and, as I promised, I found my friend Croft, came into my mind. Now, here is something that you can do; a good work in which you can employ your time."

The sick man did not respond warmly to this proposition. He was not in the proper receptive state of good office—had so long felt himself the object toward which pity and service must tend—that he had nearly lost the power to do either. His disobedience had made him selfish.

"Give this poor cripple a lesson every day," went on the neighbor, rising to go home the subject, "and talk and read to him. Take him in charge as one of God's children, who needs your care, and lead up to a higher life than the one he is now living. It out this a good and a great work? It is my friend's request, and I promised for your hand, and in the doing of which there will be great reward. What can you do? Much! Think of that poor boy in the midst of the sultry years that lie still before him. What will become of him when his mother dies? The alms-house alone will open its doors for the blind boy. Can you then tell what resources may open before him if stimulated by thought. Take him, then, and teach the laws of a mind that now lies in darkness, that sunlight may come in. To you it will give a few hours of pleasant work each day, but to him it will be a life-long benefit. Will you do it?"

"Yes."

The sick man could not say "No," though in uttering that half-extorted assent he manifested no warm interest in the case of poor Tom Hicks.

On the next day the neighbor came to the sick man and received his first lesson; and every day, at an appointed hour, he was in Mr. Croft's room, eager for instruction. Slowly at first the child's lip mastered the alphabet, and as quickly learned to connect one small word with another in words of encouragement.

In Tom's face soon less frequently than before hanging on the gate or sitting idly on the bench before his mother's dwelling; and when you did see him there, an air of old, grave interest expression on his face. Soon the children, who had only looked at him, half in fear, from a distance, or come closer to him to mock, began to grow shy with his strange eyes out into the street, in order to worry him, began to have a different feeling for the cripple, and would sometimes run over, unbidden, to speak with him; for Tom no longer made queer faces or looked at them wickedly, as if he meant harm than if in his power, but smiled angrily if they said things to worry him. And now it often happened that a little boy or girl, as they passed the poor cripple and feared him at the same time, would offer him a flower, or an apple, or a handful of nuts in passing to school, and Tom, who talked with books; so that he had an abundance of mental food, and now began to repay his benefactor, the schoolmen, by reading to him for hours every day.

The mind of Tom had some of the qualities of a sponge in its receptiveness, and as it filled, it began to give out freely at every pressure. Whenever his mind came in contact with another mind, it acted either absorb or impart. So he was always talking or always listening when he had any body who would talk or listen.

There was something about him that strongly attracted the boys in the neighborhood, and he usually had three or four of them around him, and often a dozen, late in the afternoon, when the schools were out. As Tom had entered a new world—that of books—and was interested in all he found there, the subjects on which he talked with his friends who sought his company were always instructive. There was no nonsense about the cripple: suffering of body and mind had long ago made him serious; and all nonsense, or low, sensual talk, to which boys are sometimes addicted, found no encouragement in his presence. His influence over these boys was therefore of the best kind. The parents of some of the children, when they found their children going or often to the house of Tom Hicks, felt doubts as to the safety of such intimate intercourse with the cripple, toward whom they were prepossessed, as to be here in the village the reputation of being ill-tempered and depraved, and questioned them very closely in regard to the nature of their intercourse. The report of these boys took their parents by surprise; but, on investigation, it was found to be true, and Tom's character soon rose in the public estimation.

Then came, as a natural consequence, inquiry as to the cause of such a change in the unfortunate lad; and the neighbor of the sick man who had instructed Tom still in the Lord's agency in the matter. This interested the whole town in both the cripple and his bedridden instructor. The people were taken by surprise at such a noble instance of the great good which may sometimes be done where the means look discouragingly small. Mr. Croft was praised for his generous conduct, and not only praised, but helped by many who had, until now, felt indifferent toward his case or that of Tom Hicks, and left them to find out opportunities.

The cripple's eagerness to learn, and rapid progress under the most limited advantages, becoming generally known, a gentleman, whose son had been one of Tom's playmates, and who had grown to a better boy under his influence, offered to send him in his wagon every day to the school-house, which stood half a mile distant, and have him brought back in the afternoon.

It was the happiest day in Tom's life when he made his first journey to the school-house and took his place among his school-room.

Before leaving home on that morning he had made his way to the bed-side room of Mr. Croft.

"I owe it all to you," he said, as he brought the white, thin hand of his benefactor to his lips. It was damp with more than a kiss when he laid it back gently on the bed. "And our Father in Heaven will reward you."

"You have done a good work," said the neighbor who had urged Mr. Croft to improve his one talent, as he sat down by him on that evening about the poor cripple and his opening prospects; "and it will serve you in that day when the record of life is opened. Not because of the work itself, but for the true charity which prompted the work. It was begun, I know, in some self-denial, but that self-denial was the purest spirit; and because you put away love of ease and indifference, and forced yourself to do a duty, and seeing that it was right to help others, God will send a heavenly love of doing good into your soul, which always includes a great reward, and is the passport to eternal felicities.

"You said," continued the neighbor, "only a few months ago, that you had no talent and the man who felt that he was deprived of all the means of accomplishing good; and yet you have, with but little effort, made the barren soil out of the valley of ignorance, where it was groping in selfnature, and the rocky ground on an overhanging mountain path. The light of hope has fallen, through your aid, with sunny warmth upon the heart that was cold and inactive, and it has put forth a new growth with verdure and blossoming in the sweet promise of fruit. The infinite years to come alone can reveal the blessing that you have done to the soul of a bed-ridden man, who felt that in him was no capacity for good deeds."

The sick man lay at school being placed within the reach of Tom Hicks, he gave up every thought to its acquirement and knowledge. And was soon a serious difficulty. His bent, stiff fingers could not be made to hold either pen or pencil in the right position, or if they could, it was in a way as to make intelligible signs. But Tom was too much in earnest to give up on the first, or second, or third effort. He was, in the beginning of his trials, that he could hold a pencil more firmly than at first, and guide his hand in some obedience to his will. This was sufficient to encourage him to daily long-continued efforts, the result of which was a gradual yielding of the rigid muscles, which became more and more pliable that he could make quite passable figures, and write a fair hand. This did not satisfy him, however. He was not content to be a writer and a kept on trying and trying, until few boys in the school could write better.

"I have a letter from the news?" said a neighbor to Mr. Croft, the poor bed-ridden man. It was five years from the day he gave the poor cripple, Tom Hicks, his first lesson.

"What news?" the sick man asked, in a feeble voice, not even turning his head toward the speaker.

"Life is pretty uncertain with us," he long struggle with disease was nearly over.

"Tom Hicks has received the appointment of teacher to our public school."

"Are you in earnest?" There was a mingling of surprise and doubt in the low tones that crept out upon the air.

"Yes. It is true what I say. You know that after Mr. Wilson died the directors got Tom, who was a favorite with all the scholars, to keep the school together for a few weeks until a successor could be appointed. He managed so well, with such good order, and showed himself so capable as an instructor, that the directors, when they met and other shorts or proper. So he was always talking or always listening when he had any body who would talk or listen.

"I have a letter from the news?" he said, as he reached a newspaper feebly toward Tom, "and it has made my heart glad."

"I owe it all to you," replied the cripple, in a voice that trembled with feeling. "God will reward you."

And he caught the shadowy hand, touched it with his lips, and wet it with grateful tears, as once before. Even as he felt that thin, white hand the low moving pulses took a lower beat—lower and lower—until the long-suffering heart were still, and the freed spirit went up to its reward.

"My benefactor!" sobbed the cripple, as he stood by the dead form that presently was clothes, and looked upon it for the last time ere the coffin-lid closed over it. "What would I have been except for you!"

Are your opportunities for doing good few, and limited in range, to all appearances, reader? Have you only one talent, like the cripple, now, "What can I do?" Are you poor, weak, ignorant, obscure, or sick as he was, and shut out from contact with the busy outside world? No matter. If you have a willing heart, good work will come to your hands. In them no poor, unhappy, neglected one to whom you can speak words of encouragement, or lift out of the vale of ignorance? Think! Cast around you. Some way, by a single sentence, spoken in the right time and in the right spirit, awaken thoughts in some dull mind that may grow into plans of action at after-times, wielded for the world's good. While you may never be able to act directly on society to any great purpose, in consequence of your own physical disabilities, you may, by instruction and guidance, prepare some one to act for usefulness, which, but for your agency, might have wasted its powers in ignorance or crime. All around us are human souls that may be influenced for good. Nurse who ministers to you in sickness may be hurt or helped by you: the children who look into your face and smile at you, as you pass in the street, and remember what you say—will grow better or worse, according to the spirit of your life, as it flows into them. The neglected son of a neighbor may find in you the wise counselor who holds him back from evil. Indeed, you can not pass a single day, whether your sphere be large or small, your place exalted or lowly, without abundant opportunities for doing good. Only the willing heart is required. As for the harvest, that is nolding, ripe for the sickle, in every man's field. What of that time when the Lord of the Harvest comes, and you bind up your sheaves and lay them at his feet?

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE POLITICAL CAMPAIGN.

The Maine election came off on 10th September, and resulted in a decisive triumph. The returns have not come to hand, but enough is known to show that there has been a Republican gain in the popular vote, and that the Congressional delegation and Legislature are Republican. The Republican politicians in Massachusetts held their nominating Conventions on 12th, and made nominations for Governor, Mr. Clement J. Booth, of Springfield, is the Douglas nominee for Governor.—The Breckinridge Democrats of Cumberland district Maine the same day, instructing them to vote for Breckinridge as long as there is a chance of success. The Pro-Lecompton Douglas Democrats nominated a straight Douglas ticket on 13th. The Democratic State Convention met on 19th, adopted strong Douglas resolutions, and nominated a straight out Douglas ticket—Governor Downing was held at Jessie Wood, New York, on September 12, and appointed a State Ticket by Stephen A. Douglas, Fernando Wood, and others. It is said that 40,000 people were present.—An immense Douglas mass meeting was held at the Cooper Institute on 13th. Speeches were made by Lieut.-Governor Seymour, Fernando Wood, and others.—Mr. Seward continues to stump the West. During the week he has been at Kalamazoo, Detroit, Jackson, Michigan (Wisconsin), and elsewhere. He is every where enthusiastically received.—Senator Douglas has gone to the Springs, being worn out by his labors.

MR. SEWARD AGAIN ON SECESSION.

Senator Douglas, in his great speech at Jones Wood, New York, on 13th September, said: "I am prepared to act with all who are loyal to the Constitution and the Union, and opposed to the Abolition or Republican party, from whatever section they may live or country. I was asked, at Norfolk, Virginia, and other places, whether, in the event of the election of Mr. Lincoln should secede from this Union when Lincoln was elected, I said, in the name of the people of the State of Illinois I tell you, as I told them, that whoever is President is bound to execute the laws of the land, and to support the Union. I also tell you that it is the duty of every loyal citizen to stand by the Union may be his politics, to aid and assist in the execution of the laws of the Union, whether elected or not, which God in his mercy forbid of violence and tumult, or any attempt to break up the Union by the Constitution and the laws of its country, and I, as the humblest, and strongest, secession opponent, will sustain him in the exercise of every constitutional function."

WHERE DOES BRECKINRIDGE STAND?

He also said: "I do not charge all the Breckinridge men in the United States with being disunionists. I do not charge Mr. Breckinridge himself with being a disunionist. I do not express any opinion as to what there is not a disunionist in America who is not a Breckinridge man. He has not so declared himself as yet, and of them why, were they put their questions to me as to whether the election of Lincoln would be a good cause of disunion, they did not also propound them to their candidate? He was a candidate for the Presidency in Kentucky, and Mr. Breckinridge's special attention invited to the matter as right there before his lacerating speech. In that speech he answered the charge that he was in favor of disunion, by declaring that he favored the charge that he was in favor of self-government in the Territories, and to protect constitutional rights to the Constitution and to the Union. But I have not yet been able to find out what the universal Democratic party as to whether or not he would enforce the laws against those who should attempt to break up the government. It does not satisfy me for a man to say that he is in favor of the Constitution, the Union, and the laws, unless the same declaration. I have heard William L. Yancey speak in favor of the Union, and I have heard avowed the leaders of the disunion party make similar professions. They all admit that they are in favor of the Union, yet that there is a contingency in which they would dissolve it. Now, I desire to know of Major Breckinridge whether the contingency set forth by his electoral friend in Virginia, if he has congratulate to me, is the one in which he would dissolve the Union?

DOUGLAS ON WORCESTER.

"I am in favor of a cordial union of every Union man, every constitutional man, every man who desires the preservation of the Union and the Constitution and the enforcement of the laws in every and all contingencies. If Major Breckinridge is in favor of enforcing the laws against disunionists, secession, nullification and all other classes of men, in the event the election does not result to exit him, then I am willing; but I tell you that I am utterly opposed to any soldier or any citizen with any man or any party who will not enforce the laws, support the Constitution, and preserve the Union, peaceably and not by force. Now if my exhibition frightens you, and you have misunderstood me, I will say to another ish man Brockinbrough—"waits to know, he must get an answer before he can decide whether he will or will not answer. Judges in justice of the church, he must get an answer from that gentleman himself before he will commit himself to a reply. When he answers, and his position is stated in the Norfolk indictment, then I will be in time enough to form an opinion. Brockinbrough is not to me. Believing that this Union to be one I believe that I make my personal safety secondary to it. I believe that the withdrawal of my name would tend to serve it. I therefore withdraw it. I would risk myself in the defeat Mr. Lincoln, but I would not risk myself in the event of his success, if such an act of mine would insure the election of a man pledged to the Constitution, the Union, and the enforcement of the laws."

MR. SEWARD ON THE CONSTITUTION.

In the course of his speech at Madison, Wisconsin, Mr. Seward said: "It has been by a simple rule of interpretation I have stated the Constitution of the United States. That rule has been simply this: That by no word, no act, no combination into which I might enter, would I allow any one human being of all the generations to which I belong, much less any class of human beings, to be put into, rote, or kindness, be oppressed and kept down in the large number in their efforts to rise to the full measure of liberty and happiness. Amidst all the glooms of the times, amidst the misery and dissension which that Constitution of the United States has been subjected, this has been the single, plain, broad light by which I have been read every article and every section of that great instrument. Whenever I find matters of no such kind, or which keep down the humblest of the human race, then I will lay down my power, place, position, fame, everything rather than adopt such a construction or such a rule. If therefore, in this war here are any who would make it a war for them, in God's name, good speed! If there are in foreign lands any who would improve the present crisis by usurpation, or if there to any here who would go abroad in search of happiness, in the misfortunes of their condition, or in their elevation toward a higher state of dignity and happiness, they look in vain for me, and they always shall have, a cheering word and such efforts as I can constitutionally make in their favor."

THE SHIPWRECK ON LAKE MICHIGAN,

A survivor, after describing how he and others, with the captain, got on a raft, goes on to say: "The next day the entrapment had not less than three hundred persons gathered, the majority of whom were women and children, and quite enough to sink the raft. The captain then ordered all to get off except the crew, and very few who could swim refused to do so, but were allowed to lie by and watch the fate of their companions. The captain now passed over the raft, and seeing that the crew and seven to leave the raft encouraging the The captain now passed over the raft, and seeing that the crew and seven to leave the raft encouraging the others to stir from the position which we occupied in order to keep a secure hold on the raft, we remained in the water for about an hour, when I was taken up by the arms of an exhausted and a white, myself in an exhausted condition, and in a few subsequent women, in a few minutes, when it was soon lost. He left us to encounter the waves to keep ourselves from sinking, and to make our way to the shore. I refused to leave, and with the full firmness of mind which clung to, while the raft kept that destiny, I was soon beyond hearing of the cries of women, and I began to think that I was doomed to perish. Clinging to their places in silent terror, and while the waves were sweeping over and breaking on the deck of the captain, raised aloud in encouragement and good cheer, but which could not amidst the roar of the waves, and the ceaseless splash of the combing waves. Finally the constant spray of the water broke up the raft, and the last parties floated off on detached pieces, and gradually the multitude were swept away by couples and single individuals, until but a few of the whole number remained. The weak remained the last raft, which, with its feeble weights, and a weary struggle the hapless survivors had during the night, in the grim embrace of death. Mrs. Sullivan was too keen on his raft, and says that he was surprised to find himself in the sea, with his two children, every third minute. When they reached shore they were taken up by persons hopelessly in the same misfortunes than their companions, were lifted upon the backs of the strong, and dragged ashore by the hair, limbs which awaited them. It was here that, having surmounted all the dangers that terrible night, the commander succumbed and gave way to the irresistible force which had tested his strength and endurance. Others had rather died than than to have lived in the exercise of more selfish motives than those which marked his character through the whole of this trying ordeal."

PERSONAL.

Sir George Simpson, Governor of Hudson Bay for many years, died at Lachine, Canada East, last week. He was the first to become connected with the Hudson Bay and other places in the vicinity, and for his daring and energetic character received many promotions from the hand of royalty itself. He was born in the mountainous parts of the Ross-shire, Scotland, and died in his about the year 1796, and was consequently in the neighborhood of sixty years of age.

General Wool, late of the liberal army in Mexico, called in his household on Saturday last on the occasion of joining Garibaldi at Naples. It is understood that General Wool is of honored Democratic principles, and by Mr. Samuel Bronson, a wealthy gentleman of California. Mr. Bronson is a native of Connecticut, and a Colonel Charles L. Hicks, who, it is reported, will leave in the next steamer.

The Hartford Post thus notices an operation recently performed in that city by one of the Dr. Mott's, of St. Mark's Place, New York:

"On Saturday last Dr. Lightfoot operated on Mr. David Barbank, of No. 32 Woodbridge Street, for deafness. Mr. Barbank is seventy-four years of age, and has resided in Hartford fifty years, the last ten of which he has been deaf. The operation was entirely successful, and now Mr. Barbank, who is widely known and respected, enjoys his hearing."

Mrs. Putnam, the colored American woman who went to Sarsaparilla, a letter, some years ago, on the impaining of nutriment which she received on board the Steamship Jamestown, has just returned to this country by the Arabia. On that vessel she was allowed to purchase a first-class ticket, and received the same care, fatigue and attentions as the other passengers.

On Thursday General Cowen, of Virginia, was in carriage while sitting in a buggy fighting and turning each consequence of a fall. He was killed on the spot, and his son, Mr. Burbank, who is widely known and respected, enjoys his hearing.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

THERE are not many places that I find it more agreeable to revisit, when I am in an idle mood, than some places to which I have never been. For my acquaintance with those spots is of such long standing, and has ripened into an intimacy of so affectionate a nature, that I take a particular interest in assuring myself that they are unchanged.

I never was in Robinson Crusoe's Island, yet I frequently revisit there. The colony he established on it soon faded away, and it is uninhabited by any descendants of the grave and courteous Spaniards, or of Will Atkins and the other mutineers, and has relapsed into its original condition. Not a twig of its wicker houses remains; its goat-herds long run wild again; its screaming parrots would darken the sun with a cloud of many flaming colors if a gun were fired there; no fox is ever unearthed in the waters of the little creek which Friday swam across when pursued by his two brother cannibals with shortened stumps. After comparing notes with other travelers who have similarly revisited the Island and conscientiously inspected it, I have satisfied myself that it continues to realize Mr. Atkins's domesticity or theology, though his track on the memorable evening of his landing by set his right hand, when he was divorced about and round about until it was dark, and his hour was past, until his strength and spirits failed him, is yet plainly to be traced. So is the hill-top on which Robinson was struck dumb with joy when the ruminating Captain pointed to the ship, riding within half a mile of the shore, that was to bear him away, in the nine-and-twentieth year of his seclusion, to that lonely place. So is the sandy beach on which the memorable footstep was impressed, and where the savages hauled up their canoes when they came ashore for those dreadful public dinners, which led to a dawning scene than speech-making. So is the cave where the thirteen eyes of the old goat made such a goblin appearance in the dark. So is the sight of the hut where Robinson lived with the goat and the parrot and the cat, and where he endured those first agonies of solitude, which, strange to say, never involved any ghostly fancies, communications or very remarkable that perhaps he left out something in writing his record? Round hundreds of such objects, hidden in the leaves of folios, the fragrance of tea breaks everywhere; and over them the tropical sky, varying in the short rainy season, shines bright and cloudless.

Neither was I ever belated among wolves on the Icy Sea, or among the Great Spirit, nor did I ever, when night was closing in and the ground was covered with snow, draw up my little company among the sledges, and with served out a lesser work, and there fix a train of gunpowder so decisively that suddenly we had three or four score blazing wolves scorching the darkness around us. Nevertheless, I occasionally go back to that dismal region and perform the frigid journey, indeed, to smell the singeing and the frying of the wolves afire, and to see them setting one another slight at a time, and tumble, and to behold them rolling in the snow, vainly attempting to put themselves out, and to hear their howlings taken up by all the echoes as well as by all the unseen wolves within the woods, makes me tremble.

I was never in the robbers' cave, where Gil Blas lived; but I often go back there and find the trap-door just as heavy to raise as it used to be, while that wicked old disciple Black lies everlastingly cursing in bed. I was never in Don Quixote's study, where he read his books of chivalry until he rose and tucked imaginary giants, and never refreshed himself with great draughts of water; yet you couldn't move a book in it without my knowledge, with my consent. I was never (thank Heaven!) in company with the little old woman who hobbled out of the chest and told the merchant's sons how to go in search of the Talisman of Ormuzine; yet I make it my business to know that she is well and comfortable and is likely to be ever. I was never at the school where the boy Horatio Nelson got out of bed to steal the pears not because he was a boy, but because every other boy was afraid; yet I have several times been back to this Academy to see him let down out of window with a rope. So with Damascus, and Bagdad, and Brobdingnag (which has the curious fate of being usually mispelled when written), and Lilliput, and Laputa, and the Nile, and Abyssinia, and the Ganges, and the North Pole, and many hundreds of places that were never there, yet I am an affair of my life to keep them intact, and I am always going back to them.

But what was in Marlborough one day, revisiting the associations of my childhood, as recorded in previous pages of these notes, my experience in this wise was made quite incomfortable and odd on account by the quantity of places and people—utterly impossible places and people, but none the less abominably real—that I found I had to get introduced to by my nurse before I was six years old, and used to be forced to go back to at night without at all wanting to go. If we all knew our own minds (in a more enlarged sense than the popular acceptation of that phrase), I suppose we should find our nurses responsible for most of the dark corners we are forced to go back to against our wills.

The first diabolical character that intruded himself on my personal youth (as I called to mind that day at Dullborough) was a certain Captain Murderer. This wretch must have been an offshoot of the Blue Beard family, but I had no suspicion at the consanguinity in those times. His warning name would seem to have awakened no general prejudice against him, for he was admitted into the best society and possessed immense wealth. Captain Murderer's mission was matrimony, and the gratification of a cannibal appetite with tender brides. On his marriage morning he always caused lush sides of the way to churches to be plastered with curious flowers; and when his bride said, "Dear Captain Murderer, I never saw flowers like these before: what are they called?" he answered, "They are called Garnish for house-lamb," and laughed at his ferocious practical joke in a horrid manner. Shortly afterwards the bride and bridegroom made an end of feasting and revelry, and last dismissed the noble company, and departed with his wife on the day month after their marriage, it was his whimsical caution to produce a golden rolling-pin, and to kill her dead with it. Some say this special feature in the Captain's courtships, that he always asked if the young lady could make pie-crust, and if she couldn't he took no refusal when she was taught. Well, when the bride saw Captain Murderer produce the golden rolling-pin and silver pie-board she laughed very much, and turned up her lamb-like sleeves to make a pie. The Captain brought out a pie-crust already made for capacity, and the Captain brought out flour and butter and eggs and all things needful, except the inside of the pie, of which there was a single dish of pie itself the Captain brought out none. Then said the lovely bride, "Dear Captain Murderer, what pig is this to be? Is it a sucking pig, a meat pig?" Then said the lovely bride, "Dear Captain Murderer, I see no meat." The Captain honorably retorted, "Look in the glass." She looked in the glass, but still she saw no meat, and then the Captain roared with laughing, and, suddenly frowning and drawing his sword, lade her roll out the crust. So she rolled out the crust, dropping large tears upon it all the time, for she was very sad; and when she had lined the dish with crust and had cut the crust all ready to fit the top, the Captain called out, "I am the meat, I am the meat." And the bride looked up at the glass just in time to see the Captain cutting her head off; and he chopped her in pieces, and popped her pieces into the pie, and put her in the pie, and sent it to the baker's, and ate it all, and picked the bones.

Now the dark picture had been suspense much increased by the tiling of the Captain's teeth, and again by the house-lamb joke. Putting all things together when he was first told that Bluebeard was dead, she divined the truth, and determined to be revenged. So she filed three Captain Murderers' bones, and knocked at the knocker and pulled at the bell, and when the Captain came to the door, said: "Dear Captain Murderer, you killed me next, for I always loved you and was jealous of my sister. The Captain took it as a compliment, and made a polite answer, and married the bride quickly arranged. On the night before it the bride again climbed to his window, and again saw him with the teeth filed sharp. Then the Captain laughed such a terrible laugh at the chink in the shutter that the bride nearly fell backward, and said: "I hope nothing has disagreed with me!" At this she laughed again, a still more terrible laugh, and the Captain turned green and trembled, but she was nimbly gone and there was no one. Next day they went to church in the coach and were also married, and when they got home the month she rolled the pie-crust out, and Captain Murderer cut her head off, and chopped her in pieces, and popped her in the pie, and put the pie in the pie, and sent it to the baker's, and ate it all, and picked the bones.

But before she began to roll out the paste she had taken a deadly poison of a most awful character, distilled from toads and spiders and bats, and Captain Murderer had hardly picked her last bone when he began to swell, and to turn blue, and to be all over spots, and to scream out that he was on swelling and turning bluer and being more all over spots and screaming, until he reached from the parlor-ceiling and from the floor and from the, at one o'clock in the morning, he blew up with a loud explosion, and scattered his fragments like mile-stones horses in the stables broke their halters and were mad, and then they galloped over every body in Captain Murderer's town except the locksmith (a worthy blacksmith, who had filed his teeth) until the whole were dead, and then they galloped away.

Hundreds of times did I hear the story uttered of Captain Murderer in my early youth, and added hundreds of times was there a mental compulsion upon me in bed to peep in at his window, as the dark twin peeped, and to revisit his horrible house, and look at him in his blue and spotty and screaming stage, as he reached from floor to ceiling and from wall to wall. The young woman who brought me acquainted with Captain Murderer had a fiendish enjoyment of my terrors, and used to begin, I remember—as a sort of introductory overture—by clawing the air with both hands, and uttering a long, low, hollow groan. So acutely did I suffer from this ceremony in combination with this infernal Captain, that I sometimes used to plead I thought I was hardly strong enough and old enough to hear the story again just yet. But the never spared me one word of it, and indeed commanded the awful chalice to my lips as the only preservative known to science against "The Black Cat"—a weird and glaring-eyed supernatural Tom, who was reported to prowl about the world by night, sucking the breath of infancy, and who was endowed with a special thirst (as I was given to understand) for tender throats.

This female bard—may she have been repaid my debt of obligation to her in the matter of nightmare!—was principally unwrappers in my memory as the daughter of a shipwright. Her name was Mercy, though she had none on me. There was something in the very kindling flavor in the fuel-losing story. As it always recurs to me in a vague association with a pervading smell, I believe it to have been reserved for dull nights when I was low with medicine:

There was once a shipwright, and he wrought in a Government Yard, and his name was Chips. And his father's name before him was Chips, and his father's name before him was Chips, and there were all Chipses. And Chips the father had sold himself to the Devil for an iron pot and a bushel of tenpenny nails and half a ton of copper and a rat that could speak; and Chips the grandfather had sold himself to the Devil for an iron pot and a bushel of tenpenny nails and half a ton of copper and a rat that could speak; and Chips the great-grandfather had sold himself in the same direction on the same terms; and the bargain had run in the family for a long, long time. So one day when Chips was at work in the Dock Yard all alone, down in the dark hold of an old Seventy-four that was hauled up for repairs, the Devil presented himself, and said to Chips:

"A Lemon has pips,
And a Yard has ships,
And I'll have Chips!"

(I don't know why, but this fact of the Devil's expressing himself in rhyme was peculiarly trying to me.) Chips looked up when he heard the words, and there he saw the Devil with sooner eyes that squinted on the principle of scale, and that struck out sparks of blue fire continually. And when ever he wished his eyes showers of blue sparks came out, and then they made a clattering like flints and steels striking lights. And hanging over one of his arms by the handle was an iron pot, and under him was a bushel of tenpenny nails, and under his other arm was half a ton of copper, and on his shoulders was a rat that could speak. So the Devil said again:

"A Lemon has pips,
And a Yard has ships,
And I'll have Chips!"

(The invariable effect of this alarming tautology on the part of the Devil on the rat that could speak was to deprive me of my senses for some moments.) So Chips answered never a word, but went on with his work. "What say you then, Chips?" said the rat that could speak; "I am putting in new planks where you and your gang have eaten through the old Chips." "But will it cost much, rat?" said the rat that could speak; "and well let in the water, and we'll drown the crew, and we'll sail away from the Yard, being owners, in a shipwright, and not a Man-of-war's man, and, "You are welcome to it." But he couldn't keep his eyes off the half a ton of copper or the bushel of tenpenny nails; for nails and copper are a shipwright's sweet-hearts, and shipwrights will run after them, as they may can. So the Devil said, "I see what you are looking at, Chips. You've had nothing like it since the old bargain. You know the terms. Your father before you was well acquainted with them, and so were your grandfather and great-grandfather before him. Say the word, Chips, I'll like the copper, and I like the nails, and I don't mind the pot, but I don't like the rat." Says the Devil, finally, "And as at twelve o'clock I shall work out him—and he's a curiosity. I'm going," Chips, afraid of losing the half a ton of copper and the bushel of tenpenny nails, said, "Give us hold." So he got the copper and the nails and the pot and the rat that could speak, and the Devil vanished.

Chips said to the rat that could speak, and he would have sold the pot; but whenever he offered it for sale the rat that could speak bit him, and dropped it, and would have nothing to say to the bargain. So Chips resolved to kill the rat, and, being at work on the Dock one day, with a great kettle of hot pitch on one side of him and the iron pot with the rat in it on the other, the rat turned the scalding pitch over him and filled it full. Then he kept his eye upon it till it cooled and hardened, and then he let it stand for twenty days, and then he heated the pitch again, and melted the nails into the kettle, and then he sank the pot in water for twenty days more, and then he got the smelters to put it in the furnace for twenty days more, and then they gave it him out, red-hot, and looking like red-hot iron—yet there was nothing in it but the rat in it, just the same as ever! And the moment it caught his eye, it said, with a jeer:

"A Lemon has pips,
And a Yard has ships,
And I'll have Chips!"

(For this Refrain I had waited since its last appearance with inexpressible horror, which now diminished, for I felt more certain in his own mind that the rat would stick to him; the rat, answering his thought, said, "I will—like pitch!"

Now, as the Devil was not at all the pot when I had spoken, and made off, Chips began to hope that it wouldn't keep its word. But a terrible thing happened next day. For, when dinner-time came and the Dock-bell rang to strike work, he put his rule into the long pocket at the side of his trousers, and there he found a rat—not that rat, but another rat. And in his hat he found another, and in his pocket-handkerchief another; and in the sleeves of his coat, when he pulled it on to go to dinner, two more. And from that time he found himself so frightfully intimate with all the rats in the Yard that they climbed up his legs when he was at work, and sat on his tools while he used them. And they could all speak to one another, and he understood what they said. And they got into his lodging, and into his bed, and into his teapot, and into his beer, and into his boots. And he was going to be married to a corn-chandler's daughter, and when he gave her a work-bag he had himself made for her, a rat jumped out of it; and when he put his arm round her waist, a rat clung about her; and the marriage was broken off, though the bans were already twice put up—which the parish-clerk will remember, for, as he handed the book to the clergyman for the second time of asking, a large fat rat ran over the leaf. (By this time a spectacle of rats was always sitting down my back, and the whole of my small intestines was overrun with them. At intervals, ever since, I have been constantly afraid of my own pocket, lest my exploring hand should find a specimen or two of those vermin in it.)

You may believe that all this was very terrible to Chips; but even all this was not the worst. He knew besides what the rats were doing wherever they were. So sometimes he would cry aloud, when he was at his club at night, "Oh! keep the rats out of the convicts' burying-ground! Don't let them do that!" Or, "There's one of them at the cheese down stairs!" Or, "There's two of them smoking at the baby in the cradle!" And other things of that sort. At last he was voted mad, and lost his work in the Yard, and could get no more. But King George, who was mad then, so before very long he got pressed for a sailor. And so he was taken off in a boat one evening to his ship, lying at Spithead, ready to sail. And as the first thing he made out in her as he got near her was the figure-head of the old man-of-war, where he had seen the Devil. She was the Actæon, and they rowed right under the bowsprit, where the figure-head of the Actæon, with a sheepskin in his hand and a blue gown on, was looking out to sea; and sitting staring on his forehead was the rat who could speak, and his exact words were these: "Chips ahoy! Lo! boy! We've pretty nearly eat them too, and will drown the crew, and will eat them too!" (Here I always fainted accordingly fain, and would have asked for water, but that I was speechless.)

The ship was bound for the Indies; and if you don't know where that is, you ought to. The ship set sail that night, and she sailed, and sailed, and sailed. Chips's feelings were dreadful. Nothing ever equaled his terrors. No wonder. At last, one day, he got leave to speak to the Captain. The Admiral give leave. Chips went down on his knees in the Great State Cabin. "Your Honor, unless your Honor, without a moment's loss of time, makes sail for the nearest shore, this is a doomed ship!" Says the Captain, "Why, my young man, your words are a madman's words." "Your Honor, my life are nibbling away." "They?" "Your Honor, they are dreadful rats. And at bedtime, lowness where solid oak timber is, Rats nibbling a grave for every man on board! Oh! Captain, unless you take your flight, in your pretty children?" "Yes, my man, to be sure." "Then, for God's sake, make for the nearest shore, for at present moment every rat on board is busy on their work, and are all busy saying to one another that you shall never, never, never see them or your Lady and your children more." "My poor fellow, you are a mere for the doctor. Sentry, take care of this man!"

So he was tied and he was flustered, and he was thin and dark, and six whole days and nights he then he again asked leave to speak to the Admiral. The Admiral give leave. He went down on his knees in the Great State Cabin. "Admiral Avast, you must die! You took no warning; you must. Die! You would not stop a long in their calculations, and they make out that they'll be through at twelve to-night. So you must die!—with me and all the rest." And as at twelve o'clock there was a great leak reported in the ship, and a terrent of water rushed in, and nothing could stop it, and they all went down, and were drowned. And what do the rats—being water-rats—left of Chips at last floated to shore, and sitting on him was an immense congress of rats, planning what other ships were the corpse touched the beach and never came up. And there was a shipwrecked sea-sword on shore. And if you get thirteen bits of sea-weed, and dry them and burn them in the fire, they will go—off—like in these thirteen words as plain can be:

"A Lemon has pips,
And a Yard has ships,
And I've got Chips!"

The same female bard—descended, possibly, from those Scandinavian deities who seem to have existed for the express purpose of enfolding the brains of mankind when they began to investigate language—sometimes startled me when child greatly assisted in forcing me back to a number of hideous places that I would by all means have avoided. Of this nature was that class of the ghost stories had occurred to her own relations. Polite-ness toward a meritorious family, therefore, forbade my doubting them, and I was pressed into an air of authentication that impaired my digestive powers for life. There was a narrative concerning an unearthly animal foretelling death, which appeared in the open street to a parlor-maid who "went to fetch the beer" one supper: first taking the form of assuming the likeness of a black dog, and gradually rising on its hind-legs and swelling into the resemblance of a supernaturally large kangaroo; a hippopotamus' which apparition—not because I deemed it in the least improbable, but because I felt it to be really too large to bear—I feebly endeavored to explain away. But on Mercy's retorting with wounded dignity that the parlor-maid was her own sister-in-law, I perceived there was no hope, and resigned myself to this zoological phenomenon as one of my many pursuers. There was another narrative describing the apparition of a young woman who came out of a glass-case and haunted another young woman until the other young woman questioned it and elicited that its bones (Lord! To think of its being so particular about its bones!) were buried under the glass-case, whereas she required them to be interred, with every Undertaking solemnity up to twenty-four pound ten, in another particular place. This narrative I considered I had a personal interest in disproving, because we had glass-cases at home, and how, otherwise, was I to be guaranteed from the intrusion of young women requiring me to bury them up to twenty-four pound ten, when I had only twopence a week? For my remembrances were cut-in-the ground from under my tender feet, by informing me that She was the other young woman; and I couldn't say "I don't believe you;" it was not possible.

Such are a few of the uncommercial journeys that I was forced to make, against my will, when I was very young and unreasoning. And really, as to the latter of them, it is not so very long ago—now I come to think of it—that I was asked to undertake them once again, with a steady countenance.

"WILT THOU KISS ME?"

When I ask'd her, "Wilt thou kiss me?"
Naught she said, but hung her cheek so,
As if she were thinking, thinking
Whether she might do't or no.
Then her fair, kind face upturning,
One sweet touch I there did win;
As if she were thinking, thinking
Such small grace as no sin.

She therein lost no compound,
Nor ashamed did she seem;
Truly chase may grant such favor,
And therein lose no esteem.

DEAL BEACH.

"NO, Amos, no—I'm not cruel; not hard-hearted. I would give you pearls for the world—yes who have been only good to me and mine; and for that very reason I would tell you the plain truth. I'm not ashamed 'you at all when you tell me of this fearful love: all your pleading only frightens me. Have we not been as brother and sister all our lives? Why should you feel so differently toward me now? Mother says you are another son to her since William went to the army. Why can't you be such a home to her as you were so much, and be the same dear, good brother to me you always have been? 'Tis not you are hard-hearted and cruel to say that I make you go away when I don't want you to go at all."

"I don't want to leave you, Alice, but I must go. I've thought of you with every hand's turn I have done here for so long that I couldn't bring the cane from my window-lot, or go down to the spring there for water, without being minded of you at every step. Even my boat has your name on her, and couldn't paint it out unless I could not go on here in the old way without the old hopes and thinking about you. It always seemed to me, Alice, just as though we were made and right for you to love me—just as though, when times come right again, we'd be married and—"

"There, don't talk so any more, Amos. I can't feel as you do, and I don't want to, either. would do any thing in the world to have my stay home and be reasonable, as you ought to, but I can't be sentimental. I'll spin for you and weave for you, but love you in the way I can not. I don't know how, and that's the end of it."

Much longer the young people talked together, but "the end of it" was as the maiden had said; and so Amos Conover went away to share the hardships and glory of those men who suffered through that frigid winter in Valley Forge, and not after summer on the scorching plains of Monmouth. At long intervals the families at Deal were told some word of him, and ever that he was foremost among the many brave. Who so daring as those unhappy men without hopes to make life dear? When Amos left Deal he bitterly thought he cared not if he never saw home again.

Two and a few years after young Conover left home when William Hendricksen—Alice's brother—returned on furlough, bringing the news that Amos had been promoted. He was to have a company as soon as he attained his majority, and he had earned his honors. The man was always offered when volunteers were called for services of difficulty and danger; and his bluegrass education in habits of endurance, his watchful and self-reliance, rendered him peculiarly capable of acting where instant ability and courage alone could snatch success from the very jaws of threatening defeat and ruin. With the natural instinct of youth clinging to life, he would sometimes shrink from an unusually hazardous undertaking; but at such moments a desperate memory of Alice would urge him on, and thinking, "Now she'll be sorry if I never come back," he would dash eagerly forward into the most reckless exploits. And when, returning from some perilous quest, he glided quietly in among his companions round the campfire, their earnest welcome and sincere praise only made him long for welcome and praise which could not be his. Even the commendations of the chief lost half their value because they could not be told at home. "Would she care to know they call me brave?" This question, always recurring, and always despairingly answered, stirred the heart of the young soldier continually, stimulating him to new deeds of heroism until "Cool Conover" became known to friends and foes as the impersonation of skill and daring.

During the memorable spring of 1778 the forces of Sir Henry Clinton entered New Jersey, whither they were immediately followed by Washington. The light troops of the Continental army, especially the "Jersey Blues," were very active in harassing the enemy, cutting off his foraging parties and the plundering bands of Knyphausen's Hessians. Often and often the minute-men of Monmouth would visit their homes, for the first time in years, only to defend them against the marauding attacks of these German troopers.

Our young Captain and his little command were not idle at this time of need. Hardly could an expedition leave the Hessian camp so secretly that these watchful eyes did not learn of it, and Hardly could the troopers move so quickly or quietly that a small but gallant band would not dash in upon the rear-guard, and cause considerable mischief, or at least avenge the attack and rescue the prisoners. Then did the young Conover appear on the most-troopers flying horse, burdened with hard knocks instead of hoary, that the whole Knyphausen brigade learned to dread the name of Cool Conover, or "Kovenhoven," as they called him.

During the night succeeding the battle of Monmouth Sir Henry Clinton made his last position on the battle-ground, and retreated toward the sea-board. Washington also withdrew northward, leaving the New-Jersey campaign, under General Dickenson, to watch the motions of the enemy. Divided into small watching parties they covered the whole line of his march, carrying out this harassing system of tactics then scorned to be regular, under the name of "bush-fighting," but since adopted into the best armies of the world.

That Captain Conover was a leader in this trying service may be inferred from the words, the Hessians were the objects of his special attention.

Knyphausen's dragoons formed a part of Clinton's rear-guard; their orders were strict, and were punished with a promptness and severity which exasperated them to the last degree. Many an old farmer hears them yet, in the dead hours of these struggles.

At noon, the second day of their march, the dragoons halted near Eatontown. On resuming the route a detachment of about sixty men displayed from the main body of the column full westward toward Long Branch. From his look-out, near at hand, Conover distinguished the buff facings of a Continental officer riding in their midst. Unwilling to spare a single man from service which needed more than all, he resolved to follow them alone. Depositing his rifle to the lieutenant, he set out, with a grim smile of determination, by a long, single-handed race. Now and then armed ruffians, nearly every one of whom had cause to hate him bitterly.

Familiar enough to the foot of the ground, he easily kept near the troops, sometimes gaining an advance by crossing corners and lying in wait for them to pass intervening roads. Thus, before the open country afforded him no shelter. The prisoner he recognized as Lieutenant-Colonel Reynolds, of New York, who had distinguished himself the day of battle. Amos rightly supposed they were hastening to conduct him on board the fleet, the flag of war Vulture, known to be in the offing as the advance-guard of Lord Howe's fleet.

As the troops reached the sea-board, where old home land-marks grew more and more frequent, and an occasional glimpse of the Atlantic stirred up old homesick memories, the spirit-mood of the hireling invaders became almost uncontrollable. He could serve restrain his impulse to fire on them, and then spring in a race for life at night and hell.

Instead of stopping, as he had expected, at Long Branch, they kept on toward Deal; and his thoughts, which had wandered over the whole prisoner, turned with breathless anxiety to his home and to Alice. Would the dragoons continue to hasten forward and warn his friends of the near danger; the road was entirely clear—running through the open fields, and he was strong with greatest difficulty he contrived to keep covered in the rear.

On arriving at Hendricksen's Lane the dragoons stopped, and, after consulting together a moment, turned [illegible]—apparently attracted by the sleek cattle in the "meadow-lot." With a shout and groan Amos watched them; and hardly had the last man disappeared from sight when he was leaping into the field, and, crouching along a dry ditch, followed at a trotted shot. As they turned into the door-yard of the house, he gained the shelter of a hay-stack, and, peering out, saw Alice come forth, startled by the tramp of horses. Leveler than ever she had grown in her mouth, where it volume out and pours across the beach into the sea, a broad, shallow stream. The procession, accordingly, passed down the beach, and the prisoner, where [illegible] forced to cross with precise military ceremony. First, the horsemen, then the foot were ordered over, and when they were in position on the other side, the prisoner and his twelve keepers entered the stream, then the whole party guarded within the captive was crossing—a very wise disposition, no doubt, but one just calculated to afford the daring Hendricksen a chance for revenge. Nor was he slow to perceive and improve it. When in the middle of the stream he contrived to stumble against the prisoner, on the off-side of his horse, and threw two of them without falling himself. During the confusion occasioned by their struggling and spattering in the water, with a mighty effort he burst his bonds and was off, for out in the boiling surf.

After the Dutch bewildered astonishment had subsided the first impulse was to fire on the bold swimmer. The troopers' pistols were soon fired, and then the captain concluded 'twas only a waste of powder. They would have the pleasure of seeing him soon enough, when he would walk ashore to be hung after all.

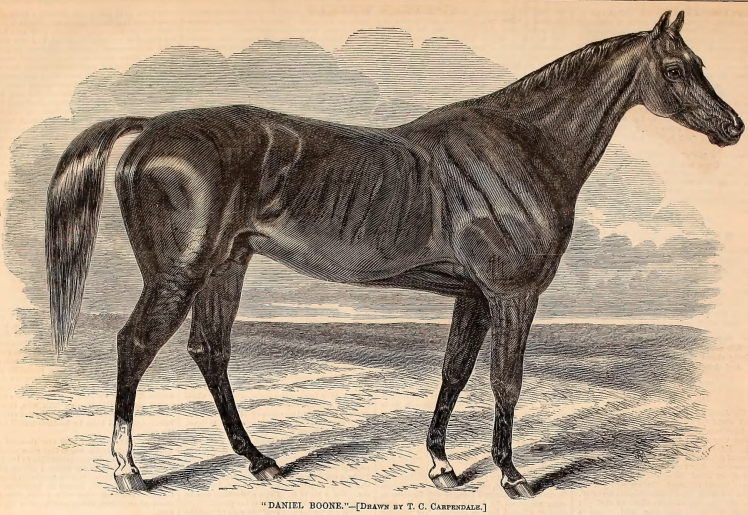
It certainly did seem impossible that any human being could exist in the surf that day. The wind had been blowing a gale from the southward and eastward, and the breakers rolled in over the line higher than a two-story house. But to Cool Conover the chances were not so utterly desperate as they seemed. Familiar with the spot from childhood, he understood well all its dangers and all human means of overcoming them. For the rest he trusted to Providence. Swimming with all his strength, he would dive under the wall of each wave as he met it, and gaining a little as it passed over him, would take a long breath and be ready for the next one. And so, more than half the time deep buried in the water, he strove manfully on, determined to drown rather than go back. Two or three times his brain whirled round, and the blackness of darkness came over him before his hard-tried limbs could force him through the ugly waters. Buffeted and dashed about, in spite of his best efforts, by the swirling seas, his soul spirit and flesh been strong and resolute that he would not be thus hung in a cow yard. But at last, weary and worn, in sad plight indeed, he did pull through. In still water outside the bar, however, he gathered all his energies together, he could float with only his nose and mouth out of water and rest in comparative comfort. His trials were not yet over, however. If he proposed to wait and land under cover of night he must have felt that his situation was hopeless. As the lengthened shadows slowly gathered into twilight he could see the dragoons extending their line up and down shore, evidently intending to land there on the sand. Now swimming in a little way as the first breaker buoys him up, he can see them gathering wood for their camp fires. The captain has a solid glass and is looking off, watching for the Vulture perhaps. Amos wishes she would stand in and pick him up; there might be a chance of exchange. Now there is a hurried movement down shore, and the single cabin he sees. What can it be?

Far away to the southward a little speck, at one moment dancing feather-like on the topmost crest of a wave, the next lost in the trough of the sea. A bit of drift wouldn't ride so light as that; surely it must be a boat? And with rapid strokes, hand over hand, Amos swimmer toward the nearest shore. But soon he is forced to stop breathless; and floating awaits the approach of the little object slowly driving nearer. It is indeed a boat, a tiny, crescent-shaped, canoe-like surf-skiff, lapstreaked, oak, narrow cedar boat, and weighing hardly more than a hundred pounds. Amos knows all this in a moment. That skiff was built by his hands, for his own little boat, tasting Alice's name, the name he couldn't paint out, nohow. And—God bless her!—Alice herself holds the oars.

With flying curls, and head over shoulder, she watches the tremendous seas as they come thundering in, throwing out instant determination to keep full bark. But, guided by her steady hand, the good skiff springs lightly up, high up the almost perpendicular width of water, lingers an instant on its foam-crowned crest, then with a dart, like the swoop of an osprey, shoots swiftly down the far side.

Amos waves his hand and tries to shout. His breath is almost gone, and his throat nearly filled with salt-water, comes only a gurgling moan. No matter, he has seen her and she knows it.

They have not yet lost too from the shore. The valiant Hessians are drawn up in battle array. The enemy is in sight; a defenseless girl; out on the heavy surf, alone in an open boat. Come, age, brave soldiers, fifty carbines strong. Steady in the ranks now. "Make ready! Take aim! Fire!"



Two or three scattering shots answer the command. The marksmen as well have been fast at a swallow on the wing as at that soaring, diving little eggs-ball, tossing on the long seas. For humanity's sake let us believe that most of the troopers emptied their guns, and not, as they assert, that the ocean spray has dampened their powder.

Alice does not even know of the kind messages the Hessians are sending after her. Every nerve is sharply bent, every fibre on which strength, the noble girl sees only the coming waves—bears only their hollow roar as they dash upon the sand. The boat shoots out of an only swamp her feet, and leave her—brother to them. Once not once turn her head, but with steady, well-timed strokes, drives on near to him. Through almost exhausted, he swims into the surf to meet her. She sees him coming, and waits in the trough, as he knows from toward the next coming wave. He grasps the quarter-rail, and she leans far over the side to aid to lubmen [illegible] as he clambers in. But the wave lifts the light boat away from him, and his strength is all gone. For the first time he pulls with shaking hands. What can she do? If she but move toward him, the canoe will turn over, and both be lost. Her despair is complete when the next sea lets him rise and, then the other, and drop into the sea. The next moment, however, she prepares once more the steering, and, swiftly encouragingly. Clinging to the board, he directs her, in hoarse, choking whispers, to pull out with the bow. How gladly she bends to the work! The little boat does not lift quicker to a sea than her heart to his gasping words.

"It's a very long way, Amos dear," said her strength is renewed as her hand's touch his, cold and insensible though they are. The little boat lifts him into the seat, where he sinks down, limp and lifeless enough—near indeed to the alternative which he chose rather than hanging.

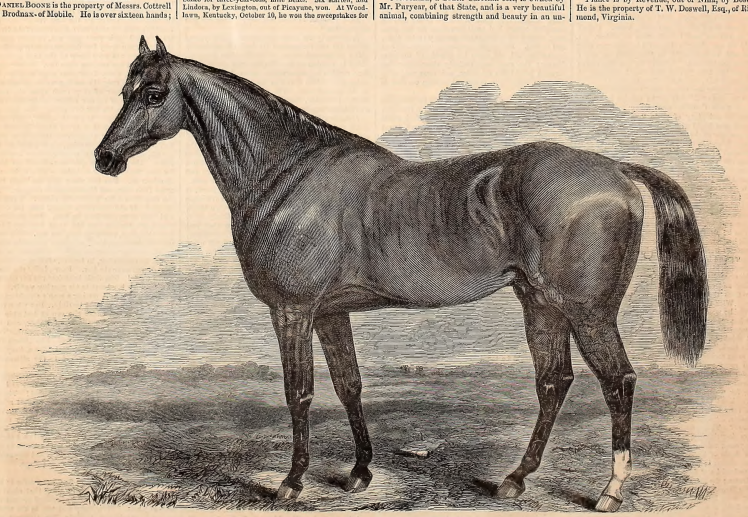
Oh for a girl, in these days, with the forethought which placed in that boat a heavy coat and the stores a half-starved man might need! Thanks to such considerateness, and to the kindest ministrations, Amos soon revived, and, with the oars pulling lustily, approaches, by light of the stars. That he was not much the worse for his long bath I infer from his unwilling back to Deal that night, surprising the Hessians with force enough to put them utterly to rout, rescuing Colonel Reynolds, and saving his home and hers from pillage.

I know not what change may have come to the hearts of Alice Hendricksen during that night as the sea; but certain it is the afterward became the wife of Amos. Whether the story was told to the writer saved by their son, Captain Ben Conover, the brave old wrecker of Deal.

"DANIEL BOONE."—[DRAWN BY T. C. CARPENDALE.]

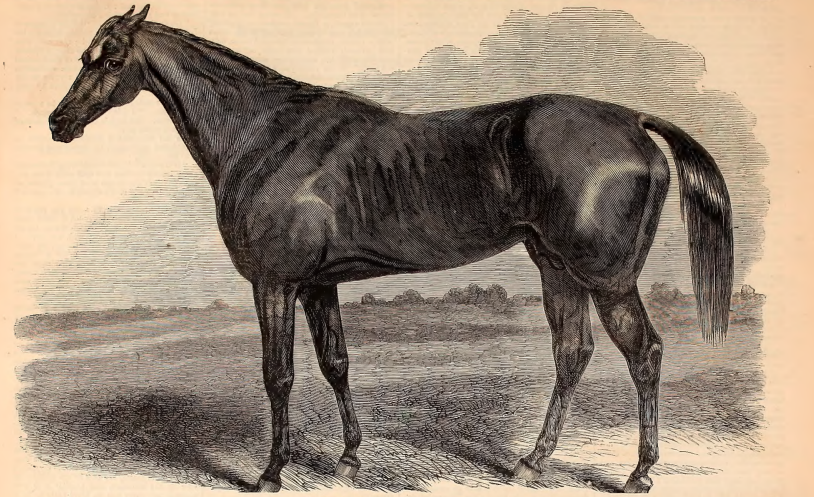
THE GREAT RACE NEXT WEEK.

WE publish herewith portraits of Congaree, Planet, and Daniel Boone, the three horses which are to run for the great $20,000 sweepstakes on 25th, on the Fashion Course. Seldom has any race in this country attracted so much attention, and the amount of money invested in bets is said to be unusually large. The rivalry between Daniel Boone, the champion of the West, and Congaree, the champion of the South, appears to partake of the warmth of the Presidential contest.



DANIEL BOONE is the property of Messrs. Cottrell and Brodnax of Mobile. He is over sixteen hands; strong and well furnished; his color, bay brown, with black legs and white fetlocks. Wilkes's Spirit publishes the following record of his pedigree and performance:

"Daniel Boone is by Lexington, out of Magnolia by Imp. Glencoe. He made his first appearance when a three-year-old at Lexington, Kentucky, May 23, 1859, and was beaten in the Association Stake for three-year-olds, mile heats. The chestnut colt by Albion, dam by Leviathan, won, and Boone was distanced in the third heat with two others. At the fall meeting at the same place, September 21, he was beaten in the Great Produce Stake for three-year-olds, mile heats. SIX started, and Lindora, by Lexington, out of Pizayune, won. At Woodlawn, Kentucky, October 10, he won the sweepstakes for three-year-olds, two-mile heats, beating the chestnut colt by Wagner, dam by Glencoe; Lindora, by Lexington; Endorser, by Wagner; and the bay filly by Lexington, dam by Imp. Maegrave. At Memphis, Tennessee, November 8, he won the Jockey Club Purse, two-mile heats, beating Hempland, Mary Wylie, and Birdcatcher. At Mobile, Alabama, March 15, 1860, won the Campbell Handicap, two-and-a-half-mile heats, beating Nicholas I. The latter carried 105 pounds, Boone 86 pounds. At the Metairie Spring Meeting, April 7, won the Crescent Post-stake, for all ages, two-mile heats, beating Planet, by Revenue, and Sigma, by Epitlon."



CONGAREE, a South Carolina colt, is owned by Mr. Puryear, of that State, and is a very beautiful animal, combining strength and beauty in an unusual degree. He is a bright bay. He is by Imp. Glencoe, out of Millwood, by Monarch, and has won a great number of races. He is four years old.

The celebrated chestnut stallion PLANET is a model of symmetry and perfection. His immense depth of leg and length of quarter indicate surprising stoutness, and his admirable condition looks like running. His reputation as a four-mile horse is too well established to need our comments.

Planet is by Revenue, out of Nina, by Boston. He is the property of T. W. Doswell, Esq., of Richmond, Virginia.

A DAY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER.

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER VIII.

So absorbed was I in the reflections of which my last chapter is the record that I utterly forgot how time was speeding, and perceived at last, to my great surprise, that I had strayed miles away from the Rosary, and that evening was already near. The spires and roofs of a town were distant about a mile off at a bend of the river, and for this I now made, determined on no account to turn back, for how could I ever again face those who had read the terrible narrative of the priest's letter, and before whom I could only present myself as a cheat and impostor?

"No," thought I, "my destiny points onward—and to Blondel; nothing shall turn me from the path." Less than an hour's walking brought me to the town, of which I had but time to learn the name—New Ross—as I left it in a small steamer for Waterford, a little vessel in correspondence with the mail packet for Melford, and which I learned would sail that evening at nine.

The same night saw me seated on the deck bound for England. On the deck, I say, for I had need to husband my resources, and travel with every imaginable economy, not only because my resources were small in themselves, but that having left all that I possessed of clothes and luggage at the Rosary, I should be obliged to acquire a complete outfit on reaching England.

It was a calm night with a starry sky and a tranquil sea, and when the cabin passengers had gone down to their berths the captain did not oppose my stealing "aft" to the quarter-deck, where I could separate myself from the somewhat riotous company of the harvest laborers that thronged the fore-part of the vessel. He saw, with that instinct a sailor is eminently gifted with, that I was not of that class by which I was surrounded, and with a ready courtesy he admitted me to the privilege of isolation.

"You are going to enlist, I'll be bound," said he, as he passed me in his short deck walk.

"Ain't I right?"

"No," said I; "I'm going to seek my fortune."

"Seek your fortune!" repeated he, with a slighting sort of laugh. "One used to read about fellows doing that in story books when a child, but it's rather strange to hear of it nowadays."

"And may I presume to ask why should it be more strange now than formerly? Is not the world pretty much what it used to be? Is not the drama of life the same stock piece our forefathers played ages ago? Are not the actors and the actresses made up of the precise materials their ancestors were? Can you tell me of a new sentiment, a new emotion, or even a new crime? Why, therefore, should there be a seeming incongruity in reviving any feature of the past?"

"Just because it won't do, my good fellow," said he, bluntly. "If the law catches a fellow lounging about the world in these times it takes him up for a vagabond."

"And what can be finer, grander, or freer than a vagabond?" cried I, with enthusiasm. "Who, I would ask you, sees life with such philosophy? Who views the jails, the snares, the petty conflicts of the world with such a reflective calm as his? Caring little for personal indulgence, not solicitous for self-gratification, he has both the spirit and the leisure for observation. Diogenes was the type of the vagabond, and see how successive ages have acknowledged his wisdom!"

"If I had lived in his day, I'd have set him picking oakum for all that!" replied he.

"And probably, too, would have sent the 'blind old bard to the crank,'" said I.

"I'm not quite sure of whom you are talking," said he; "but if he was a good ballad-singer, I'd not be hard on him."

"Μῆνιν ἄειδε, θεά, Πηληϊάδεω Ἀχιλῆος," spouted I out, in rapture.

"That ain't high Dutch?" asked he. "Is it?"

"No," said I, proudly. "It is ancient Greek—the godlike tongue of an immortal race."

"Immortal rascals!" broke he in. "I was in the fruit trade up in the Levant there, and such scoundrels as these Greek fellows I never met in my life."

"By what and whom made so?" exclaimed I, eagerly. "Can you point to a people in the world who have so long resisted the barbarizing influence of a base oppression? Was there ever a nation so imbued with high civilization as to be enabled for centuries of slavery to preserve the traditions of its greatness? Have we the record of any race but this, who could rise from the slough of degradation to the dignity of a people?"

"You've been a play-actor, I take it?" asked he, dryly.

"No, Sir, never!" replied I, with some indignation.

"Well, then, in the Methody line? You've done a stroke of preaching, I'll be sworn."

"You would be perjured in that case, Sir," rejoined I, as haughtily.

"At all events, an auctioneer," said he, fairly puzzled in his speculations.

"Equally mistaken there," said I, calmly; "bred in the midst of abundance, nurtured in affluence, and educated with all the solicitous care that a fond parent could bestow."

"Gammon!" said he, bluntly. "You are one of the swell mob in distress!"

"Is this like distress?" said I, drawing forth my purse, in which were seventy-five sovereigns, and handing it to him. "Count over that, and say how just and how generous are your suspicions."

He gravely took the purse from me, and, stooping down to the binnacle light, counted over the money, scrutinizing carefully the pieces as he went.

"And who is to say this isn't 'swag?'" said he, as he closed the purse.

"The easiest answer to that," said I, "is, would it be likely for a thief to show his booty, not merely to a stranger, but to a stranger who suspected him?"

"SCRUTINIZING THE PIECES CAREFULLY AS HE WENT."

"HE SADDLED AND BRIDLED A HORSE, AND RODE FOR THE SEA-COAST."

"Well, that is something, I confess," said he, slowly.

"It ought to be more—it ought to be every thing. If distrust were not a debasing sentiment, obstructing the impulses of generosity and even invading the precincts of justice, you would see far more reason to confide in than to disbelieve me."

"I've been done pretty often afore now," muttered he, half to himself.

"What's that you say?" cried I, contemptuously. "Was not the pittance that some crafty impostor wrung from your compassion well repaid to you in the noble self-consciousness of your generosity? Did not your venison on that day taste better when you thought of his pork chop? Did not your Burgundy relish the more by the memory of the glass of beer that was warming the half-chilled heart in the hovel? Oh, the mere mockery of fancying that we are not better by being deceived."

"How long is it since you had your hand shaved?" asked he, dryly.

"I have never been the inmate of an asylum for lunatics," said I, divining and answering the impertinent insinuation.

"Well, I own you are a run 'un," said he, half smiling.

"I accept even this humble tribute to my originality," said I, with a sort of proud dignance. "I am well aware how far it must be regarded who dares to assert his own individuality."

"I like very curious to know," said he, after a pause of several minutes, "how a fellow of your stamp sets to work about gaining his livelihood? What's his first step? How does he go about it?"

I gave no other answer than a smile of scornful meaning.

"I meant nothing offensive," resumed he; "but I really have a strong desire to be enlightened on this point."

"You are doubtless impressed with the notion," said I, boldly, "that men of genius, or some distinct craft, or especial profession, are alone needed by the world of their fellows; that one wants a doctor, or lawyer, or parson, or a shoemaker to gain his living, as if life had no other wants than to be clothed, and fed, and physicked, and litigated. As if humanity had not its thousand emotional moods, its wayward impulses, its trials and temptations, all of them more needing guidance, support, direction, and counsel than the sickest patient needs a physician. I, like this world that I throw myself on, I devote myself to guide infancy, to console age, to succor the orphan, and support the widow—morally, I mean."

"I begin to suspect you are a most artful vagabond," said he, half angrily.

"I have long since reconciled myself to the thought of an unjust appreciation," said I. "It is the consolation dull men accept when confronted by those of original genius, and can't help confessing that all your distrust of me has grown out of the superiority of my powers, and the humble figure you have presented in comparison with me."

"Do you make modesty among these same powers?" asked he, slyly.

"Modesty I reject," said I, "as being a conventional form of hypocrisy."

"Come down below," said he, "and take a glass of brandy-and-water. It's growing chilly here, and we shall be the better of something to cheer us."

Seated in his comfortable little cabin, and with a goodly array of liquors before me to choose from, I really felt a self-confidence in the face of which I were not nothing out of the common, I could not then be there. "There must be in my nature," thought I, "that elements which secure success, or I could not always find myself in situations so palpably beyond the accidents of my condition."

My host was courtesy itself; no sooner was his guest than he adopted toward me a manner of perfect respect. No man could have made a more precarious mode of life; never once a reference to my adventurous future. Indeed, with an almost artful reserve of good taste he always turned the conversation toward himself, and gave me a sketch of his own life.

It was not in any respects a remarkable one, though it had its share of those mishaps and misfortunes which every sailor must have confronted. He was wrecked in the Pacific, was robbed in the Havana; had his crew desert him at Valparaiso, and was boarded by Malay pirates, and sold in Barbary just as every other blue-jacket was and will be to the end of time; and I listened to the story, only marvelling what a dreary sameness pervades all these narratives. Why, for one trait of the truthful to prove his tale I could have invented fifty. Why were no little touches of sentiment or feeling, no relieving sighs of human emotion in his story; I never felt, as I listened, my wish to know how he be saved from shipwreck, baffle his persecutors, or escape his captors; and I thought to myself, "This fellow has certainly got no narrative gusto." Now for my turn; we had each of us partaken freely of the good liquor before us. The captain in his quality of talker, I in my capacity of listener, had filled and refilled several times. There was not any thing like confidence, but there was that amount of exultation, a stage higher than mere excitement, which prompts men, at least men of temperaments like mine, not to suffer themselves to occupy rear rank positions, but at any cost to become foreground and prominent figures.

"You have heard of the M'Gillicuddys, I suppose?" asked I. He nodded, and I went on. "You see, then, at this moment before you the last of the race. I mean, of course, of the elder branch, for there are swarms of the others, well to do and prosperous also, and with fine estates and properties.

"I'll not weary you with family history. I'll not refer to that remote time when my ancestors wore the crown and ruled the fair kingdom of Kerry. In the Annals of the Four Masters, and also in the Chronicles of Theabogh O'Faherlemh, you'll find a detailed account of our house. I'll simply narrate for you the immediate incident which has made me what you see me—an outcast and a beggar.

"My father was the tried and trusted friend of that noble-hearted but ill-fated man, Lord Edward Fitzgerald. The famous attempt of the year '98 was concerted between them, and all the cause of its failure, which you are sure are and forever must be, are known to him who now addresses you. I dare not enter into the details of those times of things lest I should by accident let drop what might prove strictly confidential. I will but record, with confidence, that a personal one, of the period. On the night of Lord Edward's capture, my father, who was a friend of his, made by himself the discipherncy—to dine with him, met his guest on the steps of his hall-door. Mr. Hammond—this was his name—was just about to mount, when he could scarcely speak, as my father shook his hand. 'Do you know what has happened, Jack?' said he to my father. 'Lord Edward is taken, Major Sirr and his party have tracked him to his lurking-place; they have got hold of all our papers, and we are lost. By this time to-morrow every man of us will be within the walls of Newgate.'

"'Don't look so gloomily, Tom,' said my father, 'Lord Edward will escape them yet; he's not a lord to be taken easily; and as for us, all we shall find means to slip our cables too. Come in, and enjoy your sirloin and a good glass of port, and you'll see the world more pleasantly.' With a little encouragement of this sort he chewed the cud of his dinner passed off agreeably enough; but still my father could see that his friend was by no means at his ease, and at every issue by himself in the cellarage

AT HOBOKEN.

THE wind is low, the woods are green,
The white-sailed yachts before me pass,
Their keen keels cleave the sea serene
As diamond cuts through glass.

Before me lies the queen-like town,
Around her hangs a hazy cloak
Of sunny mist, and as a crown
A coronet of smoke.

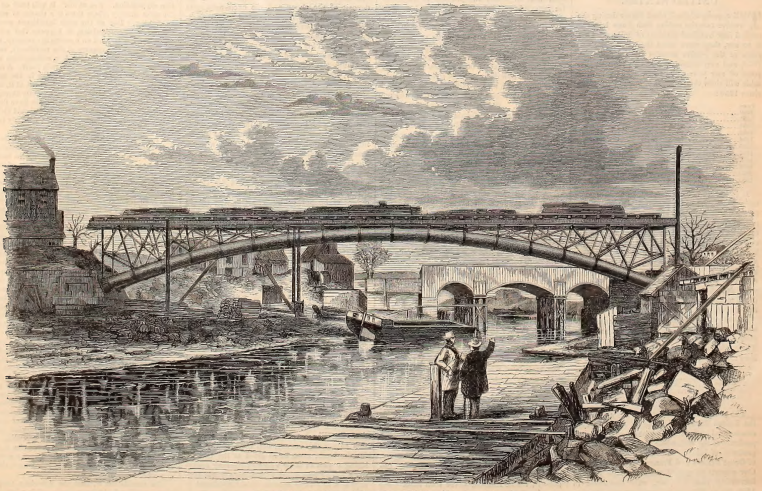
I sit and watch the ferry-boat
Alternate come, alternate go;
And as she floats my queries float—
"Ah! will she come or no?"

At last I see upon the deck
A gleam of pink, a fluttering gown,
A laughing face, a snowy neck,
And eyes of hazel brown.

Along the Elysian fields we stroll
And watch the sunburned striplings play,
And then we seek a shadowy knoll—
I something have to say.

My heart is opened, and I tell
The love that She for years has known;
I try to put in words the spell
That she has round me thrown.

All silently she answers me,
My arm creeps slowly round her waist,
About her red lips like a bee
I hover, and I taste.



The woods are green, the wind is low,
The white-sailed yachts before us glide,
As hand in hand we homeward go,
I and my promised bride.

THE MEETING.

THE old coach-road through a common of furze
With knolls of pines, ran white:
Berries of autumn, with thistles, and burrs,
And spider-threads, droopt in the light.

The light in a thin blue vail peer'd sick;
The sheep grazed close and still;
The smoke of a farm by a yellow rick
Curl'd lazily under a hill.

THE WASHINGTON AQUEDUCT BRIDGE.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

No fly shook the round of the silver net;
No insect the swift bird chased;
Only two travelers moved and met
Across that hazy waste.

One was a girl with a babe that throve,
Her rain and her bliss;
One was a youth with a lawless love,
Who clasp it the more for this.

The girl for her babe made prayerful speech;
The youth for his love did pray;
Each at a wistful look on each,
And either went their way.

THE WASHINGTON AQUEDUCT BRIDGE.

We engrave on the preceding page the WASHINGTON AQUEDUCT BRIDGE over Rock Creek, at the western end of Pennsylvania Avenue, now near completed, under the direction of Captain MEIGS. The following description of the bridge is derived from official sources:

"This bridge is a cast-iron arch of twenty feet rise and two hundred feet clear span between the abutments. The arch consists of two ribs, each of which is composed of seventeen cast-iron pipes of forty-eight inches internal diameter, and twelve feet three inches in length. Upon these two arched ribs, which are firmly connected with each other by cast-iron tubular cross braces and heavy wrought-iron diagonal ties, is erected a frame-work of heavy rolled iron H beams, from the works of the Phoenix Iron Company of Philadelphia, supporting two continuous horizontal iron girders, of two hundred and four feet six inches in length. Upon these girders are seventy beams of timber, supporting the road-way of the bridge, which embraces two carriage-ways, two foot-ways, and two gas-pipe foot-passages.

"This bridge is particularly remarkable for the double duty which the arch performs. While it supports a road-way, forming a beautiful and much-needed communication, by which the traffic between the cities of Washington and Georgetown is carried on, the water of the Washington aqueduct is conveyed into the city of Washington through the pipes of which the arch is composed. To guard against all danger of freezing the pipes are lined with sheets of resinous gum three inches and a half thickness, leaving a clear water-way in each rib of three and a half feet in diameter.

"The abutments contain vaults, in which are the connecting pipes and stop-cocks for regulating the flow and discharge of water; and in the western abutment, on the Georgetown side, one of the water-mains so as regulate mains, and contains a water-pressure engine—the first, it is believed, erected in this country.

"This engine, driving its supply from the east-iron street mains of the Washington Aqueduct, pumps ten thousand gallons of water per hour into a reservoir on the heights of Georgetown, a mile distant, and two hundred and four feet above the machine. This reservoir supplies that portion of Georgetown which is above the level of the great store and distributing reservoirs of the Washington Aqueduct."

THE FOREIGN TRADE OF THE UNITED STATES.

THE exports of the United States during the twelve months ending 30th June last exceeded four hundred millions of dollars. That is to say, they were more than twice the exports of twelve months during June 30th, 1850, and very considerably more than the exports of any year since then. The following table will show the progress of our foreign trade since 1850:

Years.	Imports.	Exports.
1850.	$178,138,318	$151,556,720
1851.	216,224,522	217,538,011
1852.	212,740,442	192,642,256
1853.	267,978,647	239,452,250
1854.	304,495,391	278,941,864
1855.	261,468,220	275,156,846
1856.	314,639,446	326,964,705
1857.	360,899,141	362,960,632
1858.	281,413,150	324,644,464
1859.	338,768,150	356,787,402
1860.	360,777,200	400,122,000

It is hardly necessary to make any remarks upon the above statement. It demonstrates in an unanswerable manner, the steady progress of the United States, in spite of financial revulsions, political disturbances, and the rennin jealousies with which this country is honored by the nations of Europe. It shows, by the test of figures, that, whatever fallacies merchants or our politicians may commit, the course of the country at large is steadily onward and upward; and that, judged by the test of all tests—material progress—our "republican experiment" is really a success.

These figures of the United States naturally divide themselves into four great divisions — gold, food, cotton, and miscellaneous. Their relative proportions last year were as follows:

Gold	$85,946,531
Food	91,596,676
Cotton	191,549,216
Miscellaneous	58,587,419
Total exports	400,167,842

The great difference between the exports of the United States and those of other leading commercial nations is, that ours are chiefly the products of the soil, while theirs are chiefly the products of labor. Four-fifths of the exports of Great Britain and France are manufactures. Our exports of manufactures, though steadily increasing year by year, only amounted in 1859–'60 to $35,454,644—rather more than a twelfth of our whole export. We have so much and such fertile land that it pays our people better to grow cotton, corn, or pork, or to dig for gold, than it does to weave or to spin or to forge. In the one case, nature assists labor; in the other, labor is unassisted: the actual increase of wealth is, therefore, greater in the former than in the latter case by just so much as nature's help may be valued at. If we could estimate in figures or dollars the work which Providence does for us in developing the seed which we plant in the earth, that amount would exactly represent the excess of our annual increase in wealth over the increase of manufacturing nations. Therefore, if there are no more new land to till up, industry will probably become more profitable than agriculture; but many years must do that this period is yet far distant.

Of all our exports cotton is by far the most profitable. It contributed, alone, almost one-half of the total export of the year 1859–'60; and the weather this year has been so favorable for the plant as last year's was, we should probably have exported considerably over $200,000,000 of cotton in the year ending 30th June, 1861. As it is, our export will not probably fall short of that of 1859–'60. The one great encouraging fact in connection with this cotton business is that it can not but go on increasing. The demand for cotton grows in the exact ratio of the spread of civilization. The supply is limited to the Southern States, no other region in the world being capable of producing the article of commerce. This is the key to the steady and remarkable increase in the cotton crop during the present generation, of which the following table affords a brief view:

Years.	Bales.	Years.	Bales.
1800–'01	4,000,000	1830–'31	2,209,000
1805–'06	3,501,081	1835–'36	2,026,766
1810–'11	3,111,982	1840–'41	2,177,835
1815–'16	2,209,000	1845–'46	2,347,634
1820–'21	2,077,000	1850–'51	3,015,029
1825–'26	2,357,500	1855–'56	3,100,017
1826–'27	2,000,000	1856–'57	2,939,000
1827–'28	2,302,982	1857–'58	3,030,497
1828–'29	2,455,000	1858–'59	3,113,379

Unless political agitations should hinder, it is fair to presume that the spread of agriculture in the Cotton States will gradually swell the crop to figures as far exceeding that of 1859 as the latter are greater than those of 1850 and 1840; while the spread of civilization will maintain the demand for the article at least as fast as the staple can be supplied.

It is different with our other two great staples—gold and food. It seems beyond question that we have passed the maximum of gold product. During the ten years which have elapsed since the gold fields of California were first successfully worked, every promising placer has been pretty thoroughly explored, the surface diggings exhausted, and the best sites stripped of their treasure. In the present time the product of gold in California is steadily declining. The product of 1859 was less than that of 1858; that of 1860—to 1st September—is about $4,000,000 less than that of 1859 to the same date. It is not likely that the auriferous rocks, which are being worked with ever-increasing skill and energy, will ever cease to yield gold; but there is reason to believe that we shall never again witness yields of $65,000,000 or $70,000,000 a year. Possibly the new discoveries of silver and quicksilver may make up the falling off in the more popular metal; but we prefer not to assume that they will. We ought to be prepared to see the gold mines of California fall into the same rank as the gold mines of Russia, and so to order our business, and especially our banking business, that no great harm can flow from a steady curtailment of our specie resources.

There is, then, no reason to fear any decline in our supply of food. It will take centuries to bring into cultivation the lands in the West, which now only feed the hands of the farmer to produce, in average years, twenty bushels of wheat or fifty of corn to the acre. The natural increase of our people will, we suppose, cattle and hogs enough to supply the world with meat. Every year the production of food increases, and must increase for half a century to come at least, in a ratio greater than the consumption of food in this country is also increasing at a marvelous rate. The old theory of the political economists with regard to the amount of food consumed by each individual in a given period of time has been exploded by the experience of this country, for we eat, as a people, a great deal more than any other people in the world. Let any one try to verify the well-known formula about wheat, viz., that every person consumes four bushels of wheat per annum, and he will discover the fact. Nor need it be a puzzle. There never was a country, perhaps, or a period where there was so much solid comfort and plenty among what Europeans call "the lower classes" as in the United States; where was a country where these classes could afford to consume so much wholesome food. The ever-recurring picture in the poor households of Great Britain, France, and Germany—famine and privation, parents stinting themselves of necessary aliment, and children crying for food they can not get—is, thank Heaven, unknown here. We can all afford to eat, and we do eat, more and of better food than Europeans; hence, notwithstanding the steady increase in our production of food, our surplus, over and above our wants, does not increase very rapidly, and we rather think that, in an average of years, our exports of food will not, under ordinary circumstances, maintain the importance in our export trade which they have hitherto possessed.

Much, in the future commerce of the United States, must depend upon the course of affairs in the Pacific. We know what the Atlantic States can do, to whom they can sell their surplus, and from whom they can buy; but the Pacific States are an unsolved problem. Nearly all of the gold is hitherto calculated for agriculture than the slopes of this continent toward the Pacific; now State as she is, and peopled mainly by miners and merchants, California exports this year 1,000,000 bushels of wheat. Oregon and Washington are at least equally fertile. Opposite the whole region, divided by an ocean twice as wide as the Atlantic, but as safe to navigate as the Hudson River, live two great nations, comprising between them one half the human race, intelligent, civilized, rich, commercial, and ripe for an extended and gainful trade with their neighbors. Evidently, the future trade of the United States will be materially affected by the nature of the intercourse which may be created between China and Japan and the Pacific coast. There are those who believe that it will far eclipse the European trade in importance, and that the Pacific Railroad will be a means of profit from the moment it which will fall to the lot of the Eastern cities. However this may be, no estimate of our future commercial history is worth consideration which does not assume the importance for the changes that must follow the creation of a great trade across the Pacific Ocean.

THE CITY CHAMBERLAIN AND THE ARTISANS' BANK.

A FEW weeks since Mayor Wood removed the City Chamberlain, and appointed a new man in his place. The change practically removed the city deposits from the Shoe and Leather Bank—of which the deposed Chamberlain was President—to the Artisans' Bank, of which the new Chamberlain is President.

The condition of the Artisans' Bank has, consequently become the subject of public attention. The financial business of the city is large. The deposits are heavy, and occasionally the credit for large amounts. Having only a small capital—$600,000—the possession of the City Account placed the Artisans' Bank in a new light in relation to the other city banks. The Chamberlain, every day, gives a check for the whole capital of the Artisans' Bank. that check, duly certified, may be deposited, or used, in other banks. At the deposit may, in his turn, draw out of that bank the $600,000 and placed to his credit; and if it should happen that the Artisans' Bank should fail between the deposit of the check and the exchanges next morning, the bank which received the check on deposit and debited itself with it, as cash, would have no recourse upon the credit of the Artisans'. This being the condition of affairs, attention was directed, some days since, to the fact that the Artisans' Bank was "running debtor," several days in succession, at the Clearing House. There were also strange rumors about the solvency of the Artisans' Bank; and it was commonly reported that statements made by certain officers of that bank were not easily reconciled with the facts, and that the bank was by no means in a prosperous condition of weakness. On the strength of these facts and rumors, a Committee was appointed by the Clearing House Association to examine the state of the suspected bank. That Committee reported, on 18th, that the bank was good for all its debts, but that it would was required to the extent of 33 per cent. The Clearing House Association refused to receive the report, and directed the Committee to prosecute their examination more thoroughly, and to report, by 25th, whether or no the banks should, as a body, receive on deposit checks on the Artisans' Bank. In anticipation of this report, the Artisans' Bank on 19th voluntarily withdrew from the Clearing House, and became a private banking institution requiring an account in the American Exchange Bank.

As, however, the President of the Artisans' Bank continues the City Chamberlain, we may observe that the inconvenience of having the City Account in a bank whose credit is suspected is obvious. In these days of political corruption, it is of the highest importance that the city funds should be not only out of danger, but in so safe a place that no one should dream of risk. Again, the care of depository of the city funds is one of great delicacy and responsibility. At times, over a million of dollars of the city money is on deposit—without interest—to the credit of the Chamberlain in the bank where he keeps his account. The temptation to use this money, and to earn dividends for the bank, must be as great as the risk of losing a part of it by unsound banking operations. The least spark of prudence would suggest that the whole deposit should be placed in an institution where, in the event of accident, its recovery should be beyond question. Within the next week or ten days not less than three millions of dollars will be paid to the City Chamberlain for the city. Will it be quite safe, even under the new arrangement?

Rumor is, of course, busy on the subject of the means by which the Artisans' Bank obtained the City Account, and of the sacrifices it has since made to retain it. It is unfortunate for Mr. Fernando Wood, Mayor of New York, that his character does not screen him from imputations of which men less unpleasantly known could afford to laugh. For our part, we give Mr. Wood credit for sagacity enough to see that a respectful gift of twenty or thirty thousand dollars would involve a loss so much greater in the future that the game would not be worth the candle. Of many of the allegations, of course, no one expects any thing but rogues, corruption, cheating, and iniquity. But Mr. Wood is sufficiently shrewd enough to look for something better than what a man of his position could earn by honest trading in a twelvemonth; and we take for granted, therefore, that, whatever is done, he will not stand in the way of the public interest.

THE LOUNGER.

ABOUT COMPLEXION.

In the city of New York there will never be a word wanting in praise of commerce. At a Catholic Show or Agricultural Fair the orator always tells his heroes that they follow the oldest and most reverend of callings, and they applaud with heartiness, for they believe him, and they like to be well spoken of. The animal is not yet found who does not like to be tickled, if you can only find the proper place to tickle.

Now a city like New York is a permanent commercial Cattle-Show, and the fraternity engaged are always glad to hear and to believe that the richest and greatest and best of people themselves, but that they owe even the cause of the prosperity of the cardinal virtues among all people with whom they are brought into communication in any part of the globe. The Reverend Benjamin Gurney never fails to decorate his discourses with allusions to merchant-princes, and to dilate upon the Christ-inculcating influences of commerce. The Honorable Lemuel Lumpell, in his political speeches, informs the audience that commerce is the priest of human liberties and progress.

These worthy gentlemen doubtless believe what they say. Blarney and Lumpell are synonymous with honesty and fervent piety. Therefore, in the one case, are very apt to publish the sermon, and in the other to print the speech. The press, in the other, to have the orator made an M.C. It is perfectly intelligible. Those two excellent gentlemen have discovered the particular place in which that particular animal likes to be tickled; and they have produced the happiest results to all concerned by the humble accent of a whisper.

But the assumption is the old story of post hoc propter hoc. Trade originally seeks a private advantage. Trade penetrates into Africa. It may make money out of Japan. If money is not to be made there, Trade will not stop to introduce Christian civilization. Not at all. It will push on to the next country where there is a chance of money-making. But as the most intelligent people are the most enterprising, it happens that when commerce has secured an opening in a country, the civilization of the country of the natives is such as it is, follows. But that is a consequence not contemplated nor cared for by Trade itself. A cow which thinks there is better grazing in the next pasture may break down the wall to get at it, and a lovely lady may deliberately walk quietly after—and a lady who could not otherwise have done it; but it were a gamesome cow that should claim the honor of having introduced the fair lady to a walk in the fresh fields and pastures new.

The moral influence of trade or commerce is to be studied upon the same principle. For instance. Does it there elevate manners and purify the moral sentiments? Is it on the moral progress of any nation always proportionate to the development of its commercial spirit? On the contrary, the profitless of mankind seems in best to contain that which is that shall not debauch the conscience of nations. Napoleon's sneer at the nation of shop-keepers was legitimate. The shop-keeping class always keeps the present condition at all hazards. Change is synonymous with danger. Improvement is to that spirit just as a specious name for evil. Peoples was convinced that such a people would purchase peace at the cost of a great deal of money and of moral cowardice. Or who supposes that the simple, hardy virtues are so common in Holland to-day as when her sons and daughters were under water rather than suffer it to remain under a rule which was repugnant to them? Yet the Dutch have been of the most eminent traders in modern times. Is there a corresponding eminence in the moral tone of Dutch society? And Echo answers, Is there?

The Cattle-Show Committee justly vote a vote of thanks to the eloquent speaker who has celebrated the antiquity and dignity of their calling—the parish gratefully accords its influence to the Doctorate for the bland Blarney—and the pleased vendors of Trade clearly perceive the particular fitness of Lumpell to adorn a Congressional arm-chair; but History is over all; even beyond Blarney and Lumpell. It makes up the great final record, and it shows, not for the purpose of tickling, but of teaching, that the expansion and growth of moral character are not according to the extent of trade, and that it yet remains to be demonstrated that a commercial oligarchy would benefit the nation over which it ruled more than any other aristocracy.

The conviction is, that the American people have repudiated the aristocratic spirit wherever it shows itself.

THE RISING OF THE CURTAIN.

THE Ravels have retired to some retreat in France to pass the evening of their days upon the solid earth, and to dwell no more upon tight ropes and the ends of perpendicular poles. Yet a certain Lounger wonders as he writes whether the Ravels who have done this wise thing are Ravels, or whether the name is merely a traditional title for certain people who do certain things. Is Ravel a family name? Could so many of one kindred to make of both—mother and cork? Is Diogenes a Ravel, ex officio?

However, I did not mean to look at the Ravels, who are gone, but at Mr. Forrest, who is coming. He is playing again. Probably it is a farewell engagement, but that seems to be the only kind that great players now undertake; for Mr. Forrest is unquestionably a great player. Not in the abstract, perhaps; but there are certain kinds of character which he can apparently adequately portray. He is of the muscular dramatic school—the brawny school—the beam preferred school. Humor he probably has not. It would be pleasant to hear him; but he really feels the point of a joke. How do you think he would do for Charles Surface? Can you fancy him as Mercutio? Is the wit of Sheridan or Shakespeare a device of a better Spartacus or Jack Cade as they are historically known. But it would not be easy to imagine Edmund Kean as Spartacus or Gerlick as Jack Cade.

Within his range, therefore, to cut out of it—he may be called a great player. The ideal of Spartacus is simply a robust gladiator condemned to fight. It is a case of the sanguinary F. B. When he comes on nobody doubts that he beholds the gladiator as adequately as he could be presented upon the stage. It is not fair to suppose that the gladiatorial voice was something rough—that the gladiatorial r's were rolled a good deal in getting them out, etc., etc. But the Hamlet, the slender, dreamy, delicate-thoughted Prince of Denmark, do you suppose he made eyes and gurgled his r's? If Forrest is to play Shakespeare, it is in the usual sense of the word. That shadowy refinement which deeply lovers will recognize in Shakespeare's characters, as this autumn air, with a touch of sadness which we feel and can not see, makes the whole landscape poetical, can not be understood by appreciated by a kindred genius, or the words and the situations fail to reproduce the character. It is impossible to imagine Mr. Forrest's Othello to be Shakespeare's; but it is no shame to a man's talent that it can not equally illustrate every effort.

We are presently to see Miss Cushman upon the same stage. She is one of the two most famous actors; nor are they in many qualities altogether unlike. Of Miss Cushman's playing we shall have a word hereafter. How different her career has been from that of many who began more brilliantly! Miss Cushman commenced as a singer. Losing her voice (though it is still sweet and effective in picturesque ballad singing), she became a stock actress at the old Park. Her combined talent and energy seemed to have pushed her at last to her career, until she stands at the head of her profession in the estimation, by the bye, of Mr. Forrest. But where is Miss Heron?—she who certainly more excited "the town" than any actress since Fanny Kemble or Clara Fisher? Gone she was, upon a certain snowy Saturday night, challenged, in the eager admiration of cultivated men, a comparison with Rachel and Ristori! Where is she? of whom now was I what a blaze of sudden glory! Did you see her when she was here last? Do you know any one who has seen her? Have you ever known she had been here?

It is curious while we are still chatting of the theatre, that Edwin Booth, who is the full heir of his father's genius, and is so recognized in many places, is so quietly unknown to the outside public of New York. His Hamlet is of the kind that makes girls dream and despair. His Horace is called by thoughtful critics a revelation. And yet it not be worth while to give him a fair chance here, with a good company, and at a good time of year? He can but fail. Who for a single evening, in mid-summer. Shall we not see and hear that Hamlet and that Horace?

THE LAST OF WALKER.

THE man who has unscrupulously shot so many men in cold blood has recently himself been shot. Is there any romantic regret for his fate? But you can not make a hero of William Kidd. He suffered at Execution Dock, a condemned felon for offenses a hundred-fold less heinous than those of Walker. If some of the many who know the details of the career of this barbarous Corsair will publish them, you would be amazed at the terrible criminality of the man. When he first went to Nicaragua it had the pretense of an excuse—that his object was patent throughout. When he had utterly vanished and blasted the country he commenced its escaping with his neck, and universal contempt extinguished him. In his recent invasion of Honduras he was confidently run for buck; and buck has run dismally against him.

Every honest American must regret that this man was a countryman for he has shorn none of the qualities which command admiration, win respect, or inspire confidence. Every honest American must regret, also, that his own Government had not punished him. It may be very true that a great, prosperous, united, and civilized nation will gradually and surely extend its domination over neighbors who are weak, and forever warring among themselves. But it will not be extended by such men as William Walker, nor by such means as his. It was in the spirit of the time that Spain swelled her possessions, by the basis of the great and little pirates of the Gulf, who overran Central America three centuries and more ago. It is in the spirit of the time that our territorial expansion should be peaceful and benignant. A nation may have ambition as well as an individual. It may have an honor, also, which shall be something better than what generally passes by that name. What American will not hope that his country has them both? What American would not doubt it, when he reads between the Nicaraguan aid meetings in New York, and the fact that this Kidd the Less had a kind of social recognition?

The only reparation he could make to outraged humanity was dying quietly. Probably when we hear of his execution we shall hear that he did so. It is not difficult for those who have seen him to picture that small, insignificant form, the flat head of thin sandy hair, the light, heavy or blue eyes, the smooth face expressing no emotion nor ability, in cold stubborn waiting for the end. However quick, however misguided, however incompetent, however guilty of bloodshed and harm he may have been, he has been but personally indifferent in a very humane cause, then, while his individual fate might be thought not undeserved, all generous hearts would have wept for him with stirred pity.

TOWN AND COUNTRY.

"In a man wants to make sure of the ruin of his soul, let him settle his into some prosperous country town, instead of keeping him under his own eye at home."

The Lounger, while he was lately lounging, heard the remark earnestly made by a man who had a son to educate. The same thing has been sometimes heard before. For who does not desire to believe in the virtues of the rural population? Who, while he looks up to the city, has not a secret suspicion that the country is Arcadia—that swains and nymphs dance upon the green—and that Queens of May, innocence, and simplicity crown the haunt villages, "country sides," and small towns?

Doubtless the Lounger clubs every week with many who live in all these places, and as they read these words they are asking themselves the question, whether boys are not safer in the country than in a town, this is to say, at school, not their own children. In the town, all kinds of resorts for all kinds of pernicious pleasure—the theatres, dram-shops, billiard-rooms, gambling-houses, amusements of all kinds, and places which are not advertised in papers, but which are known to the crowd of vagabonds, shiftless adventurers, and polite scoundrels; and still in addition, there is the vice, envious competition, and the love of appearance, in which so much misery is rooted. In the country there is a greater publicity of individual life, fewer temptations, more virtue, more health, more vigor, less excitement of contact, a consequently moderated tone, and simpler manners. And so on, and with all these, external conditions of health which are more normal and promising.

But, on the other hand, there are the dangers of the city is to be urged the incomparable advantage of parental superintendence. In the country the boy finds liquor, if he will, in the village, if he desires to; in the absence of the usual entertainments he is obliged to invent amusements, and they are not always of the best. The temptations of his life, in a community where every individual is conspicuous, are fewer, and the vice which he concealls adroitly what he is doing when he doubts its welcome reception by the observer.

The test mentions, you remember, as one of the alternatives, "keeping him under his own eye at home. That is the essential condition of the case. The first can be said of many a boy who goes to school in Kansas, if he is sending his son to an Eastern school, to send him to one in the rural counties of New York rather than to the city. But generally the schools are equally good. Unquestionably without the parental eye the chances are in favor of the country.

But, if you please, how many children are not sent off to school to be out of the way? Is the gentleman who gave us the text lives in the country, and he can have the parental eye freely fixed, but what eye is daily on the city boy? For the best occupations of most men in the city are so incessant that there often comes to be a kind of restraint in their intercourse with their own children. When a parent becomes a schoolmaster in the eye of his son, the son will do better, probably, at another school.

There is a great deal of good literature about the advantages of sending boys to school in the city of the world and he made men. Yes, it is a good thing to be lurdy and heroic, and a puny business it is to find to manufacture a hero; but a boy may be not the alternative. A city school will smuh your boy, at that is what you want, quite as well as the country one. Heroes are quite as apt to graduate at Grey Friars' as at Mr. Squeers's, at the Ward Schools of New York as at the Academy of Athens.

It is a matter to be as gravely discussed as it was earnestly proposed. In a thousand instances it is a deadening, and in a few a fatal, step for when in any just sense the parental eye can be put in full play and kept there, the question is already settled.

OUR NEXT NEIGHBOR.

WHO knows any thing of Mexico? It is a state of immense resources, lying by our side upon the continent; it has a distinctive history and population; it is perpetually in the general talk; few of us know any thing more about it than that Mr. Prescott wrote a book about it, that one of the conquest of Mexico from the Spanish point of view, and that we had a war with it, some dozen years or more since which increased our territory but not our knowledge.

Because there are constant troubles there, it does not follow that both sides are in the right and both in the wrong, and that there is consequently no choice between them. The most intelligent observers, who have long resided in the country and are familiar with its character and condition from personal experience, have a very decided opinion upon the subject, and are very confident that the country would also have one could the facts be understood.

Unhappily, while it remains an entirely foreign nation, it is not likely that the American people will have, or care to have, any more accurate knowledge of it. It is only as we have a positive interest in it that we shall be properly informed. But that moment may prove to be too late for our real advantage.

A serial publication, a few numbers of a little magazine called "The Mexican Papers," have been issued by Mr. Edward E. Dunbar, a gentleman thoroughly acquainted with the subject. He is not professionally a literary man, and his pamphlets are like vigorous, pointed conversation. His interest in the matter is purely commercial, partly patriotic. But his feeling is that the prayer of history of Mexico has never been written; that our accounts are all strained through Spanish sieves; that Mr. Prescott, following the Spanish Chronicles, has followed the Spanish story; and that the present condition of things is a legitimate result of Spanish assumptions in Mexico. The treaties that you may peruse, they are simply, in this view, the various aspects of the great struggle between the Church, or aristocratic principle, forced by Spain, and the popular, or Democratic principle, which is essential to the progressive development of the country.

It is a shabby habit not to know our neighbors—not to be able to tell whether Miramon is the aristocratic or revolutionary leader; whether we should wish well to Spain in any effort she may make, or not—in short, to know, when the papers give us the last news, what the last news means. If you care to correct this habit, Mr. Dunbar's pamphlets will help you in the pleasantest way. He says very hard things of the Catholicism, and religion to that class some whom we had supposed to deserve the same reputation. Probably you will not altogether agree with him in some of his general views; but he is an enthusiast, and therefore the most agreeable of companions.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

DWARFS AND GIANTS.

WHAT a blunder to talk of Napoleon the Great! How silly even to think of Napoleon as great! The Napoleon here meant is Napoleon the First. By "most glorious" Napoleon all Europe was cursed.

Napoleon the Sleyer, Napoleon the Thief,
His idol was glory, which brought him to grief;
Great soldier he was, but in his greatness I vow,
Must we honor old Nick for his fiery throne?

If the spirit that did, in the first, demon's work,
Is under our feet, and Napoleon is lost,
There's a question to which I would bid it reply,
Is the spirit of Napoleon dead as I is?

I'd ask it, now glory's true worth it has known,
Would it here Gambetta's renown or its own;
Or sweet joy of peace, whether it could make
Between fighting for Conquest and Liberty's sake?

The Hero who battles for Freedom and Right,
I say to the self-seeking Conqueror Night;
Of the first let the memory be sweet as the rose:
Of the other, a curse to the end of time.

In content with my neighbor and proud of my hunch,
But I'd be Garibaldi if I were not Punch.
Prosper, World, the movement that filled thee with groans;
Extol the subverter of tyrannous thrones!

THE WHOPS WOMAN.—Mr. O'Dion has addressed a letter full of flattering compliments and Mission non-sense to Mr. Mario Mario—the author of the silly pamphlet called "Whops Woman's Possibility," with which O'Dion must have undoubtedly his effusion. THE GAME OF CHANCE AT THE DIVORCE COURT.—Double, or Quits.

Walker and Winston counties were visited by a severe storm on the 13th, which greatly injured the crops. While the lightning killed seven sheep and Miss Louisa Martin, and hurt two others of the family.—Huntsville Advocate.

GENERAL WASHINGTON'S MOTTO.—In 1817, in a debate in the House of Representatives on the bill relative to the siege of Virginia, in which something was said of military titles, Mr. Sterret [——-ret] replied and applied to Gen. Scudds of General Washington, which he had received from the Secretary of War, and which had formed the constitution of the United States. The subject of power to grant the title of nobility was referred to a committee, who on the topic. A member made a motion to strike out the words "or any person holding any office of profit or trust," so that no person could hold any office of profit or trust under the United States at any one time with more than three thousand dollars a year.

Father went to the barber's and had his whiskers taken off. Upon returning home, he found that he was in little daughter three years old), who, running up to him, said, "Eh, papa, you look like!"

Tom Cones, a newly-elected sheriff, was told by the jailer to open court. He went to the door and shouted, "All call court, all court!"

"Call Mr. H. Jones and R. Moore," said the judge.

"Yes, sir," said the sheriff. "Mr. H. Jones—Mr. H. Jones and A. R. Moore!" yelled Bob

"Not at all, Mr. Sheriff."

"One at a time—one at a time!"

"Not at all, Mr. Sheriff."

"Needn't come; we've fired it!" screamed the determined sheriff.

There was no court that day.

It is said of Sir William Longstaff, of Exeter County, that on one occasion he came into company with a facetious wag, who had in his hand a small but handsome cane, which Sir William requested him to give him as his own. "I would," replied the wag, "but I assure you, Sir, this cane is too short for a long staff Long-staff."

A LAWYER engaged in a case tormented a witness so much by cross-questions that he gave follow at last cried for water. "There," said the judge, "I thought you'd pump him dry."

LOTE TERESA.—The gossips tell a funny story, in which Miss Rosina Anderson and a favorite Parisian actress play the principal parts. Both of the Bayards were suitors for the fair lady's smiles, and both seemed to be equally esteemed by her. It would appear that in Russia, as well as in many other countries, a lock of hair is considered a signal pledge of the tender passions; but, if the truth must be told, few of our theatrical favorites are endowed with profuse chevelures, and if they were, the constant demand for ringlets would soon leave many of the fashionable girls in the possession of auburn ringlets, and wouldn't get the love of them for less than a dollar. One of these suitors, Lote de Monsoreau, both of whom loved the fair lady of the Bayards, gallantly begged for a tress of her natural Dudleies. Each one's love, as it were, was locked in certain locks. A lock of, and without touching a single creature really sensitive, my wonder is how the latter ever got a curl. DARDANELLE FEUD.—What is the greatest virtue in a wife? Economy in her business. Why is a French franc of no value compared with an English shilling?—Because it is worth less.

The American cross-takers find great difficulty in ascertaining the ages of girls, a large majority of them being very retiring in the family Bible, and tend to be twice grin between ten and sixteen years of age.

QUANDARIES.

Knocking at the wrong door, and hesitating whether you shall run away and say nothing about it, or go in and ask for the wrong person.

Crossing the road until you see a pig coming one way and a cab coming the other, and if you move on you are sure to be knocked by one, and if you stand still you may possibly be knocked by both.

Finding yourself in a damp bed on a cold night, and endeavoring without the slightest success to push your death, or get up and dress, and pass the night on the sofa, or borrow blankets.

Paying your addresses to a penniless fair one, under the impression that she is an heiress, and then discovering your error, having the option of marrying the young lady, or of being horsewhipped by the papa and brothers.

Dining at a friend's house, where you must either drink wine or offend your entertainer, and refusing till you become disagreeable.

Coming home late some cold night, one of which you must take it sudden, or just walk home a mile or two and inquire your way.

FACE OR BRASS.—The Secretary of War, Dundas, once Lord President of the Court of Sessions in Scotland having, during his term of office been created a Baronet, a gentleman wrote upon it the following impromptu:

"This house a lawyer once enjoyed,
A noble deen ever employed,
How naturally the iron age
Succeeds the age of gold!"

"DECOMPOSING" IS BECOMING A WIDOW.—Listen to these verses, written by a dying poet to his wife; she was a widow:

"My fair one, my fair one, alast it appears
That the doctor my speedy departure announces,
And you are a widow before I am dead of notes,
If your first mourning dress shall be plain, or with flounces."

For evile like these let your dark woman care,
"Tis for thee to mourn the sorrows of misery & evelil!
It makes them look dizzy. But you, who are fair,
Will soon be comforted, with flounces added, marriage."

A reverend gentleman who lives less than a thousand miles from "somewhere" has a daughter now in her fifth year. When she was but a few days ago, preparing for a sermon for the coming Sunday, he was interrupted by the child with the cry, "Papa, I'm tired of nothing." "Why so am anxious, inquiring look, said, "Papa, what was Methuselah's age when he died?" Upon being added, thinking he was also a Miss Anne Debtor, papa: but what was her other name?

A celebrated toper intending to go to a masked ball, consulted an acquaintance as to what character he should disguise himself in. "Go as a perfect gentleman," said your most intimate friends will not know you."

A gentleman remarked to his wife, on a recent party, but was refused by the person to whom it was sent, "Why, my dear, you have no idea!" meaning the bashfulness belonging to the one who was said to have sent it.

The most attentive man to business we ever knew was the waiter at a boarding-house. "Come to dinner, or return in half an hour." He was no relation to the lawyer who told his client to come back in a week, "or a year," and returned only after a pleasure trip of three weeks.

A goose that sees another drink will do the same, though he is not thirsty. The custom of drinking for company, when drinking is dispensable and undesirable, seems to be a case of the same kind, and to put a man, like a goose, upon drinking when he is not thirsty.

"What under the sun can be the cause of that bell ringing to-day?" said young Sam to his friend, as they passed a church on Sunday.

"If I was to express an opinion on the subject," returned the gentleman, "I should say it is the result of deliberate conviction that somebody is pulling the rope."

Matthews, the actor, being asked what he was going to do with his son, the young man's profession was to be that of an architect, "Why," answered the comedian, "he is going to dig out a living for his father first."

THE LANDING IN CALABRIA.

We publish on the next page a fine picture—from a sketch by M. Durand Brager—of the landing of a party of Garibaldians near Scylla, in Calabria, on the night of 9th-10th August last. It was a historical event, and may well be placed on record. Events have been moving so rapidly in Italy that, by the time this picture is laid before our readers, their attention may be claimed by later and more thrilling scenes. But the commencement of the end was the invasion of the main land, and we place it in our pages as a historical landmark.

The night of the 9th-10th of May of Napoleon published a fine picture in No. 190.

JOLLY ANGLERS.

FOUR of us went out fishing,
Mary, Fairy, I, and the man:
No use in grumble or wishing,
People may catch who can.

Mary was lucky that morning,
Lucky almost, I think, as the man,
And she laughed with her saucy scorning
As the fishes they filled her can.

The man was lucky in hooking:
Off the perch with his trimmers ran,
And he caught us a dish worth cooking,
As your Maidenhead fisherman can.

I caught nothing worth keeping,
Things about the length of a span;
When a gentleman's heart is leaping
He may strike a fish, if he can.

But Fairy, she made a capture,
On her darling own original plan,
And Fairy's eyes looked rapture
As her great soft violets can.

With a single line she made it,
Oh, such a line you'd have liked to scan!
One line, and the lady laid it
Where loving young ladies can.

In a gentleman's hand she placed it
Before our Maidenhead fishing began,
How his chances of fish were wasted,
Tell, lovers—who only can.

Overnight an enraptured dancer
Had handed a passionate note in a fan,
And the line was this gracious answer—
"You may love me—if you can."

ELFIE MEADOWS.

A sunny day in leafy June, white clouds are floating high,
Leisurely through the blue expanse, and bees hum drowsily;
In shady nooks the cattle herd, and ruminating doze,
While onward, with a rippling song, the glancing river flows.

With fairy steps a maiden stroll'd along the rushy bank,
Her light foot hardly seem'd to crush the daisies where it sank;
The dragon-flies unheeding brush her soft curls as they pass;
The wary lizard boldly peeps from 'neath his tuft of grass.

Beneath her hat of plaited straw her eyes shine soft and blue,
Her tender, quivering mouth tells tales of feeling deep and true:
O Elfie Meadows!—scarce eighteen—how many a heart has brok
To kiss the flow'ret in your hand, the daisies 'neath your feet!

Yet scorn can dwell in those sweet eyes, cold words those lips can speak;
For many, though you're scarce eighteen, to gain your love would seek.
You wave them off with calm disdain. Have you no heart to give?
Or is it in yourself alone, and for yourself, you live?

Not so, sweet Elfie: next your heart a tiny pledge you wear—
Within a case of purest gold a lock of raven hair;
And over and anon you take, and to your lips you press,
This token of unfailing love to cheer your loneliness.

"And if," I ask, "long years should pass, and he should not return,
This tribute of a fleeting love you scornfully would spurn?"

"Never," she says, with flashing eyes: "time matters not to love:
And ours is true—it springs below, but rears its fruit above."

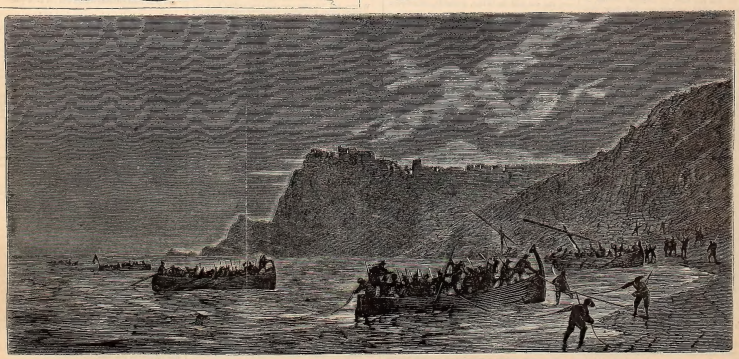
"Ah, Elfie, but you little know how absence can estrange—
How fondest hearts at last find out 'tis possible to change."

She stamp'd her little foot at me. "I tell you 'tis not so
With love that bears its flowers aloft, and has its roots below."

"Others have said the same," quoth I, "who loved as well as you,
Yet ten or twenty years have served to prove their love untrue."

Her small white hands she tightly clasp'd, and said, with feet a-glow,
"Their love no fruit could bear on high—it had no root below."

"And yours, my Elfie," murmured I, "how can you test its truth—
It may be that meterer years will scorn the love of youth?"



"Nay, try me not too hard," she said, "I only know I love,
And love that has such root below is perfected above."

We two sat on a mossy bank, her soft eyes look'd before
Into the river's crystal depths; fain would I test her more;

But one she little wist was near, had secretly o'erheard
Words that his inmost heart had touch'd, his deepest pulses stirr'd.

"And what," he ask'd, in quivering tone, "if some friend true and tried Had told you that your faithless Guy had found another bride?"

Around his neck she wildly flung her arms with joyous glee:
"Ah, never, Guy, would I believe you could be false to me!"

LANDING OF A PARTY OF GARIBALDIANS IN CALABRIA ON THE NIGHT OF AUGUST 9-10, 1860.—[SEE PRECEDING PAGE.]

"I LOOKED STEADILY UPON THE FACE OF THE DEAD."

A NOCTURNY OF TERROR.

Once more is the drawer opened; once more are the papers in my hand. The ink of my firm youthful writing has grown pale, and the paper discolored; for I have not cared for such long year to open a roll so fraught with painful recollections.

My present narrative is founded upon these rough notes now before me: they were hastily and briefly written down at the time, and too truly chronicle events to which I was myself a witness.

To proceed. Date back thirty-five years. I was a medical student; my friends in the country had placed me in a neighboring city for the purposes of education. No authorized schools of surgery or anatomy at that date existed in those townas, and the earlier years of the student's life were passed in the acquisition of general preliminary information, and in attendance upon the local hospital or dispensary. Still, however, in the principal cities and towns anatomical study was privately carried on, the great importance of this particular branch of professional education having led, at an early period, to the establishment of rooms for dissection and the delivery of lectures on anatomy. In the town in which I resided one of the leading surgeons rented rooms over the cathedral cloisters for the purpose. These antique apartments, part of the monkish fabric of the cathedral, had been fitted up for lectures and dissections. The narrow casements overlooked an ancient turfing-ground full of the decaying memorials of mortality. The time-worn Gothic carvings, the silent quadrangle with its spreading yew-tree, the dark shadows in the cloistered arches beneath the rooms, gloom even in the summer daylight, gave a funereal character to the whole locality; and the nature of the studies carried on above becoming generally known, in spite of our precautions, the place was regarded with peculiar aversion by the common people.

In the present day the advance of education, and the wise provisions of an anatomical bill passed some years since to regulate medical studies and to supply them with subjects, have much lessened these extreme prejudices of the public at large, and have entirely remedied very great evils. The practice of disinterring bodies, and the sentence of the law, which formerly doomed the murderer to death and dissection, accounted for the strong feeling of horror and indignation with which human dissection was universally regarded. Partly because so alarmed that watchers with loaded firearms were frequently placed over the graves of recently deceased persons by their friends. Still the practice of disinterment went on, and a sufficient number of bodies was obtained, though with great difficulty, to supply the necessities of the schools. It seems now extraordinary that such a system should have ever existed, or that any young man of education could have been found to engage in the revolting work. But the danger and mystery of these night expeditions excited in youthful minds a daring spirit of silventure, and there were always plenty of volunteers ready to undertake them. It was not this spirit of enterprise, however, that alone actuated the student and urged him to a fatiguing and dangerous duty—hemp had in the close church-yard at midnight, with the certainty of the roughest treatment from the populace if discovered. Higher motives impelled him to the attainment of anatomical knowledge, and the consideration and esteem of teachers and comrades always accorded to the hard-working and the resolute.

It was, then, on a wild, stormy night in December, 1825, that a party of students agreed to meet at the dissecting rooms, and to start from thence at midnight on an expedition to a neighboring church-yard, three miles distant from the town. The party consistet of Balfour, young Fletcher, and myself. Qualified by my greater experience, I was the leader; Balfour was very young men, and Fletcher was to procure a gig for our conveyance.

I agreed to join Balfour at the rooms an hour before we started, in order to prepare a dissection which we had been unable to get ready before, and which it was necessary to complete for the morning lecture. Balfour was the son of a dissenting minister in the town, and had been carefully brought up. He was a hard-working, attentive student, but of a reserved and gloomy disposition. He seldom joined in the amusements of young men of his age, and consequently, though generally respected, he was not popular with his comrades. He was a heavy-built, strong fellow, with a resolved and not unpleasant countenance, though his smile was somewhat sinister. A man of hitherto proved courage, I always felt that I could rely upon him in emergency. It had been raining and blowing hard all the day: the evening closed gloomily in clouds, and showed no prospect of improvement. I arrived at the rooms the first, and, groping my way in the circular staircase, was glad to find that the fire I had made up when I left in the afternoon was burning brightly.

It was a wild night. The crazy leaden casements shook noisily in the eddying gusts of the wet gale that howled dismally round the towers of the cathedral tower. The skeletons, suspended by hooks from the ceiling, moved and creaked in the draughts. The shelves of preparations, and dissections, contained in cases ranged round the room, stood out in the waving gleams of the candle flared in the wind, glanced with grinning teeth from their glazed sepulchres. In the centre of the apartment, stretched upon a mahogany table with a sheet, lay a subject for dissection. It was the body of a quarry-man, recently killed by a fall from the rocks. The dim light of the candle reddened upon the solemn folds of the white drapery, and gave a statuesque character to the form.

As I sat in the gloom waiting the arrival of my comrade, a succession of strange thoughts and fancies passed through my mind. I speculated upon the probable aspect of the face concealed beneath the sheet—Was it not horribly distorted by the nature of the death—and therefore unnatural—rendering a wondrous living tissue of organization, in an instant, effete and worthless—a man yesterday, and to-day nowhere now of heaven and hell than all the philosophers upon earth.

The idea grew horribly vivid until I fancied that I saw the shrouding-sheet, that seemed to flow more slightly move. Though I felt that this was but the effect of an excited imagination, to reassure my mind I rose, walked to the body, removed the covering, and looked steadily upon the face of the dead. There was nothing in the rigid lines of the effigy. The characters of mortality were there engraven in lines not to be mistaken, and I gazed upon the fixed and peaceful features of what had been a vigorous, half-savage, toiling athlete, with a strange and deep interest.

It was now eleven the quarter bells chimed out from the cathedral, followed by the heavy toll of the hour, taken up in succession by more distant church's, whose drowsy tones came faintly to me upon the sweeping storm.

A step on the stairs: enter Balfour, more serious and dour in aspect than usual. Wrapped in a rough-coat and muffler, he did not speak until he had removed and shaken his drenched garments.

"Balfour, this is a capital night for us; we shall have no witness to our proceedings in this howling storm."

"Do you think so?" he replied. "For all that, there are busy fiends who love the darkness and the storm. Come, get to work, we have no time to lose; already eleven o'clock has struck, and I," turning to the unfinished task, "in the dissection for to-morrow's lecture is not yet even begun. Come, to work!"

So saying he uncovered the body, and proceeded to flex the arm across the chest, the more readily to dissect the upper and back part of the extremity, at the same time he secured it with a chain hook to the other side of the table. The limb was thus put forcibly upon the stretch, and the subject drawn over upon its side. Balfour, seeing himself opposite the arm, commenced the work. I was on the other side, engaged in reading aloud the anatomical description of the parts we were preparing, when, during a pause, the hook which had secured the arm in the dissection beforementioned slipped its hold, and the hand, suddenly freed from its bondage, swung with an increased momentum given by the turning body, and struck Balfour a violent blow upon the face. With a fearful shriek—the more startling from his habitual composure—Balfour sprung to his feet, like Richard in the tent-scene; with hair erect, blanched face, and large drops of perspiration gathering on his brow, he staggered back, shouting:

"O Good! the man's alive!"

I dashed at him, but recoiled myself, not at what had occurred—for I saw how it had happened—but at the object terror of my companion, appalling to the last degree. Clasped together we hustled each other into a corner of the room, giving, in our passing struggles, a sharp gyration to the suspended skeletons. I shook him violently, exclaiming:

"He is not alive; he is dead—dead!"

But Balfour, half death-struck himself, still gasped: "Alive!—alive!"

"No, no, no," I repeated; "he is dead!"

At length he drew a deep breath, and sunk down in the corner whimpering:

"I said it is impossible; that half-dissected body can not be alive."

"My good fellow," said I, "this is more childish delusion—what is the matter with you? are you well? Here, take some brandy."

He seized the flask and drank deeply; then, with a strong effort, he rose, walked to the fire, sat down with his back to the dissecting-table, and said nothing.

The whole scene was very ghastly. Balfour's firmness in the time of trial, heretofore, made his present object fear the more unnatural and shocking; no doubt, to a man of his serious mind and ordinary dubious disposition, with a temperament prone to superstition, the impression of an incident so sudden and appalling was the more powerful in effect.

We sat in silence.

"Balfour," I said, at last, "we must put off our expedition for this night; it is blowing and raining hard, and you are not in a fit state to encounter fatigue and exposure."

"Why do you talk thus?" he replied, looking up doubtfully; "do you think that I am afraid?"

"Not at all, my friend; but this circumstance that has so startled you may perhaps make you—How I hesitated, not caring to say what I thought, and stopped abruptly. "Wilder," said Balfour, angrily, seizing me by the arm, "have I ever quailed in this most horrible, but, to us, righteous task?—have I ever shrunk from my duty that you thus insinuate?"

"Never, Balfour; you have always stood by me like a man, and I would rather have you for my lieutenant than any other of the students, and that you know right well; but we will not go to-night for all that."

He started up, and with sudden energy exclaimed, "Wilder, even if I go alone, even should the dead arise to oppose me—Wilder, say not one word more;" and he struck his fist violently on the table, setting the skeleton and window-frames trembling and clattering in the pause of the storm, which was now subsiding.

At this moment we heard the sound of wheels, and the old clock tolled twelve.

"Here is the gig, and we not ready!" I exclaimed.

I was glad to see Balfour eagerly seize and put on his great-coat. He then chose a dark lantern. We then collected all the requisite tools—tooth-pick, shovel, elevator, etc.—and descended to the street, groping along in the dark.

"A wild night, lads!" said the cheerful voice of young Fletcher, a youth of seventeen, who, accustomed to drive, was chosen as our charioteer. "I have had the greatest work to get the trap; I should never have come round old Higgins if I had not been for Nancy. He declared that we were going to commit a dead robbery, and that nothing would induce him, for one of these days; and Nancy actually kissed me, because she had it in her mind that I should be surely nipped up by them awful spectres. At last, however, I got off, and here I am, all right and tight."

"Jack," said I, "can you see, and is the horse steady? It is awkward work driving in such a black night as this."

"Be easy, my dear friend; I could drive you to the devil, if required."

"Well," added Balfour, "I believe it is not unlikely that you may have to do so."

It was a good horse, and we rattled along at a great pace between long lines of lamps through lonely streets, deserted, save by drowsy watchmen calling the hour, who raised their dim lanterns to see what we were. Then came the straggling, half-lighted suburbs, and lastly the dark and open country, through which we drove more slowly, though still at a steady trot, to the quiet church-yard at Hilton. The wind had much subsided; low, rolling clouds, opening here and there, showed a few faint stars; but the road, where shadowed by trees, would have been almost undistinguishable save for the glimmering pools left by the heavy rain. We now quitted the gig, which Fletcher drove back to the shadow of some fir-trees, there to await our return. As I ascended with Balfour the path that led to the church-yard, we paused to look round, and assure ourselves that no one was following upon our steps.

I never approached the dark sanctuary of death with more of awe and reverence than at this moment, though about to mock and desecrate that sanctuary by rifling it of its poor contents.

The shadow of the darkest night, which you inwardly hope may shroud the ghoul-like proceedings, is never profound enough. The disinterred body gleams with its own ghastly lustre. A faint phosphorescent luminous seems to surround it, developing the characteristic outline of humanity, when it is so dark that you can not see your hand before you. I do not know how it was, but at this moment I did not feel my usual cool steadfastness. I was fidgety and anxious. Balfour's alarm in the room had filled me with uneasiness, and, though he seemed recovered, he was still nervous and depressed. However, we were no time for retrogression; and, creeping along the side of the low wall to the deeper shadow of the church, we leaped the inclosure.

The moment I was in the ground all uncertainty passed from my mind, to be immediately succeeded by a sense of duty, and a firm purpose to execute it. I at once advanced to the spot marked in a visit of investigation the day before by the size of the recent grave. After having made the needful preliminary examination, and satisfied ourselves that we were correct, I and Balfour take the commencement of the work, while I removed a sliort distance from the grave to watch, and warn my comrade should any thing occur to disturb us. It is far better to work than to watch on these occasions. The attention is absorbed in the exertion; and on that account I determined that Balfour should begin. As I stood in the drear yard I looked about me more narrowly, to ascertain my eye to the dim obscurity and the various dark mis-shapen objects around. One decaying monument appeared like a crouching monster watching us; and it was not till I had approached to examine the object more closely that I could gratify myself of its real nature. The evergreen trees and bushes that clustered in the opposite corner of the yard were darkly outlined against the dusky reddish light arising from the city, three miles off. As I stood listening on the watch, the ticking of the church-clock seemed to grow gradually louder in the intense silence. Presently I heard another sound, not unlike it—a soft tapping noise that I could not understand. It appeared, at times, to be very near me, and then to die away in the distance. The grating of the spade on the hard soil, which had been going on for some time, now ceased. I therefore returned to Balfour, to see what he was about, and to take my turn at the work, remembering to him the watch. As I approached he spoke softly from the grave, in a nervous and excited way.

"Hush! do you hear nothing? do you see nothing?"

So own attention had been drawn to the peculiar sounds before mentioned—soft intermitting sounds, like little footsteps patting on the ground. Balfour came standing up to me.

"It is horribly dark! What are these noises, so like heavy droppings of blood? Are they the echoes of the church clock, or are they the ticking clocks to the tower? I hate this infernal thing! What is it? Why did you bring me here to be thus tormented?" And he wiped the perspiration from his brow with his muddy hand.

"Pooh, pooh! it is nothing at all, Balfour," said I. "Get back to the work again. I will go to the other side of the yard and see about it."

I crossed the ground in the direction of the sounds, ankle-deep in the rank, wet grass that ever fattens on the rich loam of the church-yard, slipping over graves and low headstones, to the imminent danger of my shins. When I drew near I perceived the simple cause of our alarm: though the storm had ceased, large drops continued to fall from a spout at the top of the tower, and pattered on the flags below.

As I turned to go back I jostled a dark figure standing close to me. In my first impulse I seized

"BY HEAVEN! THERE IS SOMETHING IN THE CHURCH-YARD—THERE!"

it by the throat, but was roughly shaken off by the more powerful Balfour. "Why the devil," I angrily exclaimed, "do you thus dog me, Sir? How infernally you have startled me! Do get back to your work!" We returned coolly and in silence. I took up the shovel and began to dig. Balfour presently touched me on the shoulder. "Wilder," he said, "you were very angry with me just now; I ought not to have followed you; forgive me: I am not quite myself to-night." "All right, Balfour. Go back to your watch; quite understand." Balfour, however, did not seem disposed to quit my vicinity. I took no notice at first, but kept vigorously at the work; then in a pause I said, "My good fellow, you will return to your post; you can not hear any thing so near me, and it is quite necessary to keep a sharp look-out that all may be perfectly quiet, and every thing promise success." While I yet spoke we were startled by a remarkable sound above our heads, apparently close to us. A low whistling in the air, very strange and even sweet, seemed to wander and play about us. "What—is—this—now?" he gasped by compassion. "What is it, I say!" and he seized me convulsively by the arm. I was myself astonished, and could in no way explain this new phenomenon. However, I said, hastily, "Birds—night birds, chirping round us—nothing more." "Wilder," said Balfour, slowly, in a hollow and altered voice, "God sees us, and vouchsafes us a warning. This may be a dreadful sin that we are engaged in, but let us go." I was much more alarmed at Balfour's evidently growing disturbance of mind than at the cause, and did what I could to reassure him. The sounds, as I seized the spade, suddenly ceased, and pushing him from me, in another moment I was hard at work. I had scarcely thrown a dozen shovelfuls of earth before Balfour reached wildly up and exclaimed, "By Heaven! there is something in the church-yard—there—close to the verge of the inclosure!"

Instantly I jumped out of the grave, and with straining eyes looked in the direction he indicated. I could see nothing.

Balfour was evidently pointing to some moving object, and following it with his finger; while he muttered words which, in the singularity of the moment, I did not understand. We stood close together, our eyes directed toward the opposite boundary wall. There the solemn trees were slowly waving slowly in the night air against the illumined sky, but no other moving thing could I perceive.

At the same time a new and extraordinary sense of unbearable solicitude and anxiety—a sense of something to be feared—crept through my soul. As I now felt certain that with a man in Balfour's excited state, yielding upon insanity, I could have no assistance, but must expect every embarrassment, I determined to give up all farther attempt, and to leave the church-yard at once. I was at the point of saying so, when my companion spoke again in broken, shivering whispers. "Wilder, look yonder—do you not see it now? I see it like distinctly in ghastly outline against the sky. Mark how it glides along, slowly, very slowly—a terrible shadow crowned with light, two long white parts upon the breast. See, it stops, it beckons, it turns us to the left. Oh, Wilder, we are in torment; instantly let us go—not that way—not there —that is the grave—its grave—tread softly, softly, and with haste." Then, in the delirium and terror of his terror, he suddenly shouted out, in a loud, clear voice, most appalling in the absorbing silence of the night, "Save me, Q God, for thy mercy's deep water. Let not the pit shut her mouth upon me. Save me! save me! I go to judgment." And he made a step forward, as if to avoid some dim mystic horror.

Now we my own concern infinitely increased, when I fancied that I myself could perceive through the gloom what resembled a slowly passing shadow, of colossal stature, and of more than man's walk. The undefined sensation I had before experienced swelled into a deadly sense of stiffly fear, as I followed with straining eyes the path of something that was stealing along the verge of the inclosure, in the direction of the dark evergreen, erect and shadowy-shaped. And I am not ashamed to Balfour's abject terror (for terror is an infectious disease). It is possible that no man of ordinary society would have made me dash at the figure to "rive the dreadful mystery; but as it was, I dared, for the moment, remained, terror-struck and incapable of motion. As I gazed with dilated pupils, I saw the shadow wave what seemed its arm; but, whether to beckon or warn, or to menace, I could not in the dim obscurity discern.

At this moment the air became filled with the same strange, sweet, whistling sounds we had before heard—sounds, to me, of unspeakable terror. My comrade fell heavily to earth in strong convulsions, and struggled violently in the loose mould, lashing it about in a fearful manner. I was powerless at first to hold him in these spasms, to prevent him from hurting himself, but in vain; so I let him writhe on, while I thrust in my handkerchief between his tightly-wedged teeth, and succeeded in getting some breath into his mouth. I thought of running for Fletcher, but I feared to leave Balfour in his present state, lest, suddenly recovering, he should go raving mad in the dark and alone, and apparently deserted; besides, what would become of the horse if Fletcher were to leave the gig? I do not know how long—for I am sure my present situation was bad enough—but I felt in my anxiety for poor Balfour, and the constant attention I was compelled to give him, a relief from a worse and more prostrating feeling—that of a terror such as I had never understood before. I tried to be calm—determined not to turn my eyes in the direction of the late visitation, and to await, as steadily as I could, the restoration of my comrade to consciousness. The convulsions now nearly ceased, returning only at intervals and in a slight degree. Still he remained insensible. I had loosened his neckerchief and chafed his temples, sprinkling his face with spirit from my flask. After a brief period of intense anxiety, I found the pulse returning, and the breathing in a degree restored. I gently whispered to him that we were going away, and raising him with effort in the direction of the horse, or I fancied myself in the churchyard, carrying at every pause. At last I could bear these half-waking horrors no longer; so I determined to get up and go to lecture, for it was just ten o'clock, the hour for its commencement.

Returning wearily to my lodgings I was startled by a placard, signed by the church-wardens of Hilton, which a man was in the act of posting up. It was as follows:

FELONY.

FIFTY GUINEAS REWARD!

WHEREAS, late last night, or early this morning, some villains or villain have entered the consecrated ground of Hilton, and feloniously stole the body and the grave-clothes of a person lately buried, and have thus incurred the penalty of transportation: Any person giving information that may lead to the discovery of the offender or offenders shall receive Twenty Guineas reward upon his or their apprehension, and a further reward of Thirty Guineas upon conviction.

I do not know that the horrible witness of the night affected me more strangely than this announcement. The body gone and the grave-clothes! I read and re-read the words until the very idea sickened me. The unearthly sounds we had heard all night long! fearful interpretation!

I turned away from the contemplation of this infernal placard, repeating unconsciously, "the body and the grave-clothes!" "the body and the grave-clothes!" Suddenly I started at full speed to Balfour's lodgings. Alarm and dismay seized me. I found the street-door wide open and the householdin great confusion. Mr. Bromfield and Fletcher, with several neighbouring gentlemen in the sick-room, drawn thither by strange reports of Balfour's extraordinary state. As I entered the apartment, Balfour, a dying man, was brought in his bed, and with the same ghastly expression he wore in the discussion-room, pointed at me with outstretched arms, and exclaimed, in a voice unhaunted my dreams for months afterward:

"See, it comes! it comes! The door is opened! I saw in the Valley of the Shadow of Death—it grows darker and darker—I—go—"

He gasped convulsively in this fearful attitude, and in a few minutes was a corpse. So ends my nocturary of terror.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE POLITICAL CAMPAIGN.

EFFORTS have been preveryingly made to reunite all the Democracy in support of Douglas in this State, but without success. Mr. Dean Richmond, the head of the Democratic party here, declines to have any further active organization in any way or shape. In Pennsylvania it is understood that a fusion of the anti-Republican elements has been effected. From California the accounts are favorable to Douglas. Senator Broderick remains in that State; he spoke last week at Clifton Springs, Syracuse, Auburn, Rochester, Buffalo, and Niagara Falls. Senator Seward is in the West: he has spoken at St. Louis, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Detroit, and other places. He has gone on to Kansas. Hon. Mr. Yancey is at Washington. Mr. Breckinridge, it seems he has deliberated an oration on the issues of the canvass.

SENATOR SEWARD ON AMERICAN DESTINY.

THE Detroit Free Press reports a speech by Mr. Seward, September 18:

Senator Seward made to-day the great speech of the campaign. It was fuller, more elaborate, and far abler than his Metropolitan speech.

"He looked to the acquisition of British America, Central America, and Southern America, and declared that the man was born who would live to see the American people dominant on the whole continent of America. that this is a land of freedom and freemen, and that it is the land of the future. Several hours elapsed before there are to disturb its present peace will before long open every valley and sweeping plain of Kansas.

"He felt that here we were not only before the shrine of freedom, but before the shrine of the very genius of freedom. The vital principle of the Government was the equality of rights and privileges. The fundamental of this principle which had made the capital of Minnesota equal in population to the capital of any State but two hundred years old. Liberty, after all, was but the unique condition of labor, and the reason why we gave slavery its to-day, said he, not only powerless, but without influence in the political republic, was because the threats of the South to dissolve the Union, he asked, What is there to dissolve? Why, the Union of States —nobody can be bought.

"He predicted that the time would come when New York would cease to be the Empire State, and that Kansas would be the Empire State, as Virginia had been many years ago. He predicted that the Empire State, and the Keystone State would be hereafter in the Mississippi Valley.

THE EQUINOCTIAL.

A great Equinoctial storm swept with great violence over the Gulf of Mexico on Wednesday, Thursday, and this city and vicinity on Thursday though with fitfully gusty winds. The rain fell in torrents, the very little wind, but the rain fell in torrents, accompanied by thunder and lightning. There was preceded on Wednesday, which interfered considerably with navigation in the bay and on the rivers. The storm was felt in such floods that cellars and basements were overflowed, causing damage to a large amount of household goods. Fire-engines were brought into requisition to clear the flooded premises. Several persons were also struck by lightning, but no lives were lost.

THE LATE COLOSSAL LUMBING.

The New York Herald of the 16th gives a personal sketch of Colonel Lumsden, who, with his family, was recently lost in Lake Michigan. From this interesting paragraph is taken:

Colonel Lumsden was a native of North Carolina. At an early age he was apprenticed to the senior editor of the Fayetteville Observer, Mr. Winslow, in whose office he served his time. After spending nine years in the Carolinas, and thoroughly mastering his trade to New Orleans, about twenty-four years ago, and in 1836 established a journal called the Delta Journal. In 1837, in conjunction with Mr. Kendall, he commenced the publication of the Picayune, with which he continued connected until the day of his death. To the columns of this paper he contributed many valuable articles, some besides his editorial minutes, giving accurate and racy sketches of life and manners, and of remote places; in a humorous and sporting connection, and of other matters with respect to the public. Even up to the very day of his departure he was writing articles for the Picayune, to be communicated in this way with the Picayune. Colonel Lumsden was a gentleman of rare and brilliant talents, possessing fine conversational powers, ever cheerful and abounding in good humor, and rich in sympathy for the unfortunate, he was the ardent and powerful friend of all with whom he came in contact. He was as sensitive as he was affable; as chivalric as he was generous; and as open and frank as he was impulsive. His high sense of personal honor forbade concealment and deceit, and made him as courteous to others as prompt to resent a discourtesy to himself.

MRS. GURNEY'S CONFESSION.

Various letters have been received from England bearing testimony that the previous confession of Mrs. Gurney, published in the New York Tribune a few weeks since, is forgery, and was unknown to the friends of Mrs. Gurney in her American journey. The host of those is from Lady Bunbury, who, with royal frankness, remarks:

"A forgery it is. We suspect it is a money-making trick of the agent of Mrs. Gurney."

A letter which now lies before me, post-marked Paris, August 15, is from a handwriting of Mrs. Gurney, on the subject of the base fabrication, and addressed to Edmund Kelly, of the publishing house of Longman & Co.:

"I know nothing whatever of the letter to which you allude, fully assured you will be too well know it at once. It is scandalous in those who have done it."

This is enough to show the character of it.

SUMMER SKATING.

The Home Journal thus describes the summer skate, which has just been introduced in this locality:

"Among the novelties of the season—an invention destined to set a fashion—is the skate adapted to the delicate of children—a skate adapted for the house, and which can be used on a carpet or smooth floor. With a pair of these skates on her feet, a young lady can soon learn the art of skating to a degree that enables her successfully to accomplish on the ice, and with steel skates, that which has heretofore been the study and coveted but almost despaired-of-obtaining enjoyment. All the benefits of skating to be derived from the healthful exercise are now placed within the reach of even the most delicate, and fascinating will henceforth be included among house amusements, to the delight of children and the great annoyance of papas. The skate is simply a frame of ornamental iron, nearly the shape and size of the wood part of the ordinary skate, and instead of the steel runner, four rollers or wheels of gutta-percha, about an inch in diameter, are attached to the frame, each of which is fitted with a screw-nut, by which it can be set on the floor, and turn with the greatest of ease. The skate is then strapped on the foot in a manner similar to the ice skate, with wide leather bands, and one is ready for the exercise. Among the fashionable resorts of the South, whose facilities for skating have hereto been confined to the ice, and who are annually amidst orange groves and balmy breezes, their Northern brethren, wondering by ice, are the rinks or skating winds. A waxed floor is perhaps the best adapted for the sport; a room of sufficient size for a set of quadrilles, the next: but if these are not accessible, a carpeted room of only half that will answer. Being skates for children not wear the carpet, as they would if formed of wood or metal."

THE GREENLAND EXPEDITION.

The Greenland Expedition on board the schooner Navy, Captain Hendrickson, arrived at Dismantle, Maine, on the 11th inst. This expedition was sent out by William College in search of the expedition of Dr. Kane's History Society. They proceeded nearly as far north as Disco Island, at which place the college was left all well, but unfortunately the day on which the cellar took place was a very severe one. Being short of coal, they met Captain McClintock, with a British war-steamer, who kindly offered them a supply of coal from his store. A portion of the party remained on the coast of Labrador for the purpose of collecting specimens of fauna, flora, ores, etc. The members of the Natural History Society accompanying the expedition are Dr. Hayes, a great and remember of curiosities, and bird and bear skins, kyacks, specimens, stone axes, etc., and many articles manufactured by the natives, such as shoes, spears, pouches, etc.

THE PRINCE OF WALES.

Some newspaper men, among them Mr. Erastus Brooks, of this city, and Mr. Wheeler, of the Albany Journal, have succeeded in tame to rope-walking from Bloom, a few days ago, at Niagara Falls. They rewarded Bloom with a gold watch, which was presented to him by his host Saturday.

Mr. Wyer, the rich old bachelor at St. Louis, against whom Effie Castaing brought that famous breach of promise case, has died, leaving $60,000 for charity, and $47,500 for personal property. Effie is still living at St. Louis. She is not married, and is not engaged.

Don Juan Bello, Minister from Chili to the United States, died on Saturday night, 15th inst., at the Clarendon hotel in this city. He was about returning to Washington, and had been on a visit to Saratoga.

By the recent decease of Mr. Waldegrave, an English gentleman, Horace, the 4th Lord Waldegrave, by his decease heir to a fortune of over half a million of dollars. The Waldegraves have been for a descendant of one of the oldest families in England, died possessed of $8,000,000, which he left to his wife, divided among his children, and several relatives, the Senator named being one of them.

Madame Ristori Capranica, the gifted granddaughter of the editor of the St. Louis Bulletin, is one hundred and one years of age, and has resided in that city for one hundred and three years.

Mr. Frank Wheaton, who keeps the Fifth Avenue Hotel, in this city, keeps also the Continental Hotel of Philadelphia, the Revere House of Boston, the Astor House of Boston, the Battle House, Mobile, and the Point Clear House, Point Clear, Alabama. He is Lady Byron's death, Baron Wentworth, and heir to the very large landed property bequeathed him by the poet's widow, is now living at Woolwich Arsenal, as a soldier, at a weekly wage. By virtue of the Indigenous Law Debts, in an almost textual translation of the whole letter which contained this paragraph, heightens the interest of this statement about the grandson of Lord Byron by adding: "His pay, I believe, is eighteen pence a week. I have seen him at work in the shop with as much pluck and industry as any of his mates. Between ourselves, there is at the bottom—not further at the top—of this eccentric proceeding a genealogical tree of the house of Byron, which, as the world ship is unwilling to abandon, even to live in the blighted and unhappy atmosphere of society."

"I need hardly say that this is pure invention on the part of my informant. Sympathy, the love of fame, and pretty girl of the lower orders' in the affair at all. The young nobleman is described as a youth of great spirit at an early age, was missing for several years, in spite of large rewards offered by his friends, and was at last found by his own brother himself apprentice to a cooper, and working with all the vigor of a cabin-boy aboard a merchantman. He was then in a London dock, and was sent home with a letter from his brother, and with a sudden change in the world of his hands as a bolt-maker at Woolwich Arsenal, where he is still, or was very recently, working. He often, while in this employment, walked up to Lord Byron's, in Piccadilly Row, and regularly every Sunday, his day of leisure, as a guest, but always was carried down to Woolwich by the coach in time to begin on Monday morning. I may add that, though I have not seen him at work in the Arsenal, a near friend of mine has seen him on the bridge from Woolwich to Plumstead, and, bedaubed with paint, and in a coarse jacket, long hair, and a wide-awake, with a short pipe stuck through his hand."

A BATCH OF MURDERS.

The Herald correspondent writes: "Very interesting murder cases are about to enliven our police annals. The 'road murder' of a young and interesting lad, only four or five years old, is still wrapped in mystery, and very extraordinary confessions made proving to be without foundation in fact. A beast of a woman, who was servant in a Liverpool boarding-house, was tried for murdering her mistress by poison,—but the jury, very well, leaving this her home and furniture,—and was acquitted; while the husband, a country, cringing, cowardly jury, believe has guilty without a particle of doubt. An old lady, a wealthy miserly person, was decoyed out of bed in her own house, in the east end of London. The old creature was found next morning with her throat cut, lived entirely alone, without a servant; and though she never could be induced to count her money, it was collected her own rents, and never employed an agent. She would not have it supposed, but invested all her spare money. Bags of gold and silver were found under her bed, and in a cupboard under the look-out room of her. She was such a recluse that her body was not found till four or five days after her death, but there was no sign in, and far gone in decomposition. No clew to the murderer."

THE AGAPEMONE STORMED.

The Times correspondent writes: "There has been a siege in England. The Agapemone has been stormed. A Mr. Price wished to recover his wife, who, it is probably still is, a deluded inmate of that establishment. Mr. Price was himself a victim himself, but as the lady bear he was disencumbered, while his wife still clings to the Spirit. Unfortunately the escapade was somewhat ill-minded his friends, and the lady without price was demanded. It was not to be given. Mr. Price went down in all his best hair, and formed her in as ardent in the garden of Eden as he had ever been. The lady, however, was then above cares to her rescue. The last time the garrison was reported to assault, and a body formed to pretend a picket, which led to a similar act on the part of an outside reinforcement. Matters looked serious, and a party took place, and the inhabitants of the 'Abode of Love' agreed to allow a reasonable time for the departure for the ladies to get ready to receive visitors. What changes of apparel were then made necessary is not observed, this deponent, not having penetrated the mysteries of that sacred temple of fun, can not say. But probably Mr. Price was not by a secret patent gate, and he was admitted to the flock on the appointed day. He was supposed to have migrated to a farm-house at some little distance. The husband and his friend were admitted, and agreed to give up the search for that night, and the road was cleared. But if it should be repeated, the Brother Prince should be decked in a horse-pond, few will commiserate the discomfort of the unclean outcasts which he may catch. Brother Prince is a Joe Smith on a small scale, and has made a little hell of his own on his four-in-hand, a fine breed of blood-hounds, and a select harem of rather pretty women. There is a great deal to be said about all this on both sides of the country; but I am afraid that the public will not be very much interested in a street-row. It is to be hoped that the Agapemone may not, like Brother Prince, not notice that which lately the Mormonites left Utah. Such a shut here would, for one night, I question whether the Agapemone would have been left standing where it is."

FRANCE.

ANOTHER SPEECH FROM PERSIGNY.

Upon the occasion of the laying of the corner-stone of the new church at Nemours, Count Persigny delivered the following speech:

"MONSIEUR LE CURE AND GENTLEMEN.—I thank you for the flattering words which you have addressed to me, and, above all, for the honor of being invited to lay the first stone of the church which the piety of the faithful of this town have so eagerly looking for. In ordering this house upon a political man who is only received in his ranks through his public acts is more remarkable. I must his fellow-citizens are pleased to regard him at this moment as the representative of the Government. I am persuaded that the Government is the natural protector of religion, and its ministers; and you know it (Applause.) The devotedness of the Emperor for the Church is a proof of it. I can afford to dwell upon this, because injustice which lately alarmed Catholicism and astonished the world. (Loud applause.) I will in no way a word to you on this subject. I need not remind you that it was the Emperor who restored the Church to Rome, and who to this hour keeps him there by the power of France.

THE ITALIAN WAR.

"I now come at once to the Italian war. At that period the States of the Church were partly occupied by France and partly by Austria, with a view to maintain the sovereignty of the Holy Father. The mission of the two armies in presence of the events which convulsed the north of Italy was to maintain a neutral attitude and to watch the course of events. Now, how was this fulfilled on the one side and on the other? It was tribunals Pontifical was called to her solemn and sacred duties that part of the territory of the Church which was committed to their charge, Austria, hoping to get possession of the forces which she had in the Legations, deemed that part of the neutral factor which she had undertaken to protect, and the consequence was that the Pope lost the Romagnas. (Sensation.) Again, did this abandonment of the pontifical territory was not prosperous for Austria. (Laughter.) Her ascendancy—for such was the boston at Solferino and forced to make peace. (Applause.) Now the loss of the Romagnas was a humiliation and a severe of things, by the state of the public mind, and by the attitude of Sardinia—a state that did not permit intervention in Italy was therefore prohibited whether by France or Austria, so that the Romagnas, having been abandoned by Austria, and the Pope not being able to reconquer that country, either with the aid of Austria, France, or any other Power, that province was evidently lost to the Holy See.

WHAT THE EMPEROR WANTS FOR THE POPE.

"It was then, and under these trying circumstances, that the Emperor, in his exalted wisdom and out of his devotedness, as enlightened as it is sincere, for the Holy Father—[Applause]—made that famous proposal against which so much unjust clamor has been raised. And what was that proposal? It was simply the salvation of the temporal power of the Pope. It was the simplest combination, the most just, and at the same time the most conformable to the end in view, namely, the independence and dignity of the Holy See. The Pope was to preserve. The Emperor saw that by the irresistible mistake of Austria the Romagnas were irrevocably lost. —For the Pope wished at least that, if this province was to be united to Piedmont, it should be with the sanction of Pope's name, in order that within the limits of possibility by the rights of the Holy See might be observed and respected. But this is not all. At the same time that the Emperor proposed to the Pope to cede to him the province for an immense advantage for the Pope, for in exchange for the Romagnas, which the Pope lost, the Emperor offered him a guarantee for the remainder of his States, and the Catholic Powers. [Prolonged applause.] Now, what could be more simple, more just, more heavy—may have been for a false conception of the situation and the public opinion misrepresented under the mask of religion; but there is no reason to suppose that it was the intention of the gentlemen, that in the eyes of all political men of any weight in Europe the Emperor's proposal was the most convincing proof of the Emperor's devotion to the Holy See. [Applause.] Such was the proposal which when they were rejected, and in all human probability, at this hour there would have been no war in Italy, and we been at peace, and the court of Rome freed from all danger. [Applause.]

"Gentlemen, I have had the honor of laying the first stone of this church of Notre-Dame des Victoires, the name of a victory is of such happy omen. I pray God to protect the Holy Father, to preserve him from the dangers which surround him, to the most implacable of which are not the armed attacks of his enemies—for the revolt of the heart is more to be dreaded than the blasphemer, continues to guard the august person of the Pontiff to the glory and happiness of the Holy See." [Prolonged applause and loud acclamations.]

HIS IDEA ABOUT VICTOR EMANUEL.

Napoleon is determined to make the Pope a friend of his silence desire to see Italy independent. When Victor Emanuel asked me what I thought of it, I told him that he strong enough to contend alone against Austria; but Austria could always command the assistance of Russia, would not allow her to abuse her victory.

A DAUGHTER OF ADD-EL-KADER TURNS NUN.

A letter in the Courrier de Lyon says: "Add-el-Kader has recently arrived at Paris for the purpose of receiving the last sigh of his daughter, who, like her father, visited at Brousse, to meet the young lady the Constantinople Government. She is in communication with Christian women, and was so struck with their superiority that she resolved to become one of them, and the hospitals during the Crimean war that she declared to Lady Stratford de Redcliffe, on her deathbed, of appreciating the sublime features of Christianity, consented to her wish, and she died in the arms pressing her novitiate."

A CLOWN IN A TIGHT PLACE.

A circus clown, of the name of Bragget, who has latterly been the principal attraction at Astley's, Paris, has come to look to long by the hands from a fragrant suspended to a. Bragget, who is a corpulent man, attempted to imitate the exhibition. Soon after the balloon had risen the spectators were horrified to see that the rope by which he and the trapeze hung burned through the mass fell from a height of 200 feet. Bragget fell on the roof of a house, over the Rhone, and Bruguet fell into the river, and as in the spot at which the accident occurred was deep he was not hurt, and swam to the bank.

ITALY.

GARIBALDI IN NAPLES.

A telegram dated Naples, Saturday, September 8, says: "Garibaldi made his entrance into Naples at noon this day with his staff. The Prince of Carignan, the Provisional Government has been formed. Naples is tranquil."

Another account says: "Garibaldi has entered Naples alone. Cavour and Garibaldi have dissolved. The National Committee illegally constituted, and has ordered the proclamation of the Provisional Government. Garibaldi has consigned the fleet and the arsenal of Naples to the charge of Admiral Persano, and proclaimed Victor Emanuel as King of Italy. The Dictator has conferred upon Persano the Minister of the Interior, and appointed Liborio Romano Director of Police; General Cosenz Minister of War; Pisacane Minister of Foreign Affairs. The organization of the forts is expected to take place to-morrow."

A telegram, dated Naples, Sunday, says: "Advices received from Naples to the evening of the 9th inst. state that the Garibaldian fleet has arrived at Naples. The Royal Neapolitan navy has Napoles the Sardinian Admiral had ordered to Naples, and the Neapolitan fleet, which he should attempt to proceed to Gaeta. Garibaldi had issued an order appointing Persano Dictator, with 40,000,000 lire in the bank. A Te Deum had been celebrated in the Cathedral of Naples. The Pope is reported shooting 'Hurrah for Victor Emanuel!' 'Hurrah for Garibaldi!' Crowds of people were in the streets, and fireworks and tricks. General Illuminations had taken place. On Friday evening Garibaldi, Victor Emanuel, and Count Trapani had followed the King to Gaeta, the King having left Naples for Gaeta on board the General Ulloa, as his Prime Minister, and had issued a proclamation, declaring that Gaeta is a great also took place in the public funds."

ARRIVAL OF THE KING.

A dispatch from Naples, on the evening of the 6th inst., announces that King Francis II. and the Queen of the Two Sicilies on board a Spanish vessel. Before leaving he released all the political prisoners.

The Ex-King of Naples was still at Gaeta at last accounts. The Queen mother had left for Rome, under flag of refuge. The Cabinets of Vienna, Munich, and Dresden have advised him to take refuge in Germany and not to Spain.

INSURRECTION IN THE PAPAL STATES.

A dispatch, dated Florence, Sept. 10, says: An insurrectionary movement has taken place in the province of Umbria. Rebel insurgents have attacked and defeated the Papal troops.

GARIBALDI'S CHAPLAIN.

The renowned Father Gavazzi, Garibaldi's soldiery-monk, displayed great courage at the battle of Milazzo. Unarmed, save with a cross, he was to be seen advancing the ranks, cheering and animating the volunteers by his words and example. Garibaldi said, "Where my God is on our side! Mark, I, his minister, am the foremost to engage the foe." Gavazzi, who has been a man of austerity, yet I remain unscathed! Charge, Italians, charge!" and the Italians did charge, and won the cross. Setting them this example, and repeating about passages like these, he was to be seen, during the same purpose, it must be owned, he is by indefatigable courage they carried the entire position of Milazzo.

SYRIA.

MORE TROUBLE WITH THE CHRISTIANS.

It was again asserted that Christians had been massacred at Damascus. The Turkish authorities at that place denied that taken place at Sidrouna, and a more serious one was reported to have occurred there.

SETTLEMENT OF THE JAFFA OUTRAGE.

An Eastern correspondent of the Times gives the following statement of the manner in which the "Jaffa outrages" has been settled. It will be remembered that in January last the French agricultural missionary named Deseo received a letter, written some distance from Jaffa, in a very dangerous and exposed place; his daughters were daily in the habit of going and conversing with the Arabs of the vicinity, and one night the house was attacked and broken open, the women were outraged, and in the melee the husband of the eldest daughter, a Prussian named Steinbeck, was killed, the property was stolen, and the family ruined. After many attempts to secure the real perpetrators of the outrage, the authorities succeeded in arresting parties designated put forward by the authorities to screen the guilty. The case was finally transferred to the Council of War, and the prisoners, after a short preliminary investigation, were sent to Acre, and there five thousand piasters for $500) indemnity was offered for their liberty. The indemnity and verdict Mr. Consul Johnson referred to Rechid Pasha at Constantinople, and Colonel Wilson, the Ambassador at the Porte, protested against such an inadequate punishment. The case was Mr. Steinbeck, who, might be the murderer of the Prussian, was being elapsed to show the Turkish authorities that they had not escaped responsibility of arresting and punishing the guilty. Now that the matter has been taken out of their hands, justice has finally been administered, and the murderer has been given up by command of the American authorities in Turkey. The last and final verdict was that of "Guilty."

First. The unarrested criminal, when taken (for the accomplishment of this act) to the place where he will be punished by the infliction of the extreme penalty of the law, shall be executed.

Second. The four prisoners now in irons at Acre are to be removed to the same place, where they will be imprisoned for life at hard labor, unless their crime shall be expiated by the execution of the criminal for which they will be executed.

Third. An indemnity of $2500 to the family of Mr. Dixon and the widow of Mr. Steinbeck.

HONDURAS.

THE END OF WALKER.

The Spanish war steamer Don Juan d'Austria arrived at Havana from Omoa on the 6th, and Truxillo on the 7th inst. She reports that the British war-steamer Icarus, with a transport and troops, under command of Alexander, proceeded to the latter place, and the troops were encamped. The boats of the Icarus proceeded up the river, and captured Walker, with seventy of his men, all of whom were taken to Truxillo and delivered to the authorities of Honduras. Walker was very much dejected, and many of them being sick were permitted to remain on the shore. The British force left Omoa after engaging again in an expedition against Costal America. Colonel Powell, of Kentucky, who was in charge of the Guatemala expedition arrived from Omoa shortly after the capture of the filibuster.

MEXICO.

PROGRESS OF THE REVOLUTION.

At latest advices the Constitutional Liberals were marching on the capital. Miramon was in the city of Mexico with 2500 men. The battle was expected to commence on the 8th. The correspondent of the Progreso, at the capital, says: "The Liberals have already laid siege to Puebla, and they were expected to reach the city on the 9th. Three thousand men, under the command of Miramon, General Ortega was expected to arrive soon from Guadalajara. The Liberals have recently levied upon Mexico, was expected to be soon present." The Bishop of Guadalajara is also with the army. Miramon has made General Degollado. It is reported that General Ortega had made good his escape.

BRAZIL.

THE HERESY-APPARENT SWORN IN.

On Sunday, July 29, her imperial Highness the Princess-heiress-apparent, Donna Isabella, took the oath of fidelity to the Constitution, in the Senate chamber, in the presence of the diplomatic body, deputies, the Senators, deputies, and high dignitaries of the empire. A eleven o'clock gun announced the arrival of the Emperor and the music of the military bands announced the arrival of her Highness. The procession of the door and conducted to a large arm-chair placed at the foot of the throne. The Princess was dressed in a white muslin dress knot and repeated it in a firm voice. It was then the turn of the Senators and the members of the deputies and the ceremony concluded. At one o'clock there was a reception at the palace, and in the evening a grand gala performance at the theatre.

PROCEEDINGS OF VARIOUS BODIES.

On Saturday, 15th, the Prince staid at Niagara Falls, new Blondin cross, and rode about, evidently enjoying himself with a party of gentlemen and ladies. Leaving Chippewa Church, Niagara, and had a fine view of the Falls, and was received by the "din" the Falls swing in his honor, and by the "roar" of Niagara, —giving over the suspension bridge to the United States. He was met by Mr. Ellis, of Buffalo, who had been invited to have been present at the levee at Buffalo. On Tuesday morning he left for Hamilton, C. W., where he was received by a procession of veterans of 1812, and laid the corner-stone of the Hamilton Asylum. In the afternoon he generally received by a crowd of some 20,000 people in Victoria Square, and received Addresses. In the evening he received addresses, inaugurated the Water-works and the gaslights of the city, and left for Toronto. On Thursday he visited the Provincial Exhibition, lunched with Sir Allan MacNab, and received addresses. At 5 P.M. he for Detroit. At Detroit he was enthusiastically received. On Friday morning he left by the Michigan Central for Chicago, where he arrived the same evening. We condense the following report from the special correspondence of the Herald:

THE PRINCE GOES UNDER THE RAILS.

"The Prince had a very dangerous passage under the Falls on Saturday evening, in spite of the remonstrance of his suite, who were extremely nervous about it. His name in the traveler's book as Albert Edward, Prince of Wales.

HE SEES BLONDIN.

The Buffalo Commercial says: "Some of the 17th has the full particulars of the performance of Blondin before the Prince. Blondin, it will be seen, was in earnest.

"All were now waiting and looking eagerly for the first sight of Blondin on the rope. He appeared, and was walking. We think that all who witnessed this feat will agree with us that it was one of the most daring ever done and during over attempted by mortal man. Many who have seen it before, and who were not in the secret from him during his passage, fearful lest, as they feared, the attempt was a failure, and the whole procession would be precipitated into the seething abyss.

"The effect of the passage, as we about two feet in height, the balloons have from prongs resembling a chicken's claw, and the apparatus being very much alive. At accident occurred when Blondin was a few yards from the platform. The rope was suddenly a thrill of horror in the breasts of all who witnessed it. As soon as it commenced to vibrate he sank in the centre, he was to make three leaps on his stilts. The first time he attempted it he sank down to his knees, but by the motion of the stilts caught against one of the guys, tipping him sideways, and he was thus kept in the centre of the chair, thinking he had fallen. But the daring, self-possessed performer soon recovered his balance, and was looked toward either shore as if nothing had happened. He commenced walking with his usual long step, but the swaying-pole—as before stated a very heavy one—was not used, and he was obliged to trust to the equipoise position of the leap, but it stood him in good stead.

"The last leap was made on the standing position on the rope with the stilts still attached, and was a splendid one, and was greeted with loud demonstrations of applause as the success of the attempt. During the whole of the time the Prince was on the platform he was to be on such word as fail; and, after two or three words of congratulation, he proceeded to the steps by step, the spectators gained confidence, and those who had expressed doubt and apprehension breathed free as he reproached the termination of his journey.

"When safely on terra firma a shout of exultation went up, followed by cheers and clapping of hands, and again was he greeted by the Prince, the Duke of Newcastle, and others of the party, the former expressing to Mr. Blondin in French his astonishment and delight at the unparalleled feat. The Prince, the Duke, and others, took the stilts in their hands and examined them, appearing to be astonished at their ponderous size.

THANKS GOD IT IS ALL OVER.

For the first time Blondin received an extra, the Prince also having put in a protest against this performance. It was a cool, calculating, and masterly feat, and did not please the Prince, who thought it fool-hardy.

When Blondin reached the shore the Prince and suite had a long conversation with him in French, complimenting him, and asking about the stilts, and the following words on the rope. As the Prince left he said, "Thank God, it's all over." Observing Farini's rope, further up the river, he asked what it was. "A path for Farini," was the reply. Farini, Dr. Lardner, and Hannibal stood, and nodded assent to this epigrammatic reply.

THE PRINCE VISITS BLONDIN'S HOUSE.

Blondin received a consignment of a telegraph letter from General Bruce, inclosing three hundred dollars, as a token of the esteem in which he was held generally.

HE IS REMINDED THAT PRIESTS ARE ABOVE KINGS.

At the Chippewa Church at Niagara, where the Prince attended, the Rev. Mr. Geikie, rector of the parish, made a chapter eleventh verse, as follows:

"And, behold, Jesus stood in the midst [and is ever so] all matters of the Lord; and [was] over the house of Ishmael, the ruler of the house of David, the king: but the ruler: also the Levites shall be officers before you. Deal courageously, and the Lord shall be with the good."

HIS RESPONSE TO THE VETERANS.

The Veterans' address at Queenstown contained no allusion to Blondin, but in the United States he was simply a welcome to the Prince, and an expression of their admiration for the Duke of Wellington, and of the their beloved Queen. The Prince's reply was admirably brief, and was as follows:

"GENTLEMEN,—I accept, with mixed feelings of pride and pain, the address which you have presented to me. pain. Pride in the gallant deeds of my countrymen, but pain at the circumstance that so many of them had to which you belong have passed away from the scenes of their triumphs. I have willingly consented to the request that I should commence, in this country, without offense to its neighbors, commemorate its heroes' deeds. I am glad to find that the Veterans' Fund is no passing boast or vicissitudes, but is likely to endure to a remote period. I am more honorable because we really acknowledge the services rendered to us by those who fought and bled before us. I trust that Canada will never want such volunteers as those who have come in the hour of need, and that volunteers be without such leaders; but as less and most fortunately I pray that we may never be called upon to may never be called upon to add other laurels to those you have already won in Canada. Accept from me, in the Queen's name, my thanks for your expressions of devoted loyalty."

AN AMERICAN CHANGES THE PRINCE'S SUITE.

An American, who attracted much remarkable notoriety by trotting his horse through the Prince's suite repeatedly, covering one of the party with mud, and riding down to small dinger; for the Prince rides with his horse's head loose, as it is technically termed, and his horse should have stumbled his royal Highness would unhesitatingly have been brought low, and probably broken his neck.

HE WANTS TO KNOW WHAT A HOP IS.

On Tuesday night the Prince came to the Clifton House, stripped off his coat, and rolled nine-pins for some time. Being informed that such a trip was going to Canada, he inquired what a hop was, and expressed his dissatisfaction that he had not been informed of the ball which took place. Afterward, as he was going off to smoke a pipe with the crew of the yacht, General Bruce captured him and conducted him to bed.

HE ENTERS AMERICAN WATERS AS BARON RENFREW.

When the boat, between Windsor and Detroit, reached the centre of the river, the Prince and party were called on, and said:—"Baron Renfrew, we welcome you to the United States. Consult your own pleasure, and let us know exactly what you may long remember it with pleasure and satisfaction."

The Baron was then conducted to the deck to see the Illuminations.

AND LANDS ON AMERICAN SOIL.

At last fifty thousand people were present, and when the boat came in sight of the city "the fun commenced." The cheering and enthusiasm were tremendous.

For some time the Prince was carried on account of the crowd, and the Baron stood looking somewhat frightened at the demonstration which appeared to exceed what is incidental to an American crowd.

CROWDS TO SEE AND GO TO THE DEPOT.

Next morning a magnificent open barouche, drawn by four magnificent bays, with horses' heads decked with flags, departure for Chicago. The whole party seated themselves in the barouche, and the procession moved slowly around, and blocked up the avenues so thickly as to make it next to impossible to move. A second after chez was given for the Baron, and the widest enthusiasm was prevailing.

The carriage was followed by immense crowds on foot, many hanging to the sides of the cars, and the whole sidewalks on the route were literally blocked with people, who interrupted the royal party at every halt with the rabble and cause of confusion were never witnessed here before.

HE HAS HARD WORK TO GET TO HIS HOTEL.

At the depot at Chicago an immense crowd was gathered; and as the Prince and party entered several unpleasant incidents were passed. Baron Renfrew passed along a line of people, and was followed by a crowd. The carriage with hat off, smiled repeated cheers. As he passed a man was struck in the face by a stone, and the policeman the crowd surged in like the sea. Baron Renfrew was carried to the door of the hotel, and was in danger being pretty well jostled by the crowd, and driven to the Richmond House, where he remained for the night. A few thousand persons stood staring at the windows, in almost perfect silence, and dispersed to rest via the Prince's shadow even.

HE CAN'T REST RUPAUL.

Colonel Marquette sent his invitation to the buffalo hunt directly to the Prince, and not to the party generally, from whom he received a reply courteously declining the invitation on account of work of importance requiring General Bruce and Lord Lyons called upon him on the part of the Prince, and the invitation was duly given.

The Colonel, by special invitation, lunched with the Prince, and Lord Lyons and General Bruce dined at his by no ephering could the trip be made possible if preparations were not made in advance. The Colonel decided reluctantly to give up the idea of hunting buffalo, and contented himself with smaller game.

WHAT HE WILL WEAR IN NEW YORK.

The Prince has just received several suits of clothes, to be worn during his visit to New York. Among these is a pair of pants for hunting, called "Knickerbockers," which are made very full from the knee and hang over the gaiters like Zouave trousers. The other suits were made after the pattern worn by the Prince himself, and will probably be the style for this season in New York as well. The pants are pegtops, with a lapped seam. The coat is a plain short sack, double-breasted, with two side-pockets and a breast-pocket, braid being laid on flat all round, also forming the cuff. These suits are made of the finest cloth, and are very elegant for Americans. The prize is, of course, prevalently.

WHERE HE WILL STOP IN THE UNITED STATES.

Buckingham, the Queen's courier, has started ahead to engage hotels for the Prince.

He will allow no overcharging, and the royal party will pay no more than plebeian prize. It is unique to by any Japanese bills upon Buckingham, for he is not a New York Alderman.

THE TEMPTER AND THE TRAITOR.—THE TREASON OF ARNOLD ON THE NIGHT OF SEPTEMBER 21, 1780.

THE TEMPTER AND THE PATRIOT—THE CAPTURE OF ANDRÉ, SEPTEMBER 23, 1780.

THE CAPTURE OF ANDRE.

As each September comes round the anniversary of the capture of Major André is duly celebrated, and each time the well-known story is told afresh. Its interest never flags.

It was in 1780, on September 15, that the British sloop of war Vulture, with Major André on board, sailed up the Hudson to the mouth of Croton River. The object of the voyage was to enable Major André to communicate with General Arnold, who was in command at West Point, and who had agreed to betray that important position to the English for a sum of money. A whole week André remained patiently on board his sloop. Washington was at West Point, and while he was there the treason was powerless. On Sunday, September Washington left; on 21st Arnold met André, by appointment, below the American lines, boarded him plying in the waters at West Point, and arranged a scheme by which a British attack on the place could not fail to be successful. All this was done during the night of 21st–22d. By the time matters were settled day had begun to break.

Our artist has selected the meeting between André and Arnold—" The Tempter and the Traitor" —as the subject of his first picture.

Washington Irving, in his "Life of Washington" (vol. iv., page 115), describes Major André being rowed by Sout ... midnight, to a sunny place on the ... side of the Hudson, below Stony Point. "Here they landed," he writes, "a little after midnight, at the foot of a woody mountain called the Long Clove—a solitary place, the haunt of the owl and the whip-poor-will, and well fitted for a treasonable conference. Arnold was in waiting, but standing aloof among thickets. He had come hither on horseback from Smith's house, about three or four miles distant, and had left two of Smith's servants, likewise mounted. The midnight negotiation between André and Arnold was carried on in darkness among the trees. Smith remained in the boat, and the servant drew off to a distance with the horses. It was near daybreak," etc., etc.

Whether these yet remained some points of importance to be determined, or whether André was afraid of allowing Arnold to go on board the Vulture so speedily after their conference, will always remain a matter of uncertainty. André, however, at Arnold began, with the first appearance of light, to press Arnold to enter the American lines. The Englishman was very loth to comply with the request. He was well aware that it taken within the lines, his act of war justified, and the condition of the American forces required, his execution as a spy. He urged Arnold to let him go. But the traitor would not consent; and after again urging his wishes, André, early on the morning of 23d, entered the lines, and was provided with a refuge for the day in the house of one John Andreas, one of Arnold's.

There he remained till nightfall. It had been agreed that after dark Smith was to convey him on board the Vulture in a boat. When the time came the boat refused. He was provided with a yard, and afraid of mischief. With great difficulty a horse was obtained, and André started off on horseback. He crossed the river at King's Ferry, passed the American guards, and taking leave of Smith at the entrance of the "Neutral Ground," was riding early on the morning of 23d, between Tarrytown. His feelings can well be imagined. He had succeeded in an enterprise of the highest importance to the British cause. He had in his stocking full plans of West Point, and Arnold's scheme for betraying the post to the British. He had, he knew, risked his neck; but the game had been worth the risk, and it was won. In a couple of hours he would be within the British lines.

As he rode along, his mind doubtless full of these thoughts, and his heart perhaps turning to the lovely Miss Seward girl away in England whose love had fired his ambition, three men sprang out of a hedge and seized his bridle. He was not, however, rather nearer the British than the American lines, in the Neutral Ground. This Neutral Ground was soon to become small patch. From either army, on the look-out for deserters, spies, or forage; and the fair presumption was that the men who had stopped him were a British patrol. André had no doubt of it when the men, in order to deceive him, stated or insinuated that they were of the "Lower" or British army. He at once answered himself a British officer, traveling on business of the highest importance.

"Then," said they, "you are our prisoner."

Perceiving his mistake, the young officer tried to purchase his way. The people on the Neutral Ground were notoriously corrupt. André offered the men his watch, his purse, all the valuables he had. They were so surprised. But the hope was taken off his horse, and his person searched. In his stocking were discovered plans and papers. Unless his captors, though they could not understand them, suspected to be of importance, and without Arnold's love of time with him and them to Colonel Jamieson, who commanded on the American lines.

It is the capture which forms the subject of our second picture—"The Tempter and the Patriot." Washington Irving says (vol. iv., page 121):

"Mr. Jamieson had not proceeded far, when, coming to a place where a small stream crossed the road and ran into a woody dell, a man sprang out from the trees, leveled a musket, and brought him to a stand, while two other men, similarly armed, showed themselves prepared to support their comrade. The man who first stepped out wore a refugee uniform. . . . . The ragged refugee coat, which had deceived André, and been the cause of his betraying himself, had been given to Paulding by one of his captors, in exchange for a good yeoman garment of which they stripped him."

Our artist adds:

"I have merely to remark that Irving, in his 'Sketch Book,' alludes to the stately white-wood tree under which his captors searched André, and found the terrible evidence of his rascality. His limbs were gnashed and fantastic, twisting down almost to the earth, and rising again into the air," etc.; and it was struck by lightning on the same day when news of Arnold's death reached Tarrytown. Fact!!!

The rest of the tale is full of dramatic effects, and resembles a chapter in a sensation story. Colonel Jamieson recognized the plans and detected Arnold's handwriting. His first impulse was that Arnold was a traitor; his second that he was not. He stayed both, for André was a prisoner, a talented one, but he sent André to Arnold.

Had André reached Arnold the sad page of his execution would not have been written. He would have escaped with his tempter; and though his daring project would have failed, he would none the less have received from his country the fit reward of his boldness and self-devotion. It was ordered otherwise. The fact of André's first lines, under escort, when he was recalled. Major Talmadge had persuaded Jamieson to retain the body of the prisoner. Then, from mine to mine, he and bade him return, André must have felt that his hour was come.

Major Talmadge could not prevail upon Colonel Jamieson not to communicate with Arnold. The Major saw through the latter's treachery; the Colonel, more trustful, and more deeply sensitive to discipline, felt it due to his superior to communicate to him the strange circumstances of André's arrest. He wrote to say that a man bearing the name of Anderson, and provided with a pass by General Arnold, had been so unexpectedly owned that he was a British officer, had been taken at Tarrytown, with plans of West Point, and other papers, concealed in his boots; that the prisoner was in custody; and that the papers had been sent to Washington.

The weight of his treachery had hung like lead round Arnold's neck from the hour he had parted from André. Now, when he received the note, he was pallen, nervous, and even more irritable than usual. When Washington's aids arrived at the Point with dispatches, he could scarcely control himself sufficiently to tender them the common services of hospitality. They were astonished at the agitation of his wife, doubtless a partner in his guilt, was even more anxious; she could not leave her room. From such terrible scenes as she doubtless may have seemed a relief. And it came. He was at breakfast with the aids when Colonel Jamieson's letter reached him. He rose from the table, he hastened to his wife's room, and shrieked to her that André was taken, and all was lost. The intruders were at the door. Then, as the first husband, better fitted for the crisis, ran down stairs, told the aids that he had some orders to give to the officers in one of the forts opposite, leaped on a horse which he had kept ready saddled, galloped to the riverside, and took refuge on board the sloop in the Vulture, which he had detained to be ready for such an emergency. Before the aid-de-camps had ceased to wonder at the suddenness of the departure and actions the traitor was safe under the British flag.

The moment André heard of his escape he wrote to Washington, avowing his name and stating his case. It was a clear one. No soldier of experience could justly or honorably condemn André for his part in deciding it. He had entered the American lines to obtain possession, by treason, of the key of West Point. In military law he who thus acts is a spy, and his doom is death. The only point which André could urge in his favor was collected into the American lines, unconsciously, by Arnold. This pretense, it is quite plain, will not stand the test of examination. André was a British soldier, and a man of shrewdness and experience. When he entered the American lines he must have perceived it instantly. They did he must have. Why did he not instantly return? Why did he remain all the day, or more, in the American lines? He must have known where he was, and what he risked by being there. He was certainly free to act; to fall in with circumstances, or not to admit that he was both weak and foolish, neither of which he was in any degree. The historian must answer with the unpleasant truth that he was guilty on his own showing. Had he been acquitted, no spy could ever have been hanged.

The last scene of André is very mournful. Major André's sentence was undoubtedly just, but none can withhold sympathy from the brave young soldier. He met an ignominious death, in the prime of a successful life, with the firmness of a Roman.

His captors, Williams, Paulding, and Van Wart, will always be remembered as types of faithful patriots. They were true, and to them André's bribes would have been a small fortune. To have taken them would have made the three richer than they were; but they were poor, and had labored for the cause of American Independence. Williams, Paulding, and Van Wart suffered, and we add a name in history as André's is infamous.

DRIFTING AWAY.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

"My good Bertha joins me in the invitation," wrote an old friend, who lived the easy life of a well-to-do country gentleman some fifty miles away from the noisy city, amidst the work, and din, and cares of which I often grew weary. "Come, and come now, when the trees are greenest, the earth in richest attire, and the air like a summer zephyr," he added, "and we will ride, and sail—I have the fairest of pleasure-boats—and spend the days as merrily as if the world had never a care or sorrow. Come! I will take no refusal. You are wearing yourself out too fast in that toiling city."

The invitation came at the right moment. I was drooping over my work with slow hands and failing spirits.

"I will be at Fern Dale," I wrote, "in a week. Many thanks for your kind invitation."

And in a week I stood face to face with my old friend. It was twice twelve months since I had seen him. He had gained literally in flesh during the time; and his face, though smoother and larger, was fresher and younger in appearance than when I last saw him. The years had not dealt so kindly with Bertha, his sweet wife, I was grieved to see. Her face had grown thinner, though not less beautiful. It was not the beauty of old that caused your eyes to linger on her countenance, for the delicately rounded outline and warm tints had fled. Her pale, thin face, anxious thought and feeling there, and a depth and mystery in her eyes which I had never seen before. How slenderly in contrast was the round, radiant smile that lit up his whole face with the glow of sunbeams, and the fascinating light that played now and then so feebly, yet so full of angel sweetness, just around her mouth. She was sitting with a baby in her lap when I entered. Instead of laying it down, or calling an attendant, she received me with the nursling in her arms; and her eyes gazed, every now and then, from mine to the cherub face that lay against her bosom.

"Another baby," said I, as I touched the peachy cheek with my finger.

"And the dearest darling of them all," she answered, looking down upon it tenderly.

"She's perfectly bewitched by that baby," said my friend, as he laid his hand in a fond way upon her shoulder. "You would think, to see her, that she'd never seen a baby in her life before. But come into the library: I've got a hundred things to talk with you about."

And he drew me away ere I had been five minutes in the company of his wife. I saw that her eyes followed me, as if I carried their light of happiness away with me.

"I'm sorry to see that Bertha is not looking so well as when I was at Fern Dale last time," said I, as we sat down in the handsome library.

"Not looking well!" My friend seemed a little surprised at the remark. "You have forgotten. In my eyes she never looked better. She was always a delicate, fair creature, you know, rarely had much color."

"Perhaps my memory is at fault; but I have a vision of Bertha with rounder, ruddier cheeks than I see to-day."

"That must baby in her arms will suggest a reason for the change. It does not come from failing health."

My friend seemed so entirely at ease on the subject that I said no more; but I did not feel satisfied. We talked for an hour in the library, when dinner was announced, and we joined his wife at the table. She had on a white lawn dress, dotted over with small blue forget-me-nots, and a plain lace cap. A slight warmth was visible in her cheeks, and her eyes, as she lifted them to mine, were full of tender gentleness. She looked pale and beautiful as a consecrated vestal. I saw my friend's eyes rest proudly and lovingly upon her for a few moments, and he gave himself up to the agreeable work that lay before him.

I noticed that while my friend's wife did, with a pleased alacrity, the honors of the table, urging one dish after another upon her guest and her husband, she ate very little herself. The fact must have attracted the attention of my friend, for he would certainly have remonstrated. I could not help saying, as I saw her playing with, instead of eating, her dessert,

"Don't you eat any thing, Bertha?" I had known her many years, and was even before her marriage —and always addressed her with the old familiarity.

"Oh, she lives on air!" spoke up my friend, smiling. "So don't imitate her example while at Fern Dale. I am made of grosser stuff, and can't get on without substantial things. I should make up what are called creature comforts."

Bertha smiled faintly, and looked beautiful, but too ethereal in my eyes.

After dinner we drove out, leaving Bertha at home with the baby and domestic affairs. Not a word was said about her going with us. Our drive was over breezy hills, and amidst scenery of the most picturesque character. I felt new life in all my pulses as we went rushing through the exhilarating air. It was sundown when we returned, each of us in a light vapor as though a hearty meal had not been taken only a few hours before.

The warm, rosy twilight of Bertha's chamber, at dinner-time had faded; and as I looked at her across the tea-table, I noticed an expression of weariness about her eyes and a languid falling of the lips, that made me feel uncomfortable. She asked if I had enjoyed the ride, and listened with much appearance of deep interest to several sunny points in the fine scenery through which we had driven. I was a little surprised, however, to learn from a remark she made, that she had never looked upon it herself.

After my friend and I retired to the library, where we spent the evening alone, talking of old times; discussing the merit of new books; the lingering and ever current topics of the day. Bertha did not join us. Once I asked for her. I had pleasant recollections of hours spent in her company.

"Oh, she's buried with the children, or closeted with her cook," answered my friend, smiling in his easy-good-natured way. "Bertha has become a famous housewife."

"She has good a mind for brital affair this fashion," said I. "Bertha was born for something more than a simple housewife."

"I know that," replied my friend, with a slight closing of his brows. "But women will take their way. Her children and her household have completely absorbed her."

"Do you think this absorption of her life a good thing, a healthy one—for either mind or body?" I asked.

"Perhaps not. But there is a wonderful power of adaptation in nature, as you are aware. I guess it will all work out right. I often wish it were different; yet, as wishing does no good, I never permit myself to get worried over what can't be helped. I am something of a philosopher you know, and manage, under all circumstances, to keep a quiet mind. If Bertha likes her way best, why so be it; she's a good, loving, over-indulgent wife to me, and I won't force her out of the world she seems most pleased to dwell in—though our tastes do run parallel in so many things; and we might enjoy so much together."

My friend's feelings lay close to the surface, and I saw his eyes glisten as he turned them away from me. He was a special life-study to me—a man who loved his own ease and pleasures as well as he did could love any thing out of himself. She was, in his eyes, the purest among women. He was proud of her—very proud of her.

On the next morning I met Bertha at breakfast, and looked narrowly into her face. I saw more of the work of exhaustion than I had noticed on the day before. Her eyes were hazy in flat surfaces on her cheeks, forehead, and shrunken nostrils, instead of showing rounded undulations. Her lips were pale, and the blue veins of eye-lids, large, dark, and lustrous—close out upon you from a forehead as white as their shadowy color. She had no appetite, and only made a show of eating, as I could see; while her husband piled away the steak, mutton chops, and omelet in a liberal fashion, and kept himself so busy at this pleasant work as to permit his wife's asteniousness to escape observation.

"You don't look very well this morning," said I, feeling really concerned.

Bertha smiled faintly, as her husband turned a look of inquiry upon her face, and answered,

"My head aches a little;" and then added, "I hope my friend's appetite don't keep you away. I don't know what ailed him. He didn't sleep for an hour at a time all night. I had to get up and go into another room. He can't bear loss of rest."

"No," said he; "I must have my regular sleep. How there could be any sleep for one after night with their babies, up and down at all hours, is more than I can understand. It would kill me."

Bertha coughed slightly, cleared her throat, and coughed again two or three times. There was a sound in the cough that was unpleasant to my ears. I glanced toward my friend, to see how it affected him, but he had not appeared to notice it.

"And kills the mothers sometimes," I ventured to remark.

My friend looked at me for a moment or two, as if I had almost offended him slightly, and went on with his breakfast. I noticed the cough again, once or twice, during the meal.

After breakfast my friend and I retired alone to the library, leaving Bertha to her maternal and household cares. As sit on the sofa, and was having one side of my friend's estate, and in that "fairest of pleasure-boats" about which he had written me, when I saw a sudden agitation. After spending an hour or two in the library, talking and reading, we went down to the river, my friend carrying a lunch-basket which Bertha had placed in his hand.

"Why can't you go with us?" I asked, as I looked into her failing face.

She shook her head, and half turned it toward the door, from which she had stepped with the baby to greet her husband on the basket, thus indicating that duty must go before pleasure.

"It's a shame to invite her," said my friend, in what struck me as a light and careless manner. "She never goes any where. Leave her with her babies and her servants; she is happiest among them."

I stood nearest to Bertha when this was said, and could see that I have been mistaken in the sound that reached me—it was a faint sigh.

"There's something wrong here," said I to myself as we walked toward the river. "A life is wasting rapidly away, and no suspicion of the fact seems to have been awakened. My friend is either very selfish or very blind. How can he look into his own ruddy face, as it stands each day reflected to him in his shaving-glass, and then look into pale, shadowy, fleeting countenance, and not feel the truth?"

A week at Fern Dale confirmed all my first impressions as to the rapidly failing condition of Bertha. And yet my friend saw nothing of it. Such commonplaces, even, of the peril in which his wife stood. "How can he gaze into that pale, thin face," I would silently ask of myself once again, "and not take the warning that nature gives?" Was his own enjoyment of mere sensuous life so great that he could not understand a condition like Bertha's? He loved her, nay, almost idolized her; and when I would hint, occasionally, in a concerned way, my fears touching her health, he would regard me with a vague, bewildered countenance, as if I were treating him with the shadow of some far-off evil. It never seemed to occur to him that the evil was at his door.

One morning Bertha did not make her appearance, as usual, at the breakfast-table. On asking for her, my friend answered, that she had been up for most of the night with her baby, and was too much indisposed to rise.

"Nothing serious?" I remarked.

"Oh no!" he answered. "She often has such spells. We shall see her at dinner-time, as usual, only look a little paler, perhaps."

Only a little paler! That must be a deathlike pallor," I said to myself.

This morning I was to have a sail on the river. Soon after breakfast we went to the boathouse, and summoned the fair-haired boy who had already spent so many pleasant hours together.

As she glided gently out, like a bird floating on the buoyant water, through some mishap the light cord by which my friend held her slipped from his hand, and she passed from his reach in a moment, out into the current, and commenced drifting away. My friend became instantly excited, and showed great anxiety about the boat. His face flushed, his eyes dilated, all his movements were hurried and disturbed. He ran here and there in an incoherent manner, and appeared for some moments to lose all self-possession. At lust, catching at a small coil of rope, he tied a stone to one end of it, and gave me the other end to hold: then throwing the stone with all his strength, it fell into the boat. Eagerly taking the rope from my hand, he drew on it until the slack was in. Now came the moment of suspense. The boat was moving steadily with the current; should the stone not obtain a firm anchorage inside, but release itself and be drawn over the gunwale, the little vessel would float beyond our present means of rescue. But the expedient proved successful. The stone held with sufficient tenacity to overcome the pressure of the current, and soon the boat's course became floating to our outstretched hands.

"Safe!" exclaimed my friend, as he grasped the side of the boat with eager fondness. "How careless I was!" he added, as he stepped over the side, and commenced pulling the tail.

"You could easily have recovered her again," said I, "even if she had drifted away a mile or so before a row-boat could be procured in which to go after her."

"Oh yes!" he replied; "but I didn't think of that. I was only conscious that my beauty was drifting away beyond my reach. Don't laugh at me; but I have a real affection for this boat."

Soon we were moving away over the rippling water under the pressure of a gentle breeze, my friend every now and then recurring to the little incident I have mentioned.

"You don't know," he said, as we floated into a sheltered cove where the wind no longer blew in soft cheek against our sunny sail, that hung loose-ly against the reed-like mast, "how that little peril of my boat disturbed me," again alluding to the circumstance.

I looked at him without answering.

"You are sad, Arthur," he remarked. "What thoughts are shadowing your mind?"

"Thoughts!" I replied. "Can you, Shill I let them come into speech?" I said, after a moment of silence.

"By all means, my friend. Don't hesitate."

He leaned forward, and looked at me anxiously.

"I was thinking," said I, "of a far more precious thing than a drifting from you—a separation, drifting, and getting more distant every day, and yet you have it not."

"I don't understand you." He looked bewildered.

"Bertha." I merely uttered the name.

He grew pale instantly.

"Bertha is drifting from you," said I, "and unless you stretch forth a hand to save her, right speedily, she will pass out of your reach."

He let the rudder, which he had been holding, slip from his hand, and leaned, with a frightened look, toward me.

"Why do you say this?" he asked, in a breathless manner.

"Because it so appears to my eyes. Bertha has called sadly often to you of late. All the while you has departed, and all the fine roundness of face and limb has wasted away. She eats nothing comparatively, yet is cased with about the same wear out a strong man. You, with your vigorous health, could not endure them."

"But what is it?" asked my friend, with pale alarm in his face. My few sentences had startled him from a pleasant life-dream. "She will bury herself, as you see. What can I do?" he repeated.

"You can stretch out your hand and save her before the current, that is now floating her away, bears her beyond your reach," said I, confidently; "and I take the privilege of a friend to say so at this time. Not once since I have been here has she shared our recreating drives or refreshing hours on the river. She does not sit with us at the balcony, bowing in with our pleasant talks, and making them more beautiful, as in days of old, and when we meet her at meal-times, looking so pale and spiritwelle, it is plain to be seen that mind and body are feeling from excessive weariness. Can this go on long, and her delicate organism not give way? Be assured not, for the strain is to great."

"But what is it?" asked my friend, with his face looking still more alarmed. "She is wedded to these household cares, and enslaved to her children."

"I have not seen," said I, "any attempt on your part to set her free in any way from them. Have been no remonstrance against her self-sacrificing course; no manifested concern; no urgent invitations to join in our rides and rambles. Speak plainly, for there is a life at stake—but a dull kind of acquiescence. Now, if you wish to keep her longer, it must be changed. You must, at any cost of effort, see that she no longer violates the plainest of health."

"You have awakened me from a dream," said my friend, as he grasped the rudder again, and headed the boat somewhat. "Drifting! yes! Drifting away!" he added, a few moments afterward. "Yes, it is even so. But I will catch at her receding garments and hold her back."

At dinner-time we met Bertha, looking worse than I had seen her since my arrival. I noticed that my friend's manner wandered every little while to her face, and that he did not eat with his usual appetite. After the dessert, and before we left the table, he leaned toward her and said, with a tenderness in his voice that no wife's heart could resist,

"I am sorry to see you looking so worn out, Bertha. Last night was a severe tax on you. Have you been sitting down this morning?"

"Part of the time," she answered, looking at her husband gratefully. It was plain to be seen that she was not used to such tender inquiries.

"This way of life won't do, Bertha," he went on. "It is destroying you. I see you drifting away from me." His voice failed a little. "And I must put forth a hand to draw you back. Nature will not bear the burdens you are laying upon her."

I saw light coming into her pale face, and love beaming out from her eyes, upon her husband. His interest and concern were genuine, and she felt it.

"We are going to take an easy ride this afternoon," he added, "and want you to go with us. Now don't say no!"

I saw objection in her face; and her lips moved as if she were about putting her objection in words. But her husband's "Now don't say no!" coming as it did on his warmly expressed request and concern, changed her purpose, and she said,

"If it will give you pleasure."

"Nothing in the world would give me more pleasure," replied my friend, with almost lover-like warmth.

Here was visible, already, a new life in the countenance of Bertha. A soft glow was faintly dyeing her cheeks, and a mellow light tempering the unnatural whiteness of her forehead.

"When do you wish me to be ready?" she asked, as I looked at the clock, as we still rode until six. That will be long enough for you."

It was the Bertha of other days who talked so pleasantly and looked so cheerful during that ride. At tea-time she was another being from what she appeared on the evening before, or, indeed, on any evening since my arrival at Fort Dale. The ride had quickened in her mind a new and healthier impulse. She was a lover of all things luxuriant in nature, and this had given her a pure enjoyment, which could not soon die out. During the evening, in the pleasant little management, drew her away from her nursery into the library, where we enjoyed her company for over an hour. Her children were forgotten, and out of her mind interested, to give her thoughts a new direction, to call back all the themes in art and literature that once filled and delighted the married life imagination? She felt the change in him, and was, I could see, half surprised, yet touched thereby.

On the next day she accompanied us in our morning drive, and in the afternoon we remained, after a little persuasion, to take a sail on the river. There was an unmistakable glow on her cheeks as she came back from the garden with a bouquet, and I noticed that she took a relish of tongue, and ate two biscuits at supper-time—an appropriation of food quite beyond her usual habit. In this last case, since my visit to Fern Dale.

"You have sought her garments ere she drifted quite away," said I to my friend as we sat together that evening in the library, where we had enjoyed her company for over an hour.

"Yes," he answered, with feeling; "and I will cling to them as a man clings to his life!" She did not guess that I saw the waters again threaten any fault of mine. Was ever a man so thoughtless and stupid as I have been?"

"Many," said I, "not just as thoughtless, just as blind as you were," said I; "and hundreds of overtasked wives—overlooked. It may be, as in Bertha's case—drifting steadily away from you mortal shores upon the sea of eternity; and in a few weeks, or months, or years, will be out of the reach of hands that will clutch after them in agony when it is too late!"

THE SILVER FLORIN.

SOME few years ago, when I was younger than I am now, I was travelling in Germany, and came to Zahn. He occupied a room on the same floor with myself; and from my first début upon the stage of Zahn had been my warm and constant friend. Our affection was immediate and unselfish. We had nothing to gain or lose from each other. When the Zahn theatre was closed we either sold our purses were in common. When the money market was easy, we lived upon fresh barbarisms; but, a beautiful bit of pork tenderloin, a Dutch herring, with bread and Switzer cheese ad libitum, was a supper for a king. Then, when Carnival came round, light, arm in arm we walked Broadway, and trusted to fortune for a change.

It is a few days after our first acquaintance, which began with the loan of a hammer, he had given me his whole history, with the exception of the one secret of his life—his love. He was a Swiss. He came in him with time; and one evening, confessed his begetting confidence. Between two cups of silver florin, carefully stowed in cotton, nestled in a little box, and hung about his neck, where it had also since the day of his birth, he had been baptized on the banks of the Main—that sweet flowing German river within the sound of whose waters they were born. He had come down to Amsterdam to seek his fortune as a lithographic artist, and Marguerite returned to her little cottage home to weep and pray.

Heinrich had no dream of achieving a rapid fame and fortune. He was content to labour faithfully, but he had a dream which he kept ever in sight, that some day, perhaps, he would be fortunate enough to be able to go back to the cottage home of Marguerite, when he had a home for them and a certainty of support. Two years had elapsed, but, as yet, he had not been able to return. He was still at the date of my meeting with him, was as far removed as the day on which he had landed at Pier No. 5, South River.

As a special and particular favor, I was sometimes indulged with free translations of his love-pages in Marguerite's letters. They must, as Heinrich said, have been models of epistolary style in the original, but I must confess their beauties were somewhat lost in the translation. It was in the silver florin I took the deepest interest—this marvellous piece of money, which Heinrich was being endowed with a magical charm, gained by being blessed with the prayers of St. Ulrich and dipped in its waters, the powers and location of this wonderful spring always remaining a myth in my mind, thereby, perhaps, heightening the respect I bore the charmed florin. For what do we respect so much as that we do not understand? It had the power to tell, by its dullness or brightness, sickness or joy to the absent one: coming woe or happiness. Many a time has Heinrich peeped at his magical piece and muttered, with a look, in his gravity, that Marguerite was not well to-day; and no gayety could rouse his drooping spirits till the florin had recovered its former lustre and gone with a clear ring. Occasionally he would tell me the florin was bright; and on that day any favorite project, either of business or pleasure, would be put in force with a confidence that could only be inspired by the omen. It was useless to laugh at this; it was too earnest.

One sunny day in June the florin shone brightly in its silvery beauty. I had only the night before rubbed it up myself, and bestowed a new bed of cotton upon it, while Heinrich was putting in a few fresh touches to the great picture of Columbus Discovering America (an original idea of my own).

For I felt, though I did not allow some property in the florin myself. Well, this June morning the florin shone very bright, and a long-contemplated trip to Lot was realized for that day in celebration of the event.

On the way down we had noticed a mother and child, a pretty boy of about five years. I had observed the mother, Heinrich the child. He was fortunate enough to make acquaintance with the child; I was not so fortunate with the mother. It was bribery and corruption on the part of Heinrich, aided by several pieces of cake and an apple, which he had pillaged from the dinner-table, and stowed in his pockets to suit an emergency.

The loud merry laughing and the company marching up the deck, Heinrich and myself at a respectable distance in the rear, when a shriek, a woman's shriek, resounded through the deck of the steamer, events and the rattle of the drums. We turned; the crowd was rushing down the deck. Not to be behindhand in curiosity, Heinrich a little in advance. I saw, as I ran, my beautiful lady standing upon the string-piece of the wheel, her hands raised in the air, and in all in a moment of despair. The child was in the water. Before the conception was fairly formed in my mind, I was on the string-piece beside the lady. One glance down and I saw Heinrich bobbing about in the water below. I knew then it was the child. It took the lady's arm and told her so, as I drew her away from the edge of the deck, where the crowd was pressing her back. I knew that she would be sure to send the child if not removed. She looked at me wildly, and, attributing my grave and serious looks and shaking as to change the tragedy, in the eyes of the crowd, almost into a comedy. At this moment a loud, joyful shout arose on the people from the string-piece, and I knew the child was saved. And so knew the mother, for she fainted in my arms as she shout rose.

In a few minutes we were in a neighboring house. The mother was consigned to the ladies, and Heinrich, myself, and the captain were engaged receiving the babe. Shall I ever forget that little angel coming back from the water, opened her pretty blue eyes, and staring upon the doctor said, "Don't cut off my hair, good people. I know that I am dead, and don't cut off my hair. Mamma likes my hair. My name is Lilly—they call me Lilly because I am so white. But don't cut off my hair."

Ah, Lilly! I am sure you are not dead, for not yet which one of us would not have given his own life to save yours, Lilly? An hour or two sufficed to get mother and child on board the steamer, in essence that a carriage could be called, and they conveyed home. The carriage stopped at a handsome house in a fashionable locality, and Heinrich carried Miss Lilly in, while my duty was the escort of the child's mother. Heinrich stood in the hall with a puzzled look as his wife threw herself into his arms in a fresh flood of tears. It was some minutes before explanation could take place. Miss of Livingston wrung Heinrich's hand and hugged him with half the force he did me I do not wonder that my Gretchen was not anxious to know me immediately. All our attempts, however, at holding any one credible to him, was to the gentleman who took us locally in charge. In half an hour Heinrich, as I am convinced entirely against his will, was thrust upon me by exit from the window of Livingston, who, throwing the whole of that evening, seemed to be laboring under the delusion that my appearance was the only circumstance wanting necessary to his happiness; while Madam suffered under the same delusion, only varied by cold turkey and boiled lobsters. I was a hero for that evening.

It is almost useless to say that a strong friendship grew up between the Livingstons, Heinrich, and myself. They soon became the confidants of our aspirations, and Heinrich's love, with a particular delicacy which always marks a man of the right stamp. When Livingston's offer of aid to Heinrich was declined, as I knew it would be, it came to me.

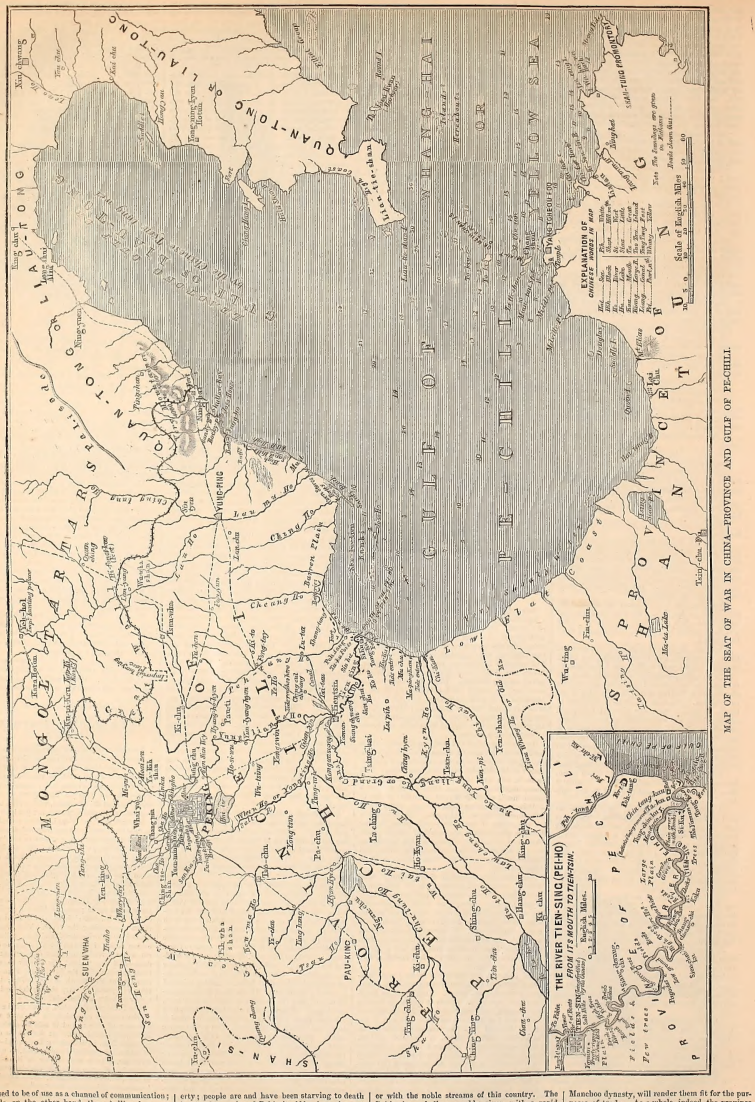
I am not now about to enter upon a statement of all my finesse; it is sufficient to say that, in three months and seven days after the first perception, Heinrich was induced to accept a most generous fund to fit up a lithographic office with material and presses, and a modest house with furniture, for all of which he gave his notes payable at different dates, extending over a period of five years. Nothing was now left to be but the sending for the object of his love, which was soon accomplished. We counted the days, and consulted the oracle—the silver florin. Nothing occurred to mar its brightness. It was clear, by its magical money, that the loved ones were on their way, and happy. Every night I handled the florin with religious faith, wiped it carefully and returned it to its bed, which I renewed as often as it became soiled. It was a treasure with Lilly and its mother. I suits I had become a rigid convert to the charm; its reward for which I was often indulged with its charge of an evening, as a child would be allowed to play with a toy it admires. The time drew near for the expected arrival—every thing was arranged. It was agreed that Heinrich and Marguerite were to be married at Livingston's house, after which they would repair to their own. In one week, at farthest, the steamer would bring the bride. Heinrich was nervous, strongly given to spirits and tremulous, while I to consultations with the clerk of the weather.

One bright cold morning in January, before I was out of my bed, Heinrich with his florin, minus coat, vest, and one boot, rushed into my room. He was ghastly pale, his lips closed, his teeth set. In his hand he held the florin, the lid of the box open. His appearance terrified me—I sprang from my bed. To my question as to what was the matter, he could only gasp, "The florin! The florin!" I looked in the box, the florin was there, but how transformed! Only the night before I had wiped and laid it on a new bed of cotton; now, it was not only dull but positively black—such as it was that had been exposed to the air. I shuddered as I looked upon its ominous deadness, and turned pale as Heinrich hoarsely pronounced one, "Dead!" He still said to me, "Dead!" I had no word of comfort for my friend. In my mind I could see the fine ship going down at sea with all her living freight. It was not in me to tell him hope. I did all I could do—I mingled my tears with his, and together we mourned over the announcement of the florin.

The original agreement that we concluded to reserve the disastrous news from the Livingstons until the steamer was past due. Time flew away without moderating our grief, when one bright sunny sunny day we were startled by the shouts of the newsboys as they ran up Broadway, "Arrival of the steamship Frieda. Extra Lyndl!" I could see the flush fly over the face of Heinrich, and then he became paler than before. It was but a few moments out of the dock, before the ship was just hauling in, the passengers grouped upon her deck. How he strained his gaze! I felt that he could not have been more than twenty. They were not there." How my heart fell! "They have died upon the passage." The florin was right. Before the gangway plank was cast Heinrich was upon the deck, I after him. "When did they die?" he said, seizing the captain by the arm. "Die! who die?" said that jolly mariner in response. Twas I who answered their names. "A Yon will find them below I fear," I said; they wasn't dead ten minutes ago." I could have hugged that splendid man; but I didn't. Instead of which I went to my room, found Heinrich below, and in one minute found myself kissing a second pretty girl, Gretchen's sister, and a nice motherly looking old lady about sixty; as though they were my own mother and bride-expectant. The old lady had been sent as a companion to the young bride just recovered, Marguerite had judged it best not to awaken her from her sleep. And this accounted for the non-appearance on deck.

The florin was a false prophet—Heinrich and I mutually agreed to say nothing about the deception. But in the midst of our laughter I looked out, and the charmed piece was exhibited in all its brightness. Heinrich's Marguerite looked grave, Heinrich puzzled, and Livingston vacant. It was black, even to darkening the cotton upon which it lay. Livingston took a portion of the cotton from the box and examined it, and then in a careless way held it to the light: it flashed and was gone. "The weather was out!" I was the first to say, and hence the black—

Who had a merry wedding, and I inderced his taste. Marguerite was a pretty girl, and a good girl; she has been a good wife, too, for these ten years, and gives them pretty children to their home. Heinrich is a prosperous man.



I hope only that I shall be as happy a one in my marriage with Lilly (she applies nothing strong in that, is there?). We are not to be married for two years yet, and then Lilly will be seventeen, and I thirty.

OUR MAP OF NORTHERN CHINA.

THE admirable map of Northeastern China which we publish herewith, will enable our readers to follow with precision the movements of the allied squadrons in China. At the latest dates received both English and French had commenced the attack—whether upon the Taku Forts, or upon another point of the sea-board, with a view to the occupation of Pekin, we are not yet informed.

The mouth of the Pei-ho is now historical ground. In 1854 the British and American plenipotentiaries visited it, and were received with every demonstration to ascend the river. In 1858 Lord Elgin and Baron Gros forced the entrance, and took the Taku Forts after a desperate conflict; unable to find a river to Tien-sin, which they entered forcibly; but were forced to retire for some time. Retiring, they returned home, as it afterward proved, with the assurance of the opening. In 1859 the new British Ambassador (Mr. Bruce) presented himself at the mouth of the Pei-ho, and claimed, under the treaty, the right of ascending the river. The demand was refused, an attack was ensued, and the assailants were beaten back. It was on this occasion, as our readers will all remember, that our gallant Admiral conceived that "blood was thicker than water." Once more, in 1860, the British and French squadrons are at the mouth of the Pei-ho; this time they will probably carry their point, and not stop either at Taku or Tien-tsin.

The Province of Pe-chi-li, which will be the scene of the coming campaign, is the most northerly province of China, and is said to contain about 20,000,000 inhabitants. It derives its chief importance from its containing the capital—Pekin—of which we published an account, in connection with Mr. Ward's visit thither, in No. 151 of this journal. Next to Pekin the most important place in the Province is Tien-tsin, which stands on the confluence of the Pei-ho River and the Grand Canal. Tien-tsin has been a city of great wealth, being the depôt of the grain trade, where the grain-bearing fleet from the south used to distribute their cargoes for the supply of the capital and other northern cities. But, latterly, the Grand Canal has fallen into such hopeless decay that it has ceased to be of use as a channel of communication; while, on the other hand, the rebellion has prevented many of the grain-growing provinces from sending their usual supplies of rice and wheat to the capital. Hence not only Tien-tsin, but the whole adjacent country is in a state of crying poverty; people are and have been starving to death by the thousand, and Pekin itself has been the seat of a famine.

The River Pei-ho or Tien-tsin—it is known by both names—and the other rivers of Pe-chili, must not be confounded with the great rivers of China, or with the noble streams of this country. The Pei-ho is a shallow, muddy river, with a rapid current, an uncertain course, and marshy banks; the same description will suffice for the other rivers of Pe-chili. Nothing but such enormous outlays as used to be made in the palmy days of the Manchoo dynasty, will render them fit for the purposes of trade. As a whole, indeed, the province is the most desolate in the kingdom.

A few days more will probably place us in possession of news which will impart a rare interest to the localities marked on our map.

"WHERE THE —— ARE YOU DRIVING TO, SIR?" CRIED I.

A DAY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER.

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER IX.

NEXT mornings are terrible things, whether one awakes to the thought of some awful run of ill-luck at play, or with the racking headache of a new port or a very "fruity" Burgundy. These are dreadful, too, when they bring remorse—vague and indistinct, perhaps—of some serious affectations, passionate words exchanged, and expressions of defiance reciprocated; but, as a measure of self-reproach and humiliation, I know not any distress can compare with the sensation of awaking to the consciousness that our cups have so ministered to imagination that we have put on a mythical narrative of ourself and our belongings, and have built up a card-edifice of greatness that must tumble with the first touch of truth.

It was a sincere satisfaction to me that I was nothing of the skipper on that "next morning." He was to occupy with all the details of getting into port that I escaped his notice, and contrived to last unmarked. Little scraps of my last night's biography would obtrude themselves upon me, mixed up strangely with incidents of that day's journey; but, as I was actually puzzled at moments to remember whether he was not the descendant of the famous rebel friend of Lord Edward Fitzgerald, and I a vat who was sold in the public square at Tunis.

These dissolving views of an evening before are very often the coinage: not to say, most valued resolve, whose conscience is not burglariously assailed by a riotous imagination, but to the poor weak Potts-like organisation—and such who never enjoy a real sensation, or taste a real pleasure, save on the hypothesis of a mock situation.

I sat at my breakfast in the Goat meditating these things. The grand problem to resolve was this: Is it better to live a life of dull incidents and commonplace events in one's own actual sphere, or creating, by force of imagination, an ideal status—to soar into a region of higher conceptions, and more pictorial situations? What could existence in the first case offer me? A wearisome beaten path, with nothing to interest, nothing to stimulate me. On the other side lay glorious regions of lovely scenery, peopled with figures the most graceful and attractive. I was at once the associate of the wise, the witty, and the agreeable, with wealth at my command, and great prizes within my reach. Illusions all! to be sure; but what are not illusions—if by that word you take mere account of permanence? what is it in this world that we love to believe real is not illusionary—the question of duration being the only difference? Is not beauty perishable? Is not wit soon exhausted? What becomes of the proudest physical strength after middle life is reached? What of eloquence when the voice fails or hoarseness is the utility of inflection?

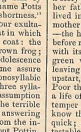
All these considerations, however convincing to myself, were not equally satisfactory as regarded others, and so I sat down to write a letter to Crofton, explaining the reasons of my sudden departure, and inclosing him Father Dyke's epistle which I had carried away with me. I began and ran on with the most firm resolve to be truthful and accurate. I wrote down not only the date but the day, "Goat, Milford," followed, and then, "My dear Crofton,—I would ill become one who has partaken of your generous hospitality, and who, from an unknown stranger, was admitted to the privilege of your intimacy, to quit the roof beneath which the happiest hours of his life were passed without expressing the deep shame and sorrow such a step has cost him, while he bespeaks your indulgence to hear the reason." This was my first sentence, and it gave me uncommon trouble. I desired to be dignified, yet grateful, proud in my humility, grieved over an abrupt departure, but sustained by a manly confidence in the strength of my own motives. If I read it over once, I read it twenty times; now deeming it too diffuse, now fearing lest I had compressed my meaning too narrowly. Might it not be better to open with, "Sir,—Before you see me, dear Crofton, or, before condemning the unhappy creature whose abject cry for mercy may seem but to increase the presumption of his guilt, and in whose faltering accents may appear the signs of a stricken conscience, read over, dear friend, the entire of this letter, weigh well the difficulties and dangers of him who wrote it, and say, is he not rather a subject for pity than rebuke? Is not this more a case for a tearful forgiveness than for chastisement and reproach?"

Like most men who have little habit of composition, my difficulties increased with every new attempt, and I became bewildered and puzzled what to choose. It was vividly important that the first lines of my letter should secure the favorable opinion of the reader; by one unhappy word, one ill-selected expression, a whole case might be prejudiced. I imagined Crofton angrily throwing the epistle from him with an impatient "Stuff and nonsense! a practised humbugger" or, worse again, calling out "Listen to this, Mary! is not Master Potts a cute hand? Is not this brazening it out with a vengeance?" Such a thought was agony to me; the very essence of my misery was that I could secure the esteem and regard of others. I yearned after the good opinion of my fellow-men, and these was no amount of falsehood I would not incur to obtain it. No, come what would of it, the Crofton must not think ill of me. They must not only believe me guiltless of ingratitude, but some one whose gratitude was worth having. It will elevate them in their own esteem if they suppose that the pebble they picked up in the highway turned out to be a ruby. It will open their hearts to feelings of generosity when they will not say to each other, "Let us be more careful another time; let us be guarded against showing attention to mere strangers; remember how we were taken in by that fellow Potts; what a specious reader he was—how plausible, how insinuating!" but, rather, "We can afford to be confiding, our experiences have taught us trustfulness. Poor Potts is a lesson that may inspire a hopeful belief in others." How little benefit can any one in his own individual capacity confer upon the world; but what a large measure of good may be distributed by the way he influences others! Thus, for instance, by the kind, sustained delusion of mine, I inspire a fond of virtues which, in my merely truthful character, I could never pretend to originate. "Yes," thought I, "the Croftons shall continue to esteem me; Potts shall be a beacon to guide, not a sunken rock to wreck them."

Thus resolving, I sat down to inform them that, on my return from a stroll, I was met by a man bearing a telegram informing me of the dying condition of my father's only brother, my sole relative on earth, by whose death I was the impulse of my affection, and not thinking of preparation, I started on board of a steamer for Waterford, and hence my letter, I said, "I inclose you the priest's letter, which amused me much. With all his shrewdness, the worthy churchman never suspected how completely my friend Keldrum and myself had humbugged him, nor did he discover the mistake I made about his episode that followed it were the subjects of a wager between ourselves. His marvelous cunning was thus for once at fault, as I shall explain to you more fully when we meet, and prove to you that, upon this occasion at least, 'crime was not deceived but duped.'" I began to have a line from him to the Crown Hotel, Brighton, and concluded.

With this act, I felt I had done with the past, and now addressed myself to the future. I purchased a few cheap necessaries for the road, as few and as cheap as was well possible; I said to myself, fortune shall lift you from the very dust of the high road, Potts, not one advantageous adjunct shall aid your elevation!

The train by which I was to leave did not start till noon, and so while away time I took up a number of the Times, which the Goat appeared to receive at third or fourth hand. My eye fell upon that memorable second column, in which I read the following:—



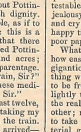
"Left his home in Dublin on the 8th ult., and not since been heard of, a young gentleman aged about twenty-two years, five feet nine and a quarter in height, slightly formed, and rather stooped in the shoulders, features pale and melancholy, eyes grayish, inclining to hazel, hair light brown, and worn long behind. He had on at his departure——"

I turned impatiently to the foot of the advertisement, and found that to any one giving such information as might lead to his discovery, was promised a liberal reward on application to Messrs. Potts and Co., Compounding Chemists and Apothecaries, Mary's Abbey. I actually grew sick with anger as I read this. To what end was it that I built up a glorious edifice of imaginative architecture, if by one miserable touch of coarse fact it could crumble into clay? To what purpose did I intrigue with Fortune to grant me a splendid destiny, if I was thus to be classed with runaway traders or strayed factors? I believe in my heart I could better have borne all the terrors of a charge of felony than the lowering, debasing, humiliating condition of being advertised for on a reward.

I had long since determined to be free as regarded the ties of country. I now resolved to be equally so with respect to those of family. I will be Potts no longer. I will call myself for the future—let me see—what shall it be that will not betray a presumed exercise of memory, and the troublesome task of unmarking my linen? I was forgetting in this that I was now, all my wearisome being left behind at the Rosary. Something with an initial I was requisite, and after much canvassing I fixed on Pottinger. If I am unhappy chance I should meet one who remembered me as Potts, I reserved the right of mildly correcting him by saying, "Pottinger, Pottinger! the name Potts was given me when at Eton for shortness." They will be that among the days of our exile tion in life few can compare with that in which we exchange a jacket for a tailed coat: the spring from the hobble to the full-grown frog; the emancipation from boyhood into adolescence is certainly very fascinating. Let me assure my reader that the bound from a monosyllabic name to a high-sounding epithet of three syllables is almost enchanting as this assumption of the toga virilis. I had often felt the terrible brevity of Potts; I had shrunk from answering the question, "Name, Sir?" from the indescribable shame of saying, Potts; but Pottinger could be uttered slowly and with dignity. One could even give the initial syllable, as if to say, "Mark well what I am saying; this is a name to be remembered." With that there must have been several and distinguished Pottingers, rich men—men of influence and acres! With these I should have no reason to blush.

"Do you go by the twelve-fifteen train, Sir?" asked the waiter, breaking in upon these meditations. "Only a quarter more to lose, Sir."

With a start, I saw it was already past twelve, so I paid my bill with all speed, and taking my knapsack I hurried forward to the train. There was considerable confusion as I arrived—a crush of cabs, watermen, and porters, blocked the way, and the screams of an arriving and departing train struggled against and confounded the clang of a great bell, the while myself, were bent on entering the station-house, was a young lady in deep mourning, whose fair complexions and delicate figure gave no prospect of resisting the shock and conflict before her. Seeing her so destitute of all protection, I approached her, and after a valorous effort and much buffeting, I fought her way for her to the ticket-window, but only in time to hear the fatal chant of a great bell, the bang of a glass door, and the cry of a policeman, "Too late, Sir!"



"Oh, what shall I do?" cried she, in an accent of intense agony, inadvertently addressing the world to myself. "What shall I do?"

"There's another train to start at three-forty," said I, confidingly, "and I think that waiting will be no inconvenience to me. It is a slow one, to be sure, stops every where, and only arrives in town at two o'clock in the morning."

I heard her sob; I distinctly heard her also behind her thick black veil, as I said this; and to offer whatamount of comfort I could, I added, "I, too, am disappointed, and obliged to await the next departure, and I shall be of the least service in any way——"

"Oh no, Sir! I am very grateful to you, but there is nothing—I mean—there is no help for me." And the voice dropped to a mere whisper.

"I sincerely trust,"

"WHEN WE CAME TO THE GATE ON THE ROAD HE TURNED ROUND FULL AND LOOKED AT THE HOUSE," ETC.

said I, in an accent of great deference and sympathy, "that the delay may not be the cause of grave inconvenience to you; and although a perfect stranger, if my assistance I can offer——"

"No, Sir; there is really nothing I could ask from your kindness. It was in turning back to bid good-by a second time to my mother." Here her agitation seemed to choke her, for she turned away and said no more.

"Shall I fetch a cab for you?" I asked. "Would you like to go back till the next train starts?"

"Oh, by no means, Sir! We live three miles from Milford; and besides, we were not at home. Here again she broke down, but added after a pause, "It is the first time I have been away from home."

With a little gentle force I succeeded in inducing her to enter the refreshment-room of the station, but she would take nothing; and after some attempts to engage her in conversation to while away the dreary time, I perceived that it would be some waste of politeness not to intrude upon her sorrow; and so I lighted my cigar, and proceeded to walk up and down the long terrace in front of the station. Three trunks, or rather two and a hat-box, kept my knapsack company on the other side of the tram-way, and on these I read, inscribed in a large hand, "Miss K. Herbert, per steamer Ardent, Ostend." I started. Was it in that direction my own wayward fortune tend? Was not Blondel in Belgium, and was it not in search of him that I was bent? "Oh, Fate!" I cried; "what subtle device of thine is this? What wily artifice art thou now engaged in? Is this a snare, or is it an aid?" Hast thou any secret purpose in this rencontre, for with thee there are no chances, no accidents in thy vicissitudes; all is prepared and fitted, like a piece of door-carpentry?" and then I fell into weaving a story for the young lady. She was an orphan: her father, the curate of the little parish she lived in, had just died, leaving herself and her mother in direst distress. She was leaving home all—the happy home of her childhood (I use it all before me—cottage, and garden, and little lawn, with its one cow and two sheep, and the small green wicket beside the road), and she was leaving all these to become a governess to an upstart, and overbearing, vulgar family at Ostend. Poor thing, how my heart bled for her! What trials of temper and of pride! The odious creature(I knew they are odious—will torture her to the quick; and Mrs. Trenchfort, or whatever her detestable name is, will lead her a life of cruel jealousy, and she'll have to bear every thing, and cry over it in secret, remembering the happy time in that honey-suckled porch, where poor papa used to read Wordsworth for them.

What a world of sorrow and pain! and how easily might it be made otherwise! What gigantic efforts are we forever making for something which we never live to enjoy! Striving to be free, greater, better governed, and more lightly taxed, and all the while forgetting that the real secret is to be on better terms with each other; more generous, more forgiving, less apt to take offense at our fellow-mortals. Our material goods there is far more than we need. The table would accommodate more than double the guests, could we only agree to sit down in orderly fashion; but here we have one occupying three chairs, while another crouches on the floor, and some very perfect emulating the fanciful tastes of some more lumbly born take a place near them. I wish they would listen to me on this theme. I wish, instead of all this social-science humbug and art-union balderdash, they would hearken to the voice of a plain man, saying, Are you not members of one family—the individuals of one household? Is it not clear to you, if you only mind the kindly affections you now reserve for the narrow circle wherein you live to the wider area of mankind, that, while diffusing countless blessings to others, you will yourself become better, more charitable, more kind-hearted, wider in reach of thought, more catholic in philanthropy? I can imagine such a world, and feel it to be a Paradise—a world with no social distinctions, no inequalities of condition, and consequently no insolent pride of station, nor any degrading subserviency of demeanor, no rivalries, no jealousies—love and benevolence every where. In such a sphere the calm luminosity of mind by which great things are accomplished would in itself constitute a perfect heaven. No impatience of temper, no passing irritation—

"Where the —— are you driving to, Sir?" cried I, as a fellow with a brass-bound trunk in a hand-barrow came smash against my shin.

"Don't you see, Sir, that this train is just starting?" said he, hastening on; and I now perceived that such was the case, and that I had barely time to rush down to the pay-office and secure my ticket.

"What class, Sir?" cried the clerk.

"Which has she taken?" said I, forgetting all save the current of my own thoughts."

"First or second, Sir?" repeated he, impatiently.

"Either, or both," replied I, in confusion; and he flung me back some change and a blue card, closing at the little wicket with a bang that announced the end of all colloquy.

"Get in, Sir!"

"Which carriage?"

"Get in, Sir!"

"Second-class? Here you are!" called out an official, as he thrust me almost rudely into a vile mob of travellers.

The last bang out, and two snorts and a scream followed, then a heave and a jerk, and away we went. As soon as I had time to look around me, I saw that my companions were all persons of an humble order of the middle class —the small shop-keepers and traders probably of the locality we were leaving. Their easy recognition of each other, and the natural way their conversation took up local matters, was satisfied me of this fact, and reconciled me to fall back upon my own thoughts for occupation and amusement. This was with me but the usual prelude to a sleep, to which I was quietly composing myself soon after. The droppings of the conversation around me, however, prevented this; for the talk had taken a discussional tone, and the different modes of opinion were numerous. The question debated was whether a certain Sir Samuel somebody was a great rogue or only unfortunate. The reasons for either opinion were well put and defended, showing that the company, like most others of that class in life in England, was cultivated their faculties of judgment and investigation by the habit of attending trials or reading reports of them in newspapers.

After the discussion on his morality came the question, Was he sane or dead?

"Sir Samuel never shot himself, Sir," said a short plufty man with an asthma. "I've known him for years, and I can say he was not the man to do such an act."

"Well, Sir, the Ostrich and the United Brethren officers are both of your opinion," said another; "they'll not pay the policy on his life."

"The law only recognizes death on production of the body," sagely observed a man in shabby black with a stain neckcloth, and whom I afterward perceived was regarded as a legal authority.

"What's to be done, then, if a man be drowned at sea, or burned to a cinder in a limekiln?"

"Ay, or by what they call spontaneous combustion, that doesn't leave a shred of you?" cried three others in turn.

"The law provides for these emergencies with its usual wisdom, gentlemen. Where death may not be actually proven it can be often inferred."

"But who says that Sir Samuel is dead?" broke in the asthmatic man, evidently impatient at the didactic tone of the attorney. "All we know of the matter is a letter of his own signing, that says he is dead—unless me ears and I shall be no more. Now, is that sufficient evidence of death to induce a insurance company to pay down some eight or ten thousand pounds to his family?"

"I believe you might say thirty thousand, Sir," suggested a mild voice from the corner.

"Nothing of the kind," interposed another; "the whole heavy policies on his life are held by an old Cumberland baronet, Sir Elkanah Crofton, who established Whalley in the iron trade. I've heard it from my father fifty times, when a child, that Sam Whalley entered Milford in a fustian jacket, with all his traps in a handkerchief."

At the mention of Sir Elkanah Crofton my attention was quickly excited; this was the uncle of my friends at the Rosary, and I was at once anxious to hear more of him.

"Fustian jacket, or he had a good head on his shoulders," remarked one.

"And luck, Sir! luck, which is better than any head," sighed the mean man, sorrowfully.

"I deny that, deny it totally," broke in he of the asthma; "I say that Sam Whalley hadn't a man of first-rate order to help him, and that the success of what it was—the first foundery in Wales."

"And what is it now, and where is he?" asked the attorney, triumphantly.

"At rest, I hope!" murmured the sad man.

"Not a bit of it, Sir," said the wheezing voice, in a tone of confidence; "that's not the way for it, he's alive and hearty, somewhere or other, ay, and we'll hear of him one of these days: he'll be smelting metals in Africa, or cutting a canal through the Isthmus of Heaven knows what, or prime minister of one of those rajahs in India. He's a clever dog, and he knows it too. I saw what he thought of himself the day old Sir Elkanah came down to Furybridge."

"To be sure, you were there that morning," said the attorney; "tell us about that meeting."

"It's soon told," resumed the other. "When Sir Elkanah Crofton arrived at the house we were all in the garden. Sir Samuel had taken out them he was to dine with, which he said were the finest in Europe, except some at the Hague. Maybe it was that the old baronet was vexed at seeing what a favorite he was of, or that something else had crossed him, but as he entered the garden I saw he was sorely out of temper.

"'Any fire's in, Sir Elkanah?' said Whalley to him, coming up pleasantly. 'We scarcely expected you for a week at this hour. I'm sure my daughters,' said he, introducing them; but the other only removed his hat ceremoniously, without ever noticing them in the least.

"'I hope you had a pleasant journey, Sir Elkanah?' said Whalley, after a pause, while, with a short jerk of his head, he made sign to the ladies to leave them.

"'I trust I am not the means of breaking up a family party?' said the other, half sarcastically. 'Is Mrs. Whalley—'

"'Lately dead, Sir,' with your good permission Sir,' said Samuel, stiffly.

"'Of course—how stupid of me! I should have remembered your letter announcing the fact; indeed, the thought was full upon me as I came along, for I scarcely suppose that if higher angels than myself possessed the power they'd disfarm buildings and the outhouses in the state of ruin I see them.'

"'They are better by ten thousand pounds than the day on which I first saw them; and I say it in the presence of this honest woman and brave, my neighbor'—meaning me—'that both you and they were very cranky concerns when I took you in hand.'

"I thought the old baronet was going to have a fit at these words, and he caught hold of my arm as if he would have buckled me down to the lime, his face purple with passion.

"'You made you, Sir? you made you?' cried he in fury, his voice trembling with rage.

"'The same hand that made us all,' said the other, calmly. 'The same wise Providence that, for his own ends, creates droses as well as bees, and nobly ugly toad-bonnets as well as mes of brains and industry.'

"'You shall rue this insolence—ye shall cost you dearly,' he began, but I cut the old man short as he gripped me tighter. 'You are a witness, Sir, to the way I have been insulted. Come, declare your mortgage—I'll cut in every shilling I have advanced—I'll sell the house over your head—'

"'Ay! but the head without a roof over it will hold itself higher than your own, old man. If you'll take my advice, you'll do it. I've not given me an worth all your title-deeds twice told. If I walk out of this town as poor as the day I entered it, I'll be a richer man, with the fainty that I earn earn my bread—a process that would be very difficult for you when you could not lend out money on interest.'

"'Give me your arm, Sir, back to the town,' said the old baronet to me; 'I feel myself too ill to go all alone.'

"Get him to step into the house and take something,' whispered Whalley in my ear as he turned away and left us. But I was afrid to propose it; indeed, if I had, I believe the old man would have had a fit on the spot, for he trembled from head to foot, and drew long sighs as if recovering out of a swoon.

"'Here's an inn near this,' asked he, 'where I can stop? and have you a doctor here?'

"'You can stop at the Elkanah,' said I.

"'You know me, then?—you know who I am?' said he, hastily, as I called him by his name.

"'That I do, Sir, and I hold my place under you; my name is Stone.'

"'Stone!' repeated he, vacantly, as he moved away. When we came to the gate on the road he turned around for a last look at the house, and I perceived that Mr. Whalley was so much admired. 'Mark my words, my good man,' said he, shaking his head, and as sure as I live I'll not leave one stone on another of that dwelling there.'"

"He was a precious spare than he could perform," said the attorney.

"I don't know that," sighed the meek man; "there's many that money can't do in this life."

"And what has become of Whalley's widow if she be a widow?" asked one.

"She's in a poor way. She's up at the village preacher, and I'm told she has a lot of girls, she's trying to keep a children's school."

"Lady Whalley's school!" exclaimed one, in half-derision.

"Yes; but she has taken her maiden name again since this disaster, and calls herself Mrs. Hall of Hall."

"Has she more than one daughter, Sir?" I asked of the last speaker.

"Yes, there are two girls; the younger one, they tell me, is going, or gone, abroad, to take some attention or other—governess, I'm a guessress."

"No, Sir," said the plufty man. "Miss Kate has gone as companion to an old widow lady at Brussels—Mrs. Kents. I saw the letter that arranged the terms—a trifle less per annum than her mother gave to her maid."

"Poor girl!" sighed the sad man. "It's a dreary way to begin life."

I nodded assentingly to him, and with a smile of gratitude for his sympathy. Indeed the sentiment had linked me to him, and made me wish to be beside him. The conversation now grew discursive, on the score of all the difficulties that beset women reduced to make efforts for their own support; and though the speakers were men well able to understand and pronounce upon the knotty problem, the subject did not possess interest enough to turn my mind from the details I had just been hearing. The name of Miss Herbert on the trunk showed me now who was the young lady I had met, and I began to abuse myself bitterly for having separated from her, and thus forfeited the occasion of befriending her on her journey. We were to arrive together about eleven, and I resolved that I would do my utmost to discover her, if in the train; and I occupied myself now with arranging numerous pretexts for presenting to offer my services on her behalf. She will readily comprehend the disinterested character of my attentions. She will see that I come in no spirit of levity, but moved by a true sympathy and the respectful sentiment of one touched by her sorrows. I can fancy her coy diffidence giving way before the deferential homage of my manner; and in this I really believe I have some tact. I was not sorry to pursue this theme undisturbed by the presence of my fellow-travellers, who had now got out at a station, leaving me all alone to meditate and devise future conversations with Miss Herbert. I rehearsed to myself the words by which to address her—my bow, my gesture, my faint smile, a delicate shade of modernity with kindliness, my whole air a union of the deference of the stranger with something almost fraternal. Those preparations were now rudely rent asunder by the return of my fellow-travelers, who came hurrying back to their places at the banging summons of the guard.

"Every thing cold, as usual. It is a perfect disgrace that the public are treated on this line!" cried one.

"I never think of any thing but a biscuit and a glass of sherry, and they charged me elevenpence half-penny for that."

"The directors ought to look to this. I now three times myself that I came down here last Tuesday week."

"And though the time-table gives us fifteen minutes, it's a treat—for I laid my watch on the table—that we only got nine and a half."

"Well, I supped heartily off that spiced round."

"Supped, supped! Did you say you had supped here, Sir?" asked I, in anxiety.

"Yes, Sir; that last station was Trentham. They give us nothing more now till we reach town."

I lay back with a faint sigh, and from that moment took no note of time till the guard cried "London!"

THE GREAT INVENTION

The wee woman's riches,
The rich woman's bliss.

In the war which is going on among the sewing machines, there is something comforting in the fact that nobody is killed, and the community in general derive a permanent benefit. As in the political world, where a great variety of opinion prevails, and each party has its favorite leader, so among the sewing machines we find a great variety of opinion, and each one loud in their praises of the one they think the best. Unlike political conventions, we have not yet all the sewing machines as a blessing. From the greatest to the least, from the old established machine of Grover & Baker down to the smallest machine invented, we find a labor-saving benefit to all the families of the land. The cost is high, however, we cannot be considered as recommending a cheap article, as to our sorrow we have invariably found that a cheap article is a dear article to have.

We speak from experience when we say that the silent noiseless style of the principal sewing machines is the most accord to that of Grover & Baker in the pre-eminence. These indispensible features of sewing, strength, durability, and elasticity, all of which are brought out in this incomparable invention, make it the first sewing machine in the country. Grover & Baker have good points, but this combines all, and possesses every characteristic necessary to make it most desirable. We know our lady wives appreciation of this machine, after a trial of years, is such that she would part with almost every other article of household furniture before she would allow it to be taken. This machine stands the different varieties of sewing machines, and has invariably proved itself; but Grover & Baker's noiseless machine, with its firm uniform stitch, surpasses, in her estimation, all others. In that lady's opinion it leaves the most unbounded confidence, her taste and judgment being excelled by none. Nor has her judgment been formed hastily, but with a view of thoroughly testing the merits of the different sewing machines, given the most of them a fair trial, and the result is as above stated.

The Grover & Baker company, from being one of the oldest and most successful of the organizers and directors of the business, and having associated with it more of the greatest artistic skill, possess facilities unknown to others in making such improvements as are calculated to bring the sewing machine to perfection. In their magnificent establishment on Broadway, they have in the finest taste fitted up a large drawing-room, where a great number of ladies may be found every day, either learning or perfecting themselves in the art of sewing; and we would say to our lady friends who have hitherto remained undecided in regard to this great invention of the age, an hour could not be more profitably spent than at this establishment.—Christian Advocate and Journal.

Cure for Asthma.

Editors Travel New Yorker: Seeing an inquiry in the Rural for a cure for that distressing disease, the Asthma, I write to let the inquirer know what has almost cured me.

I have had the spasmodic asthma fifteen years, and now I found any medicine would prevent an attack when it was coming on until I commenced taking "Jamas Whitcomb's Remedy for Asthma." I commenced taking this remedy eighteen months ago, and have not had a severe paroxysm since.

I dislipline is present relief, but no cure. "Whitcomb's Remedy" has done for me all that it is recommended to do.

New Hand-Power Cylinder Printing Machine.

The subscribers have recently constructed a new SINGLE CYLINDER PRINTING MACHINE, expressly designed for those offices where the business is too great to be done on an ordinary Hand-press, but not sufficient to warrant the purchase of a large steam machine, to be driven by steam-power. The Press now offered is light and convenient in form, and is constructed in the most thorough and substantial manner. It has the register and the patent self-flying apparatus, and the best newspaper work can be done on it. One man or two boys can easily work it, and do impressions per hour. It is constructed so that steam-power may be applied when required.

Copy of our Illustrated Catalogue, containing particular description of the machine, with cuts and prices, will be furnished on application.

A Remarkable Book.

BY A SOUTHERN AUTHOR.

HINTS TO AND PHYSICAL PERFECTION; or, The Philosophy of Human Beauty: showing how to Acquire and Retain Bodily Symmetry, Health, and Vigor, Secure Long Life, and Avoid the Infirmities and Deformities of Age. By D. H. JACQUES, of South Carolina.

This is an original and deeply interesting work, replete with wonderful facts and important deductions, and presenting many novel applications of the leading truths of Physiology, Hygiene, Mental Science, and Æsthetics to Human Physical Improvement. Our author is no quack, but an earnest and sincere disciple of Science, and it is in the light of a rational Philosophy, and under a spirit of charitableness, that he here shows us how the physical regeneration of the race may be brought about, and how we may become strong, active, efficient—in a word, manly, how women may attain to the fullness of health and freshness, and adorn herself with all the charms which properly belong to her sex; and how the child, neglected or ill-nurtured, may grow up into the ripened beauty of perfect manhood or womanhood. Everybody should read the book, for everybody is or should be deeply interested in the questions it discusses so fully and at the same time so charmly and delightfully discussed in it; but, while it commends itself to all, it has special claims upon the attention of women, whether maiden, or wife and mother.

Illustrated with more than twenty plates, and numerous wood-cuts.

The Grover & Baker Noiseless Family Sewing Machine

is rapidly superseding all others for family use. The Grover & Baker Stitch is justly celebrated as the best to be the only one which survives the washtub on linen seams, and, therefore, the only one permanently valuable for Family Sewing.

READ THE FOLLOWING TESTIMONY:

"Mr. Quackenbos and DAVIS presents her compliments to Grover & Baker, and takes pleasure in saying that she has used one of their Machines for two years, and that it still in good order, makes a beautiful stitch, and does easily work of all kind."—Washington, D. C.

"I take pleasure in saying, that the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine have more than realized my expectations. After trying and returning others, I have three of them in operation in my different places, and after four years' trial, have no fault to find."—J. H. Hammond, Somerset, Ky.

"My wife has had one of Grover & Baker's Family Sewing Machines in constant use for the last year, and it is one of the best labor-saving machines that has been introduced. I believe it will prove a valuable acquisition to the public."—J. G. Harris, Governor of Tennessee.

"The Machine which you sent me has given perfect fully equal to representation. My negro children work them with a little help from me, and they make the clothes for whole are now being made. Two of the seamstresses, lovelies by profession, have used for the clothes. It has been used by many for months, and as yet has not cost me a cent. It has perfectly satisfied with the work it has done."—Hon. Jefferson Davis.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE SUNNY SOUTH.—"We have rarely peeped within the covers of a more appetizing volume. Although not intended as an answer to the foul untruths in the Uncle Tom trash of the last ten years, it nevertheless does unmercifully hurl back to their source all lies of such a nature, and we are glad to believe that the book will be read in thousands of northern homes. The South, also, should take to it benignantly, for independent of its truthfulness and integrity, it is one of the liveliest and most entertaining books of the year."—Pitman, Greenshorn, N. C.

THE SUNNY SOUTH.—"This volume gives, so far as we can judge, faithful pictures of Southern life, without prejudice. The scenes presented are quite different from an 'Uncle Tom's Cabin,' and we think the portraits painted are in very nearly natural colors."—London Daily Bee.

SEED-WORDS.

'Twas nothing—a mere idle word,
From careless lips that fell,
Forgot, perhaps, as soon as said,
And purposeless as well.

But yet, as on the passing wind
Is borne the little seed,
Which blooms unheeded, as a flower,
Or as a noisome weed—

So often will a single word,
Unknown, its end fulfill,
And bear, in seed, the flower and fruit
Of actions good or ill.

THE CENSUS OF 1860.

THE census-takers are progressing with their work, and straggling returns are coming in. As a general rule, they prove that the progress of the country has been rather under than over-estimated, and that the population of the United States will be found to exceed the highest estimates which have been made.

That progress, however, has not been uniform. We have few or no returns from the South, but it is not expected that either the cities or the rural districts in the Southern States on the sea-board will show any thing more than the natural increase. Louisiana and Texas may prove an exception to the rule, as both have been aided by immigration; New Orleans will undoubtedly show a large increase, and so will Mobile, and one or two other cities, but it is not expected that the increase in Virginia, the Carolinas, and Georgia will be large.

It seems doubtful whether New England will show any increase at all. New England supplies so many farmers to the West, and retains so few foreign immigrants, that the natural increase of her population is more than counterbalanced, and the returns may show that she is actually less populous than she was in 1850. There will be exceptions to the rule, of course. Some towns where manufacturing has been actively developed will naturally figure to advantage in the census returns; and the inland cities will probably show a falling off, and so will the rural districts.

The great increase since 1850 has been in the West, and in the large cities of the Central seaboard States. We presume that New York and its suburbs, Philadelphia, and Baltimore will all show a large increase, as also will those other cities dependent on these, and situate further inland—as the towns on the Hudson. But when we want to find the most striking figures are to be added to our population, we must go to the Far West—to Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Missouri, and Minnesota. Some of these States have doubled in the ten years—even those which had quite a respectable population in 1850. The increase appears to have been pretty equally distributed; town and country have grown alike. Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Louis have doubled in population; Illinois, it is said, will show 2,000,000 against 1,000,000 ten years ago. To the traveler it seems as though there were no farmers in the West, so vast is the extent of untilled land. The receipts of grain at Chicago—now the first primary receiving market in the world—tell a different tale, and the census confirms it.

The rate of growth of cities has not been uniform, as the following table shows:

Cities.	1850.	1855.	Increase.
St. Louis	77,860	101,460	23,600
Cincinnati	115,436	150,000	47,564
Milwaukee	20,061	40,949	24,594
Detroit	21,019	43,584	25,915
Cleveland	17,034	40,000	22,966
Zanesville, Ohio	11,929	9,219	1,781
Dayton, Ohio	10,977	20,000	9,023
Columbus, Ohio	18,554	30,133	11,579
Washington, D. C.	40,000	61,400	21,400
Providence, R. I.	41,543	49,954	8,411
Rochester, N. Y.	36,403	48,666	11,263
Trenton, N. J.	6,460	17,228	10,768

Immigration tends Westward, as far as railroads and other means of locomotion will permit. Nobody wants to stay at the East. Even Ohio is too near the ocean. Cleveland has gained handsomely since 1850, but the other cities of that State rather disappoint their friends. It is evident that New York and Chicago are becoming more and more the centers of the next ten years, grow to the disadvantage of intermediate cities. As in France there is but one Paris, and in England but one London, the tendency here is to one metropolis—New York—with numberless thriving primary depots, such as Cincinnati, Pittsburg, Cleveland, and the manufacturing towns of New England.

PROGRESS IN ITALY.

WHEN last we spoke of the war in Italy in these columns Garibaldi had just invaded Sicily, and to all but those who believed in his success in defiance of obstacles the future was still a problem. A few weeks have elapsed, and now nothing is problematical but the future of the Papacy and of the Eternal City.

The Kingdom of the Two Sicilies has ceased to exist. Let all men render thanks to an allwise Providence. It lasted long enough to teach the world the hopelessness of expecting any thing of the Bourbons, and long enough to cure the European democrats of their crazy notions about a socialist republic. Had Naples been purged of the Bourbons in 1848, it is probable that a republic would have been established which would have lasted just long enough to disgust every man of sense, and then would cure this for a military despotism. Ferdinand and Francis served their country better than they knew—they kept Garibaldi in reserve for him, and prevented its falling into stronger hands than theirs. Now they are gone, and in this again they have served their country. Under a new Government and a liberal system —monarchy or republic, it matters not—the Neapolitans, Calabrians, and Sicilians will, in course of time, become useful creatures, and will contribute their share toward the commerce, the wealth, the civilization, and the progress of the world. Once more, let God be thanked.

And now for the Pope. At our latest dates, Piedmontese troops had invaded the Papal States, and a battle between them and the horde of foreigners commanded by General Lamoriciere was impending. Of the result of the war, however the first battle may go, there can be no question. As to the Piedmontese, Europe stand remains passive; Austria, Prussia, and Russia protest, but in protesting, declare they will do nothing to prevent the intervention of Sardinia; Napoleon announces that he has tried every thing in his power to restrain his ally, Victor Emanuel, but finds that every moment he is nervous to argument and deaf to entreaty, abandons him to his own devices. Thus the case is clear, and within short of a miracle worthy of Loretto will save the Papal States from incorporation into the Kingdom of Italy. Before the first four weeks of the campaign in Italy that is not Italian, save only, perhaps, the Eternal City of Rome.

It is possible that the city of Rome may follow the example of the Campagna, and be absorbed in Victor Emanuel's dominions. It will be no easy task to prevent the Romans shoving the petits and the revers of the Piedmontese their brethren. Still we are inclined to think that Napoleon will not permit, and that Victor Emanuel will not seek, to extend his rule. No enlightened Protestant, even, would like to witness the utter overthrow of an institution which, with all its faults and all its errors, is sacred in the establishment of Christianity, and for fifteen centuries its centre and corner-stone. The chances are, that when all Italy, save only Rome, is united under the sceptre of Victor Emanuel, some scheme will be devised, similar to that which was proposed by the Emperor of the French, for the maintenance of the Pope in a sort of municipal dignity and seeming independence in Rome. The Independence will not amount to much, but perhaps it would be better than an exile.

THE WEALTH OF NEW YORK; AND HOW IT IS GOVERNED.

THE STATE ASSESSORS have just assessed the value of the real and personal property subject to taxation, within the State of New York, at nearly fifteen hundred millions of dollars. Probably over one-third of which lies within the county of New York—that is to say, in the city itself. The actual valuation of the city property is doubtless much less, but is considerably more than the value of many European principalities—as much as that of a respectable kingdom. If there were a census of inhabitants in the city, this valuation would allow $550 to each of them, which is considerably above the average of wealth to the head of men.

It is disheartening to think that, while the wealth of New York has thus grown at so prodigious a rate, the science of city government favorably with most of the capitals of Europe, which are a thousand years old, its government has gone backward, year after year, and corruption has fully kept pace with increasing progress. The tax levy has increased, within a few years, from five to ten millions; though the property valuation grows at a proportional rate, it is outstripped by the advance in the taxes.

The secret is to be found in the base neglect of duty by our respectable citizens. We fear it often said that the cause of the failure of universal suffrage in our large cities is the influx of foreign immigrants, the ignorant and improvidence of Irishmen, who are ever led by priests or demagogues, or bought and sold at the polls. But this is a mistake. There have never been fewer ignorant voters entered in New York to carry an election against our respectable classes, if the latter had only fulfilled the civic duty of voting. It is the neglect of this duty by respectable men which constitutes the strength of the Irish and their friends. It is because merchants, and lawyers, and doctors, and clergymen, and men of property generally shun the polls that the Irish vote rules the city, and the taxes increase at the rate of a million a year.

In such a city as this, the Aldermen and Councilmen should be men of the highest character. It should be the highest aim of an honorable citizen to fill a seat in the Common Council. That Council ought to be, in fact, the annual steppingstone to the halls of Congress. Instead of this, there is no position in which you are more likely to find pickpurses and rogues than in the city corporation; and to have been an Alderman or Councilman not only does not entitle an individual to public esteem and higher promotion, but almost disqualifies him from respectable society.

Thus it will ever be so long as our respectable classes neglect their duty and leave the control of elections to the rabble and to ignorant foreigners.

THE PRESIDENTIAL CONTEST IN NEW YORK.

AT length a substantial union of the parties opposed to the election of Lincoln has been consummated in this State, and we shall now be enabled to test the actual strength of the Republican party in New York. Hitherto the Republicans—though they have latterly secured the control of the State through the divisions of their opponents—have always failed to command a majority of the popular vote in New York. There is no reason why they should fare even worse in November than they fared in 1856; the ostracism of Seward has undoubtedly alienated from the Republican cause the personal adherents of the New York Senator. At the same time the Republicans are confident, and the fact of that which their opponents have combined will tell against the fusion party. It takes time to organize; and the anti-Republican forces are late.

It is probable that, as usual, the Pennsylvania State election will be the key note for the grand performance in November. If the Democrats carry Pennsylvania, they will probably carry New York also, or at all events New Jersey; and in either event, Mr. Lincoln's chances for the Presidency will be small. In the House, it is obvious that his prospects would be less flattering than those of any of his competitors, with the exception, perhaps, of Mr. Breckinridge.

THE LOUNGER.

A NOTE FROM MR. JENKINS.

MR. JENKINS begs to present his compliments to the Lounger, and to inform him, that, as he has observed that, in common with most of the other leading papers in the country, the Weekly has indulged in comments upon the reports of the details of His Royal Highness's visit communicated by Mr. Jenkins.

Mr. Jenkins asks himself why this is. In his double capacity of representative of the highest power in the moral world—the press—and of chercheur society of the metropolis, Mr. Jenkins superintends the observation of the daily conduct of His Royal Highness. He has thus naturally found to be urbane and attractive in demeanor. The colonies of careful description which Mr. Jenkins furnishes, of particular aspects of the leading edifices, and which the Lounger, with his characteristic modesty, declares, are published for a purpose and upon a principle.

The purpose is public amusement and instruction.

The principle is, the profit of the proprietors.

Mr. Jenkins, therefore, humbly submits that, as his last communication had called conspicuous light and length, either the public enjoy them, or the proprietors make a great mistake. But as the latter supposition is clearly untenable, it undeniably follows that the public enjoys his efforts.

Why then should the Lounger, in the question which Mr. Jenkins, with all due respect, permits himself to propound,

"Is not the Weekly too fine a point upon it, who is Jenkins? A hired professional individual (Mr. J. supersedes the expression), who describes the trowsers and waves the handkerchief comic of His Royal Highness—or the public which demands that the description shall be written for its own study and amusement?

Mr. Jenkins respectfully submits (with his compliments) that the question is clear to the meanest of the reader, which is the occasion, has no right to peer at the Jenkins in the writer, which is a mere consequence.

Mr. Jenkins presents his compliments and pauses for a reply.

EATING HUMBLE PIE.

HUMBLE PIE is the most unsavory but the most digestible of dishes. No other leaves such a pleasant taste in the mouth. It makes the next one a hundred-fold more palatable. There are people who can scarcely persuade themselves to try cod a very small piece, who, when they have once fairly eaten it, find it so light and toothsome that they eat it upon every occasion with the utmost satisfaction. A man who lives habitually upon humble pie is apt, indeed, to rather have low spirits of health, and it is to be recommended rather as an occasional lunch than as a constant food. All pastry is pernicious, the doctors assure us; but then Bacon tells us that occasional excess is beneficial; and there is no doubt he must have had humble pie in his mind—for his stomach—when he said so.

Why can't newspapers eat it like other people? Why must they wince and make wry faces and swear they won't touch it; and when they are compelled to, try so hard to make believe that they haven't eaten a bit of it? Why should a newspaper, which, by the necessity of the case, is compelled to let a whisperer gallery, suppose that of all talkers it is least likely to be mistaken? It is the peculiarity of a newspaper that its words have more weight and are more lightly spoken than almost any other. Yet when baking day comes, and the blessed steaming humble pie is served up smoking hot from the oven, and placed before the newspaper, it shrinks and shrinks and smiles and says, "No, thank you, I don't care about it;" or "No, thank you, I never eat pie;" or "Thank you, humble pie always disagrees with me, and the doctors think it affects my sinews and interferes with my circulation." It makes every possible effort to avoid the delicious dish, and when it can not escape, bolts the whole pie, and coolly declares that there was any, or that there was the slightest occasion for any.

Now this bolting your food does no good, but is a positive injury. Instead of making it an airy, digestible morsel, it boils within it, turns into indigestible color, and supply all the fibrin your system needs, boiling makes it a crude and dangerous mass—dangerous, that is, to your health. If a newspaper, for instance, grumbles over its pie and says that the world says, "I don't want to write a tour, dogmatic, unwilling visitor at my house;" and the world shuts its doors. "Why," it says again, "if the world says, I don't want to suppose that I thought it was never going to make mistakes? All I can ask of it or of any one is, that, if I make a blunder, commit any error of opinion, it will endeavor to atone for it by eating a small piece of humble pie to restore the tone of the system."

Prove these things, gentle reader. Watch the conduct of any newspaper compelled to eat humble pie, and say if it is not amusing and pitiful.

HUMAN LIFE, GOING! GOING!

It is now estimated that four hundred lives were lost upon the Lady Elgin; and the coroner's verdict is substantially, that the vessel and crew were competent. No, no; it wasn't the second mate, and it isn't the captain, it is the public which is to blame. Let the public see and it will not be a bad working incessantly until our Legislatures pass some much more stringent laws protecting human life than are now in force.

We sigh and groan rhetorically over those four hundred victims. We are loud in our asseverations that we ought to have secured a different disaster; that the captain and the company, and all others concerned, ought to have been hanged in advance. We say any thing that occurs to us to mark our indignation that no measures were taken to prevent so terrible a calamity. Here, in New York, we are quietly and confidently waiting to see Mr. F. Coppin, a pupil of Godard, saved in the Lady Elgin. It is decreed that it shall be so, it is said, by the public, that Coppin shall be saved. Why? Because he does a certain thing for the people out of their money, and that measures will always be taken to prevent the accession, yet the law should assume that he means to do it, and by forbidding it also save the swindled citizens from further loss.

We are anxious to speculate as to the precise moment when the law might interfere. In many cases it is very easy to see when a man's life will give his family fifty dollars. Suppose that some careless hero should advertise that he would leap from the top of Trinity spire into Broadway, if he could make up a purse of a hundred dollars for his wife and children, would the law not say to him, "If you do that, you will commit suicide and bring himself; but when we know that he is going to make the attempt, we will be there and stop him?" Is not this precisely the case in the case of Coppin?

You think that a law against suicide is rather absurd? You think that people must be left to defend their own lives against themselves at their own risk? You think that a fool, who goes up in a balloon and says he never leaves it, and sells a score of other fools from going after him? Then you are perfectly right in believing that the interest of the steam company is the safety of their passengers will secure that safety, and laws to preserve human life are folly.

HIS HOLINESS AT HOME.

WHILE we are drifting toward our great election in the midst of excitement of all kinds, but conscious that after the 6th of November we shall all fall quietly back into our various pursuits, England appears to be rapidly approaching that crisis of which is not so computable. But they are, all of them, only phenomena in the great process of modern civilization the development we call "modern times" is only the history. The authentic and permanent annals of the race begin with accounts of a few individuals. The mass of men are scarcely mentioned. From the individuals we proceed to classes, as in the Aegean; and from these we enter upon the great theatre of the movement of the masses of men every where to-day. Each class of men finds for themselves the opportunities which were monopolized first by the chief individuals, and then by the chief classes. And so History completes its cycle by individualizing every man, as it began by individualizing a few men.

The struggles of a century are only steps in this progress. If you take the beginning of the sixteenth century and Martin Luther as your points of departure, you may race regularly to the English Revolution of 1645—to the American Revolution of '76, and the French Revolution of '87 and '93. Then, by an easy step, you reach the Italy of our day: the Carbonari: Garibaldi.

The French Emperor belongs to the same move-

* Mr. Jenkins, in the present note, begs, with his compliments, to inform the writer that this is a French word, pronounced reyshairshay, and signifying upper crust.

Then, to the crowned revolution. Louis Napoleon in France and Victor Emanuel in Italy are leaders in an irrepressible conflict with Francis of Austria and Alexander of Russia. There is a natural hostility between the darkness of Asia and the light of Europe; and Russia and Austria are still semi-barbarous powers.

The complication in Europe at this moment, therefore, is very curious. Russia and Austria embrace. We ought never to have been parties to it," they say in such other's arms. England, Prussia, and Austria agree to watch France. "I will see all very quietly while she fights in Italy for us," growls England; "but when she fights for provinces [Savoy, etc.], then my soul! that's an entirely different affair." The status quo, however, England says to Austria, who leans upon her arm, "Austria, all European rights and Russia interfere it will not be to the satisfaction of Europe."

Meanwhile France sits silent while Italy, with a murmur of joy at the inevitable deliverance, hastens to the side of Garibaldi; so that the tidings of his advance clear the way, and the prestige of his genius frees his country by bloodless battle.

The Bourbon has left Naples: in the name of humanity, let us hope forever. What next? Why, the Pope comfortably housed in the Vatican, with the spacious gardens to sit himself in, and no perplexing cares of temporal state beyond the garden-wall. It is sunny and silent the Vatican garden. Always a cool retreat in the gaps of fountains and grottoes. There are sombre cypresses and twinkling lizards, and gravel-paths of meditation between. It is the most secure in the used fortress in the world. It is spacious, and splendid with treasures of art. It is as close an allusion to fact, a kind of ease to the Vatican—where his Holiness can go to church and preach when he pleases.

This is manifestly better than to be bothered with such tapestry-mundane affairs as the temporal guardianship of the Romagna and the City of Rome; although, if you can get the people to agree to try it, you might retain the city for the patronage of the Pope.

Now France wants him limited to the Vatican and its pretty walks, and England will not object to that arrangement. Russia is schismatic, and holds to the Greek Church. In Austria likely to try to hold the triple crown on the slippery brows of his Holiness? Nor can it be said to derange the equilibrium of Europe. Properly speaking, the Papal dynasty has never been a Power. What have been a convenient "Guy" for Austria; and, since 1849, for France. The French troops went there to be withdrawn to-morrow, the Pope would take French leave of Rome to-night. Nor ought any one to be surprised if any steamer should bring news of a letter from Louis Napoleon to the Holy Father, assuring him of his protection as Pope, and begging him to resign himself to the wishes of the people of his States, his faithful servants in the Lord, but not by any Divine appointment his loyal subjects in the flesh.

Probably Garibaldi's road to Rome lies through Venice.

SOME NEW BOOKS.

One of the pleasant points of a Lounger's life is, that great books are occasionally sent to him, most of which he reads, and all of which he would notice if he could, and if such a proceeding would not instantly turn his delicious of miscellaneous conversation into an exclusively literary department. Besides, should he do so, there is no knowing but that the genial publisher who writes the "book notices" (whenever he can get a chance, but that is very rarely) would take to lounging. However, any true Lounger will sometimes happen in at the book stores, and turn over the books, and as the eye glances the pages to catch the flavor, as it were.

And the pleasantest possible flavor he will find at to be in the chances upon the little, very little volume of "Lectures upon the Physical Forces," by Faraday. It has the look of great value in little people. For at the Royal Institution of Great Britain, in which Faraday is Professor, he delivered, during the Christmas holidays, a course of six simple lectures, in which the great principles of gravity, heat, magnetism, electricity, etc., are set forth in a really delightful manner. With the illustrative experiments for which Faraday is famous, and which are mentioned in the book, and the satisfaction of the young people must have been immense. The lectures were taken down phonographically, and are speaking it seems the learned Professor, like other Englishmen, uses phrases which are generally supposed to be exclusively American. Page 117 he says: "Suppose I take a pellet of cotton, and moisten it with a little ether, and put it into a glass tube. . . . I expect I shall see, etc." The frank colloquialism of these lectures is charming.

"What a sad Turn!" is a brief, brisk little story of English life to-day. It is sharp and racy, and, withal, a tragedy of a kind much more frequent than the terror-struck reader supposes.

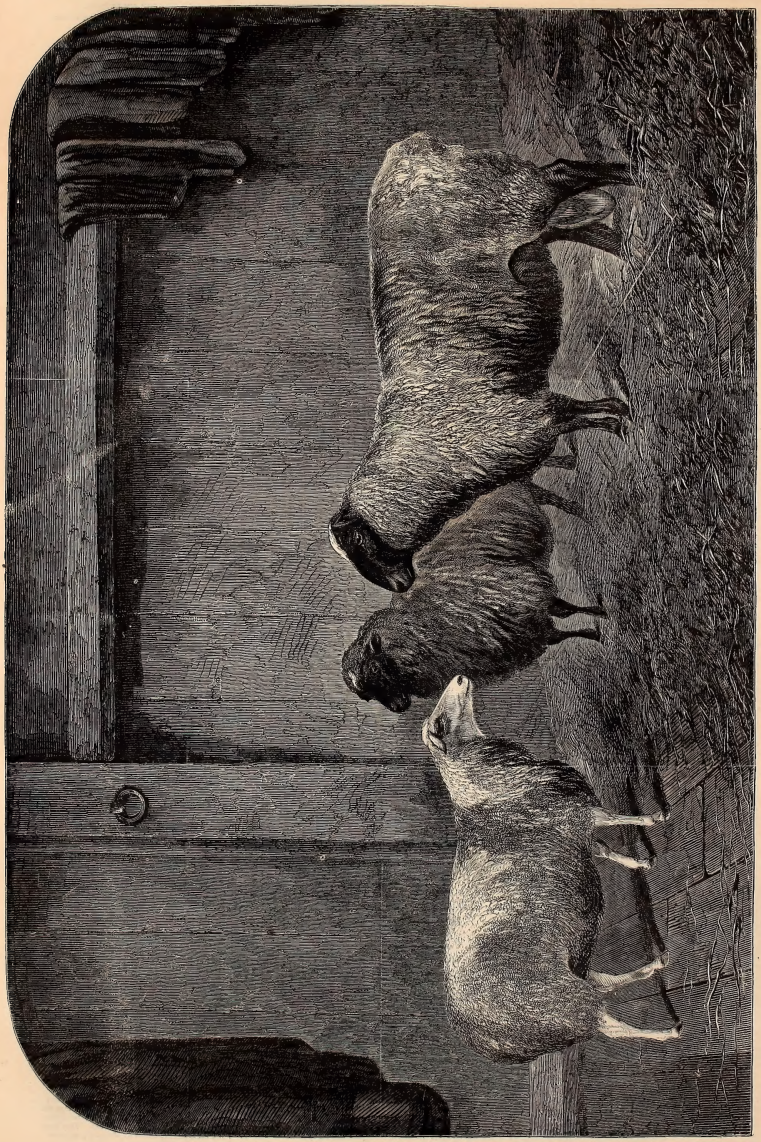
In the "Oozens of Society" we have a series of brilliant sketches of such women as the Duchess of Marlborough, Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, Miss Lawless, Madame de Sévigné, Madame de Staël, Lucretia Tarquin, and Mary Countess of Pembroke, upon whom Ben Jonson wrote the best of epitaphs:

"Underneath this sable hearse
Lies the subject of all verse.
Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother.
Death! ere thou hast kill'd such another
Fair, and good, and learned as she,
Time shall throw a dart at thee."

It is a kind of book always most entertaining from the detailed glimpses of manners and character.

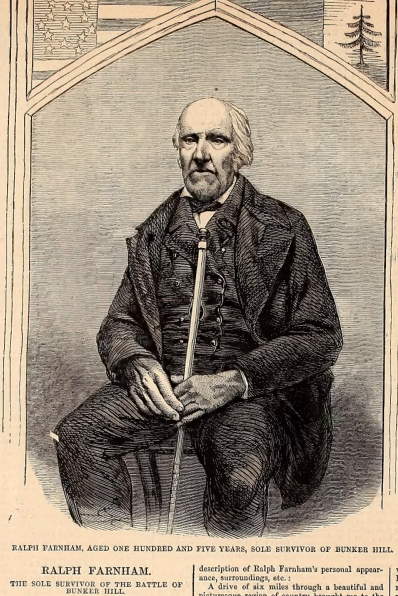
And here is the first handy, loving-to-be-owned volume, of all the anonymous American edition of Lord Bacon's works. It is a reprint of the London edition, and is not inferior to it. It is an honor to the public taste that demands, the enterprise that undertakes, and the skill that executes such a work as this. The editor-in-chief is James Spedding—Ed. S. of Tennyson's poem. Every man who has at heart the honor and success of our publishing and printing crafts, and the improvement of literary taste by making the best books the most attractive, will sincerely wish a large sale of this noble work.

The second volume of Palfrey's "History of New England" has been recently published, and is as delightful as his predecessor. The opening chapter, upon the manners and customs of New England is full of curious interest. The volume brings the history down to the year 1688.



SHAKESPEARIANA.

Two or three weeks since, the Lounger quoted from the London papers the new Madame Vestris' amateur attempts to convict Mr. Golwin, the historian, of plagiarism in his history. The same spirit of literary dishonesty which so frequently manifests itself in English notices of American performances is betrayed in the London Orchard Hallwell, Esq., in his late "Dictionary of old English plays." In an appendix to that work he gives a list of "Editions of Shakespeare," and the very curious fact that of Richard Grant White, one of the most careful, comprehensive, and sensible of all. Mr. White's Shakespeare is one of the most valuable scholarship which the English Shakespearians, naturally, perhaps, but rather ungenerously, neglect and overlook, but it is not to be denied that many of them it has received the warmest recognition. That Mr. Hallwell should not include the work is a proof of ignorance. Mr. White's commentary is the application of common sense to Shakespeare; and his estimate of the intrinsic value of any work may be very safely verified by general acceptation. There is something so especially unjust in depriving a scholar of due appreciation that the Lounger is very eager to glad to join the New Orleans Christian Advocate in exposing the omission in Mr. Hallwell's list.



THE LATE PRINCE OF WALES.

Of course this title does not indicate the punctual young potentate who meets all his appointments so promptly—but his predecessor, the late lamented monarch George the Fourth, Defender of the Faith. In the new edition of Thackeray's Four Georges Mr. Thackeray's paper upon that Prince will be published, and from the sheets of the next number of Harper's Weekly we extract the touches there reminiscences of him by the same hand:

"Elderly gentlemen were in their prime, old men in their middle age, when I was a young man. I look into memoirs on coins: on a picture or two hanging here and there in a Club or old fashioned house, and behold the lord, as the Prodigal Squire, for example, where I feel any monarch to look more uncomfortable. He tones up his background wonderfully, and is the most well proportioned of his boys; in Mr. Maxsyn's History: in the Backstairs Anecdotes: in the confidential talk of gentlemen who have secured a certain waiter of dodgyish ale and wonderful reminiscences of the same. The prime dawn of George is overcharged. Chacun has padded him off; he has mingled with the Macaronies and the Dandies; he has simply stolen from a cavern or two Brocklebury heirlooms to steal into Trafalgar Square in a blue coat and gilt buttons. Mr. Brummell pretends (Madame herself having quitted Baker Street and left, and found another mistress in Mayfair, Queen Brydget, stream). On the head of a free-shilling piece we still occasionally see the head of the Sailor King, the good-natured, on the other side of the coin. Ah me! did this George slay many dragons? Was he a brave, honest, and tender and constant knight to those whom we have entered in life, and succeed, at risk of life and limb, to rescue distressed damsels? Did he ever think that the dragon Poverty is about to flatten his fangs, whose head is within a yard of his sword? Did he wield bravely, and shout to crumph up and devour? O my royal liege! O my gracious prince and sovereign! Is it true that you were so—eager

RALPH FARNHAM, AGED ONE HUNDRED AND FIVE YEARS, SOLE SURVIVOR OF BUNKER HILL.

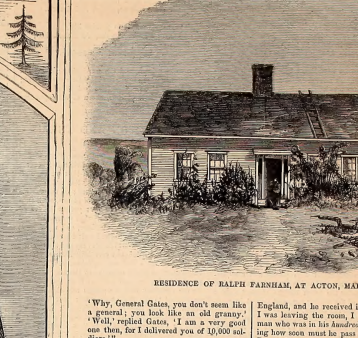
RALPH FARNHAM.

THE SOLE SURVIVOR OF THE BATTLE OF BUNKER HILL.

In the eloquent oration delivered by Hon. Edward Everett on the Fourth of July, this year, at Boston, there was a touching allusion to the few remaining relics of that band of worthies who served in our War of Independence. Mr. Everett, at the same time, expressed a doubt if there still existed a single American soldier who beheld that disastrous British victory upon Bunker Hill on the 17th of June, 1775. This remark of Mr. Everett has called forth the fact that in Acton, York County, Maine, near the borders of New Hampshire, resides Ralph Farnham, who is now in his one hundred and fifth year, and who enlisted in the American army in May, 1775, witnessed the battle of Bunker Hill, served a peaceful second campaign in Rhode Island, and concluded his military career by doing duty in the battle of Saratoga, where Burgoyne's fine army was overcome by the Americans under General Gates. We publish Mr. Farnham's portrait herewith, and give also a view of his residence. Rev. J. C. Fletcher was among the earliest to visit Ralph Farnham in his secluded home in Maine. We learn that, since the results of that visit were made known by Mr. Fletcher through the daily press, there has been a stream of pilgrims to Acton, where the hale, bright, and pious old man receives them cordially, and recounts the deeds of days long gone by.

Such, however, has been the curiosity to see the veteran, coupled with the desire on the part of some to give him more of the comforts of life in his declining days—for his pension is the pitiful sum of 66¾—that a letter of invitation has been addressed him by Governor Banks, of Massachusetts, Hon. Mayor Lincoln, of Boston, Hon. Edward Everett, Hon. Lemuel Shaw, late Chief-Justice, William Appleton, Esq., George S. Hillard, Esq., Rev. Drs. Adams, Gannett, Blagden, Stow, and Miner, Hon. Charles Sumner, Amos A. Lawrence, Drs. Bigelow and Shurtlef, Charles G. Green, Esq., Hon. Charles Hale, and many other of the first Bostonians, of every profession. They cordially invite him to visit Boston. The old soldier of the Revolution has written accepting the invitation for the 8th of October, when no doubt a demonstration on a grand scale will be given him. Let us, however, remind our Boston friends that Old Parr, of England, lived long beyond his hundredth year, and was a fine healthy man when a century and a half had rolled over his head, but was killed by the kindness of the Londoners on his visit to the British metropolis. His regular habits were broken up, his simple diet was disregarded, and the result was his death. We trust that nothing of this kind will take place in regard to Ralph Farnham, and express the wish that he may yet live many years to enjoy all the blessings which this life can give an old man whose hopes reach beyond the grave.

A friend who visited him gives us the following description of Ralph Farnham's personal appearance, surroundings, etc.:



A drive of six miles through a beautiful and picturesque region of country brought me to the house of Mr. J. Farnham, which is situated upon a high hill commanding a most extended view of the distant White Mountains. I found Mr. Ralph Farnham seated in an arm-chair surrounded by newspapers, while not far away from him was the Bible, which he terms the "king of books." When introduced to him, he received me with affability, and was at no loss in answering the many and various questions with which I plied him. Indeed, his answers were exceedingly prompt, and the pleasure of his conversation was enhanced by a certain piquancy of expression, and a cheerfulness extraordinary in one of his age. It seemed no effort of memory to call up persons and places—their names and characteristics. There is also such a modesty in all his statements that you feel convinced of their truthfulness. Another agreeable feature, of a negative character, is, that he has none of that garrulousness which is too often the sad evidence of nature's decay.

He gave me many interesting anecdotes of the Revolution, together with descriptions of the Battle of Bunker Hill, his second campaign to Rhode Island (where he says he "went through college," for it rained so hard while they were engaged in drilling that their Colonel ordered them into University Hall, and thus he graduated), and he also gave me some new views of the Battle of Saratoga, which occurred in his second campaign.

I asked him if he saw General Putnam on the 17th of June, 1775. "Yes," he replied, "twenty times, if once; and he rode like lightning, his horse's tongue lolled out of the mouth. It was a hot day, and I suppose that a hundred horses were killed by aid-de-camps and other officers and messengers before and after the action."

This confirms what has so often been said of "Old Put's" riding on that memorable occasion. His recollections of Washington, Gates, and others, are very vivid. Benedict Arnold he deserves in no measured terms. He gave me the following anecdote in connection with his description of the Battle of Saratoga:

"After Burgoyne's surrender General Gates erected a large marquee, and gave a grand dinner to the British officers; and when they were cracking their jokes in high glee, Burgoyne said to General Gates, 'Why, General Gates, you don't seem like a general; you look like an old granny.' 'Well,' replied Gates, 'I am a very good one then, for I delivered you of 10,000 soldiers.'"

RESIDENCE OF RALPH FARNHAM, AT ACTON, MAINE.

At my request Mr. Farnham turned his head so as to give me a profile view, and while I was employed in making a careful sketch of the contour of his face, he was engaged in pleasant conversation about Newburyport and Boston. The former, he said, he had visited for the first time eighty-five years ago, and preserved a vivid recollection of the place. Boston he delighted to talk about, and wished that he could go there once more. His last visit to Boston was in 1853, and he informed me that he spent some time "with Luther Drew, who lived in Boylston Street, but he is now dead." I mention this to show that not only events of his younger days are readily recalled, but that those which have recently occurred are not pushed out of his memory. The celebrated "dark day" is very fresh in his recollection; but the length of his memory is somewhat amazing when he tells you about cutting his foot when he was four years old, and that "it is just a hundred years ago."

Ralph Farnham was born in Lebanon, Me., which is south of the town where he now lives. He has never been sick, is temperate, is an early riser, has a good appetite, and is at peace with man and God. For eighty years he has been an humble follower of the Saviour, and is now a member of the Free-Will Baptist Church of Acton. There is something truly beautiful in his trustful piety, in his bright hopes of heaven. Every day the Word of God is his encouragement, joy, and consolation; and twice each day he retires to his closet for private communion with his Maker. He does not think that the burdens of age exempt him from those happy duties which are more and more fitting him for the enjoyments of heaven.

He seems to have a keen relish for reading of what is going on at the present time. The past, and his hopeful future, do not absorb all his thoughts. When I went into the room there were plenty of newspapers near him. Before I left I presented him with a copy of that day's Boston Journal, the widest circulated paper in New England, and he received it with eagerness. As I was leaving the room, I cast a last look at the man who was in his hundred and fifth year, thinking how soon must he pass from time to eternity. But such thoughts vanished when I saw him looking earnestly for his spectacles, which I had displaced, and heard him ask for them, as he wished to read to-day's newspaper! This gave me an idea that he was good for this world some time longer. I will add that his sight is quite good; only the glasses which he has recently used have been laid aside, and he has taken up, as better suited to his eyes, the spectacles which twenty years ago had become unfit for his use. I would that I had been optician enough to tell exactly the lenses which he requires.

Every year since he attained the age of a century his neighbors have celebrated his birth-day. I have been fortunate in obtaining from Mr. Josiah Goddard, formerly of Worcester, Massachusetts, a photograph likeness of Mr. Farnham, which I forward. Mr. John Townsend, an enterprising manufacturer near Mr. Farnham's, informed me that it is their intention, if the old Sergeant lives to his hundred and sixth birth-day (July 7, 1861), to celebrate it with unwonted brilliancy, and they will invite Mr. Everett to be present on an occasion so interesting.

I have thus been particular in regard to this veteran who has outlived all his contemporaries. He was but twenty-four years younger than his beloved Commander-in-chief when that Chief assumed the command of the American Army at Cambridge; but he has survived Washington more than threescore years.

THE GREAT ELM OF NEW ENGLAND.

ONE warm, sunshiny August day, while on a tour in Western Massachusetts, I came in sight of this magnificent tree, which a Boston paper names "the largest in New England."

It is said to measure about 30 feet at its base, and is from 100 to 120 feet in height; yet its greatness consists not so much in its height as in the broad spread of its branches, which cover an area of ground in diameter twice the height of the tree.

Thousands can sit in its shade; and here, on this mid-summer day, I beheld a vast concourse of people.

After viewing the assembled multitude for a short time, I became curious to know what had called them together.

That they could not be celebrating the glorious Fourth, or Washington's Birthday, or the 12th of August, was very evident. But I was not doomed to remain long in doubt as to its cause.

An invitation, kindly extended to me by a bystander, to enter the inclosure was accepted with thanks; and on mingling with the crowd, I soon learned it was an annual social gathering.

Some years previous a society, called the "Elm-Tree Association," had been formed under the auspices of Dr. Orville Dewey; and judging from appearances, it was at the present time in a flourishing condition.

This monster tree—a pet of the Doctor's—stands in the town of Sheffield, Massachusetts, and but a short distance from his country residence, the home of his youth.

And a glorious thing has this Association proved. Annually it calls together the inhabitants of this and adjacent towns; while residents in other and distant States, and even wanderers on foreign shores, with that yearning fondness for home which all have experienced who have been long absent, have, since this society was formed, returned again to the scenes of their childhood, and met in the shade of the noble old elm the relatives and friends of their youth.

Speeches appropriate to the time and place—speeches short and spicy—were got off in goodly numbers; interspersed with poems and odes addressed to the tree, and so laudatory in their praise, that no wonder the green boughs blushed scarlet in the rays of the setting sun, and spoke not, modesty to the passing breeze.

After listening to these soul-stirring music, prepared for the occasion, and to which the children, gay as butterflies, kept time and tune on the greensward, the crowd partook of the delicacies of the season which the ladies had temptingly spread upon beautifully ornamented tables.

After listening to the gay and lasting repartee which were thrown back and forth by some of the distinguished guests, whom Massachusetts is proud to class among her sons, I accepted an invitation to enroll my name as a member of the Association; and then, regretting a short distance, took a sketch of this truly wonderful tree.

BY ETHEL LYNN.

Only a dream of the soft summer moonlight;
Naught but a sound in the tall locust-trees;
Merely a Katydid's life and confession—
One of the voices of her long reveries.

Out on the night wind floated the story:
Still with the burden it carried of old;
Close at my elbow fitted a fairy,
Interpreting well what Katydid told.

Bending the tube of the bright trumpet-flower
Down till it nestled close up to my ear,
"List!" said the voice of the kind little spirit,
"Thus, though a sister, her tale you shall hear:"

"I am old, I am cold,
And of life I am weary;
On the hill, whispering still,
Autumn winds are dreary.

"And I sigh, ere I die,
To tell what I have ever hid—
Who 'Katie' was—what the cause
Why I murmur 'Katie did.'

"Long ago, ere the snow
Fell on my sire and mountain;
Ere I crept aside and slept
'Neath the moss around the fountain,

"A rosy child looked up and smiled,
When I sang my vesper story;
While moonlight, still and white,
Lit her grandsire's locks so hoary.

"Oft he said, 'Curly head,
Don't you tire the tale she's telling?
Tales of you! What did you do,
Thus to set the crickets spelling?

"She would cry, 'Twas not I!'
And against this burden ever:
'Katie did—Katie did—
Ran away from school with Rover!'

"Then the maid, 'neath the shade
Of the beech met a lover—
Student Joe, speaking low,
Asked to win and wear forever.

"Thus I said, while her head
Bent to the blushes flitting,
'Katie did—Katie did—
Naughty Katie gave the mitten!'

"I remember, in September
Came a handsome hunter thither;
Cruel fate! simple Kate
Lost her heart when he went hither.

"On his name was a stain;
And her grandsire bid them sever;
Bid her bow her will, and vow
Ne'er to meet him more forever.

* * * * *

"By the gate lingers Kate,
Looking back at home deserted;
'Katie did—Katie did—
Left the old man broken-hearted!'

"Thus I sang, while she clung
To her bridegroom, faithless lover;
For I knew the tale was true,
Bonnie Kate was lost forever.

* * * * *

"Yet once more to the door
Came the maiden, worn and weary;
But no light save moon light
Lit the windows, closed and dreary.

"'Wandering still to yonder hill
Where a stone was Death's white token,
Katie cried—Katie died—
Katie's weary heart was broken."

There was a hush, and the wandering night wind
Scattered leaves from the trees in its gusty flower,
Midnight had passed—fairies had flitted,
Drooping their pinions, shorn of their power.

BINGHAMTON AND THEREABOUTS.

LEWIS HOUSE, BINGHAMTON, Sept., 1860.

TRAVELLING eastward by the Erie rail I became weary, and, like another pilgrim that we have all heard of, I turned aside to rest. But not into any dark place, as that pilgrim turned; on the contrary, into one of the pleasantest of places, with sunshine falling through the first yellow leaves of autumn on the forest glades. Let me recommend you to try the same resting-place, oh! my friend, ever at Binghamton, in the Lewis House, close by the railway station. It is very cool and low down to keep a hotel, but certainly Messrs. Moulder & Brown have that accomplishment. Think of being crammed in the summer by the odor of unexpeachable Mocha, and seduced from the hot way by the certainty that the unpeachable chicken will be broiled to the exact turn when your foot shall touch the last step of the stairway! Think of having received a welcome so hearty, dusty and weary, with an evening supper-table that might remind you of Very's, in the Palais Royal, if it were not that the cuisine is better here. In Monsieur Brown's cooking, instead of the je ne sais quoi mixtures of France! Let no tired traveller or city Boz fiend forget mine hosts of the Lewis House, and rush madly by on express trains, dreaming of such accommodations elsewhere, for elsewhere along the road I doubt you will not find them.

But these presents, oh! friend, are not designed to puff a hotel or even a landlord. I have commenced thus only that you may, by a little mapstudying, learn where I was when my friend Stevens caught, and carried me off to shoot a deer in the forests of Broome.

I was lying half-awake, dozing and dreaming of the soft lapse of the Susquehanna and the delicious odor of the Mocha—for it was early breakfast-time, and there were passengers about who were off on the railway train thus untimely. I was dreaming thus when I heard a heavy footfall along the passage, and the door burst open, up on my door absolutely threw me into the middle of the floor. Imagine the horror of a man thus rudely startled from dreamland and Mocha—such a cold morning twilight!

I will not say what emphatic words accompanied my "Who's there?" for, though never profane, I do sometimes use what might be called the expletive of deeds, for the grade of profane, when not wholly in my right mind.

"Is Peter — in here?"

"No such person here." Why should I acknowledge my identity to a man that might, as likely as not, be the sheriff after some man of my name. Let me advise, gentle, that the denial of your name to any one that wakes you before five in the morning.

"You be hanged, Peter! Open the door, or I'll break it down!" And the application of a foot to the panel emphasized the assurance.

"Where, in the name of all that is wonderful did you come from, Doctor?" I asked, opening the door to my old friend and fellow in Sallust's Country forests, Doctor Benjamin Steevens, of Stevens' ville.

"Heard you were here as we were driving by on our way for deer. Thought it best to turn you out and help me to kill a deer. Come, old fellow, how!—can't wait thirty seconds!" And as I was carried off.

The sun rose superbly! Looking back into the valley we saw Binghamton bathed in a white mist that was lake-like. The air was frosty, the road fine, and the cattle in splendid order. How we rattled up hill and down for the next ten miles, while the Doctor and I chatted! The road then turned off into a broad valley, and the Doctor, up here and there against stumps and rocks till the old wagon groaned in agony. Then we left the old Doctor's mules, and had reached the end of our journey.

It was far up among the hills. We were at a log-house, on the bank of a little stream which flowed from a broad swamp a mile above, and the swamp was a favorite feeding-place of deer. For two more years, known to very few of the people hereabouts, and to the people in Binghamton, I fancy, not known at all. The Doctor and I, and his friends had provisions and blankets, and the log-house, though empty, was clean. They had long ago had delayed them, in fact, an hour, so that the day was well advanced; but we determined to put the dogs out on the west hill, and try our luck at least for the afternoon.

My station was on the run at the foot of the hill, where the deer, in coming from the eastern hills to the swamp, and here I stood all the blessed afternoon, from three till five o'clock, never saw a deer.

Seeing nothing, still I? Do you know the splendor of the old forest? The grandeur of the dead monarchs overshadowed in their long graves of moss by their living posterity? Do you know the rich soft lights of the western-going sun steaming through the silent forest? The crimson of the early-changed maples; the sombre purple of the fourcrod oak? All these I saw, never dreamed of looking for. I found the old forest-cathedral, and the forest was to me as glorious as my own old home in the country would be if I could find it again; but, alas! I never can.

Hark!—the hounds are rising over the west hills! Now they go down the hollow, and their voices are lost—now loud again, as they cross the ridge; and now with a steady advance they come on.

But the deer was on the other run, and I sat down quietly and resigned to watch again the lights on the trees, which grew dimmer and sadder. I had almost fallen asleep listening to the far-off cry of the hounds, when I heard a sound in the leaves which I knew was a deer, a hundred yards below me, and looking up suddenly, caught sight of a deer moving easily up the bed of the stream. The sagacious animal, like me, had, wherever the dogs were, he had left no scent in the running brook by which they could follow, and he was cantering or sauntering up to his supper in the swamp before he should go up to his forest bed for the night.

He came within fifty yards of me before I moved, and then I shouted to him. The cry was involuntary. I could not shoot him down in his tracks in that way, and I gave him at least the ghost of a chance for his life. He threw up his head as he saw me, and paused one instant. That pause cost him his life, for the ball entered his breast, and he plunged forward down the brook.

The Doctor, meantime, had been on the other run, a mile away from me, and as the night was now fast closing in, he could not quick work of the spoils. A few cuts of the knife sufficed to loosen the hide around his neck, and I made as rapid an incision as possible in the side of his fore-quarters, gave him but four rits to the saddle, and shouldered the seventy pounds as if I were in my old-fashioned days of the West, and commenced down to the cabin that evening you may imagine, if you can, or how the fire blazed high in the old chimney, and the steaks broiled on the coals in the cabin, or how we lay side by side on the floor and talked over old times. I leave to your imagination. This much, at least, you may believe—that if you have no other temptation to Binghamton you may find good fellowship and good fellows; and if you have no doubt nine hours of the Lewis House can put you on the track of it, if I am not here to show you.

Truly yours, V. V.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

PROGRESS OF BARON RENFREW.

ON Saturday afternoon, 22d, the Prince of Wales, now Baron Renfrew, left Quebec for Montreal in a steamer for Dwight's Station, where he arrived at dark. He was met by Colonel Dwight and his staff, and escorted to the divine service at the Presbyterian church; in the procession were the Indian chiefs, Governor Head of Quebec, and the party spent the rest of the day in reading and listening to music and singing. On Monday morning, twelve chickens; on Tuesday quail; on Wednesday they left for St. Louis, where they arrived 11 P.M. On Thursday he attended the agricultural fair, was presented to the Indian chiefs, and left in the evening for the north. The excitement about him in St. Louis was very great. On Friday, 28th, he left St. Louis for Cincinnati, where he arrived, after a long detention, late in the evening.

THE BARON AND THE REPORTERS.

The Herald correspondent telegraphs: "At Dwight the party were out of the line of railroad travel, consequently the Baron, who enjoyed the sport highly, logging on a hundred-pound bear, and the next day a two-hundred hunter, says that Dwight Baron is an excellent sportsman, and handles a gun like a practiced hand."

HE SMOKES PIPES.

He adds: "The party drove roughly, and walk about two miles per day, which is the most denominated walk. People here do not annoy the Baron, and much gratification is expressed at his visiting the West."

HE SHAKES HANDS WITH IRISHMEN.

A couple of Irishmen called to see the Baron, who returned and shook hands with them. He is said freely with the people, who say they are perfectly naturalized Americans.

HE IS PREFERRED TO LINCOLN.

On Saturday night, at Dwight, the Baron went to a swing to look at the children, and was recognized. He was accompanied by Mr. Spencer, who pointed the party out to a lady present, and said, "Here is the only one—which was shared by the gentlemen in question. The lady, on the coat covered with a blanket by the time he reached the top, where, meeting with a boy he was in search of, he at once fell into rough and tumble adventure. When he came down stairs he saw the barouche waiting, and the Prince, recognizing who he was, said, 'Undressing Mr. Spencer,' 'Where's the Baron?' 'Well, I'll be d—d if Abraham Lincoln is not here!' and he exchanged loving beside you."

The Prince brought there was an attempt to "sell" him, and with a look of the most sublime contempt ejected, "Well, sir, I'll be d—d if I am sold, and that I can see, that if old Abe Lincoln was here, I'd say you'd go to the White House."—Albany Evening Journal of 24th.

HE MAKES PRESENTS TO HIS FRIENDS.

Before his departure from Dwight he expressed his intention that no one should leave the party empty-handed, and presented to his hosts with several beautiful gifts, among which was a splendid rifle, which he had used in the sport, exchanged presents with their entertainers.

THE ARRIVAL AT ST. LOUIS.

Lead cheers greeted the Baron when he landed at St. Louis, and the crowd were unable to restrain their joy on an event that he was obliged to close the windows of the vehicle in which he rode, and the cries were driven in upon the occupants to divide the people.

HE HEARS "GOD SAVE THE QUEEN."

At the Agricultural Fair, on the 26th, the crowd party passed twice around the arena and then alighted in the centre. After visiting the pavilion at the western end of the pagoda, where the band struck up "God Save the Queen," the Baron was followed by "Hail Columbia" and "Yankee Doodle."

HE WILL NOT RECOGNIZE THE BRITISH FLAG.

The British residents in the city held a meeting last night, and resolved to exhibit the British flag at the Committee appointed to confer with Lord Renfrew. Mr. Archibald stated the substance of the letter received from the Duke of Newcastle, in reply to the offer of an address to the Baron. Such demonstrations, he said, had been offered in other places in the United States, but respectfully declined; and, while Lord Renfrew was very grateful and obliged for the tender of their civilities, he intimated distinctly his wish to accept no demonstrations which would appear invidious, and which might give offence. The arrangements for the citizens' grand reception has been received through their Committee, were accordingly, discharged.

ANOTHER SLAVER CAPTURED.

A captured slave brig was brought into Norfolk, last week. When taken she had 649 negroes on board, who were landed at Monrovia. Another ship, taken about the same time, had 800 on board.

THE VERDICT IN THE CASE OF THE "LADY ELGIN."

The Coroner's Jury in the case of the Lady Elgin disaster have rendered their verdict. While they have found that the Lady Elgin was a sea-worthy vessel, they censure the owners for allowing a larger complement of passengers aboard her, on the recent occasion, than is permitted by law. They also find as causes of the disaster the defective arrangement of the lights, under the law for sailing vessels, and the want of a proper waste of the schooner to inform the captain when he first saw the steamer's lights. They also found that she was incompetent for his position; and censure the captain for not coming to her assistance. But, wherever the blame lies, two of the jury dissent from the verdict, declaring that they find the Lady Elgin was unmanageable, and insufficiently supplied with boats.

SHIPYARD IN THE AIR AND EQUESTRIAL.

Another disaster is reported, resulting from the late storm. The Chancelay the schooner Neptune, Doe, belonging to Gloucester, Maine, was lost on Malcolm's Ledge, between Long Island and the Wooden Ball. In attempting to land in a boat, the captain and eleven men were lost in the surf, and of two who remained on board one was washed off and drowned. The schooner was a total loss.

TERRIBLE EXPLOSION AT PITTSBURGH.

From Pittsburgh we learn of a terrible calamity which occurred on the night of last week. A boiler in the manufactory of Mr. W. W. Wallace exploded, killing ten or more men and wounding several others. The boiler was blown through four walls, killing several of the victims in its passage.

LOLA MONTEZ AT ASTORIA.

A correspondent of The Constitution writes from New York in Astoria:

"Lola Montez is stopping at Astoria, with a kind friend, and is said to be in a comfortable state of mind. She is not exactly an Icelandic, and yet what terms will express her state? She is not exactly a Magdalen. Physically she is an overlaid of a melancholy description. A Grande Dame, she has seen better days, and, in the companionship of the wretchedly diseased woman, Lola Montez, she is the wretchedly diseased woman. Lola has been a beauty, but she is not a beauty now, and she sat in a pretty garden—her hollow cheeks, sunken eyes, and dreadful complexion forced a remarkable contrast in the gay flowers. She was unable to utter an intelligible word, but she breathed high and excellent effects. Her mouth was frothing like that of one in partial convulsions, and she was constantly wiping it, as little boys do, by drawing it across the sleeve of her dress. In the days of her glory, strange, in appearance and behavior of a quiet kind, and is evidently lost to all further interest in the world around her, and its affairs. And so ends her eventful history!"

STORY OF A CIRCUS BOY.

The Cleveland Plaindealer says that several years ago, a young lad, the son of wealthy parents residing in Centre, New Hampshire, became acquainted with the glitter of a wandering circus and run away to join its company. He was fought for, and the two men who pursued for as one died. He became a skillful rider, and rose in his profession. Recently he was seen in a circus ring at Miniapoli, when his brother recognized him and induced him to separate from the being with a young. His relation was entered Dutchtown College, and was progressing rapidly in his studies, when he grew restless and left the village of Hanover, and he always his impulses once more, leaving no clue to trace his vagabond life. The other day, at Knoxville, Tennessee, he was thrown from his horse in the ring, and died in a few hours.

A BAD STORY.

The Tribune says: "A pretty bad week gist of seven, by the name of Wood, a widow in Sullivan County, recently advertised for a husband, 'just for the reasons of saying.' She declared, on finding a husband in a rodeer, in the person of a gambler named Moore, who had been married to her by the Rev. Mr. Hyde, that she had recently to return to the diggings, taking her all in eggspensil eating; and that the next thing known of her by her friends is the discovery, near Uttonova, Iowa, of her dead body, bearing unmistakable evidence of murder.

A WARNING TO FOLLOWERS OF GLONDIL.

A man named Richard Wiswell, residing in Quincy, Ulster county, met with a fatal accident a few days since, while trying to mainta Indian. He performed with a travelling company had arrived at Stockan, and part of the performance was an out-door tight-rope exhibition by Madame Carolita. A rope had been stretched from a tree to a pole, and the fair performer had safely and accomplished her part, when Wiswell proposed to go over the rope in a new style, and, ascending the pole, started to cross over by seizing the rope with both hands, and leaving his body to hang downward. He safely accomplished the feat to the opposite side, but could not get back in the same way, being completely exhausted, he let go his hold and fell with great force to the ground, a distance of about thirty feet. His right arm and several ribs were broken, besides other internal injuries. He was taken to the Gotypel and Brink, but his efforts could not save his life. He lingered three or four days and then expired. Wiswell was a married man, about forty years of age.

A CONSCIENCE SHOT BY A BALLET-GIRL.

We read in the Cincinnati Commercial of Sept. 24: "William H. Glass, manager of the City Council from Zane, left Wheeling last night for Steubenville, and badly wounded, at half past three o'clock yesterday afternoon, by Miss Lizzie Lingard. Glass was formerly connected with the Vine Street, near Second. It appears that for a long time an intimacy has existed between the parties, and that for the past three weeks Glass has refused to give the girl any money, whereupon she left for Zane. At the above-mentioned hour he was standing in his door, and that her approach was passed into the engine-house adjoining. She, however, lingered around until his return, and followed the retreat a short time, when she overtook him and pulled a pistol from under her shawl and fired at him, the ball passing through his body. He turned and ran, but she followed him, and fired another shot, which took effect in his back. He then turned and ran into the engine-house, when she fired a third shot, which passed through his arm, and lodged in the wall. He then succeeded in getting out of the back door, and she fired a fourth shot, which passed through his coat. He then succeeded in getting away from her, and she returned to the house, and, placing the pistol to her head, fired, the ball passing through her brain. She is still living, but cannot recover. Glass is also living, and will probably recover. The girl is about twenty-two years of age, and has been on the stage for some time. Glass is married, and has a family residing in Zane."

THE VERDICT IN THE CASE OF THE "LADY ELGIN."

The Coroner's Jury in the case of the Lady Elgin disaster have rendered their verdict. While they have found that the Lady Elgin was a sea-worthy vessel, they censure the owners for allowing a larger complement of passengers aboard her, on the recent occasion, than is permitted by law. They also find as causes of the disaster the defective arrangement of the lights, under the law for sailing vessels, and the want of a proper waste of the schooner to inform the captain when he first saw the steamer's lights. They also found that she was incompetent for his position; and censure the captain for not coming to her assistance. But, wherever the blame lies, two of the jury dissent from the verdict, declaring that they find the Lady Elgin was unmanageable, and insufficiently supplied with boats.

SHIPYARD IN THE AIR AND EQUESTRIAL.

Another disaster is reported, resulting from the late storm. The Chancelay the schooner Neptune, Doe, belonging to Gloucester, Maine, was lost on Malcolm's Ledge, between Long Island and the Wooden Ball. In attempting to land in a boat, the captain and eleven men were lost in the surf, and of two who remained on board one was washed off and drowned. The schooner was a total loss.

glass and Germany, and succeeded, by personally presenting the subject to the manufacturers, in inducing them to make a trial shipment. Accordingly, the Diana leaves Antwerp this month for Savannah, Georgia, with a cargo of assorted goods of Belgian and German manufacture. These fabrics will be exhibited at a Fair to be held in December next at Macon. Then, then, this rich commercial movement may be regarded as a fixed fact. It remains to be seen whether Southern merchants will imitate it.

The names of the ladies with whom the Prince of Wales danced at the recent ball at Montreal, are Miss Molson, Miss Dunn, Miss Gerald, Miss Mills, Miss Miles, Miss M'Nab, Miss Widder, Miss Dick, Miss Hamilton, Miss Ogden, Miss Strickland, Miss Murray, Miss Ross, Miss Gugy, Miss Percy, Miss Forsyth, Miss Bethune, Miss Mc Gaddie, Miss Reynolds.

Lady Franklin, Miss Cracroft, new in London, passed via Toronto, Hamilton, Niagara Falls and Detroit to Chicago, whence to New York and Boston in five or six days.

Among the passengers who arrived at Boston in the European on Friday were Robert Dale Owen, late United States Minister at Naples, and Mr. Charles Cleveland, the well-known Scottish publisher and author. Mr. Cleveland has been long settled in Florida.

The British (Wisconsin) Journal tells of a singular accident which befell Miss Alice Foster, a young lady fifteen years of age, but late fifty. She was riding on horseback with her brother on an ox-cart, when her horse became frightened, and swerving suddenly to one side, smashed her and himself against a sharp point of a fence-rail, before the brother could get his reins and prevent the fall. Miss Foster was carried immediately to her father's home, but she died of hemorrhage soon after reaching there.

It will be remembered that some weeks ago a lady named White was robbed of many thousand dollars' worth, the value of the plunder being nearly $5,000. A suspicion got up against a man named Hamilton, who was arrested at a Boston hotel, gorgeously attired, and clearly afflicted with the gout. The police at once went to work for a description of a certain woman there, supposed to be Jane Bennett Hoff; the description came, and they found 60 spoilt cleverly to the female just spoken of as of Boston; but she had fled from Boston to Montreal, and to England.

La Lorette, the balloonist, has had another perilous adventure. He made an ascent from Albany, and travelled in the air with a male companion for two hours. They then attempted to land at East Lansboro', Massachusetts, but the wind was so strong that the aeronaut's apparatus was torn with such violence that it became unmanageable. The balloon, however, cleared the well, and dragged at a rapid rate of speed for one hundred and fifty leaves, until it finally collapsed, being torn nearly to tatters. La Lorette was thrown out, and was considered unconscious for half an hour, though he was immediately taken care of by some persons who witnessed the accident. He was terribly bruised, though fortunately none of his limbs were broken.

The Right Honorable J. W. Wilson, the Superintendent of the Financial Department of the Indian Government, died of cholera, at Calcutta, just before the departure of the last mail, and Sir Henry Ward, Governor of Madras, also died about the same time. "The loss to India, in the death of Mr. Wilson," is thought to be very irreparable. Mr. Wilson's life and career has been a singular one. At the age of twenty-one he was a banker's clerk, and then a merchant—a hatter—and he then turned his attention to journalism, became a successful newspaper proprietor, founded the Economist newspaper, and in a few years found himself a member of Parliament and Secretary-President of the Board of Trade. He was sent out to India to reconstruct the finances of that vast dependency, so long robbed and plundered and sucked to a famished skeleton by the corrupt rule of the East India Company. He seemed likely to succeed when he was removed by death, and not yet fifty years of age.

Several thousand Polish Jews have recently passed through Berlin on their way to the Holy Land from Berlin and Hamburg. The German papers say that nothing evokes such a display of Israel has not been witnessed since that out of Egypt.

ANOTHER SPEECH FROM THE EMPEROR.

The following is a full translation of the Emperor's speech at Marseilles, as published in the Moniteur:

GENTLEMEN,—The banquet offered by the Chamber of Commerce is one of the happy opportunities which offer by thanking the city of Marseilles for the warm reception it has given to the Empress and to me. I see in these numerous demonstrations of attachment which we have received a sincere pronouncement of public opinion, which we deeply, but do not make me more grateful; for my only merit has been to follow with faith the national instincts, as well as to the patriotism and good sense of the French people. It is this intimate union between government and sovereign which constitutes our strength at home as well as abroad, and which has enabled us to overcome the most great difficulties, never to pause in our progressive march. I have come here for what is good and useful, not for all that is noble and useful, can not shake now, when circumstances have rendered favorable and which is the wish of all the world. If serious murmurs should reach me from any part of the country, be assured that I would hear them; but I am sure that our indifference like the waves of the ocean on our shores, will break against the rock of our strength. In reading the resources of our country the works of peace know no respite, and the prosperity of the nation is its reward. In the future of prosperity there are new wheels I contemplate for France, Marseilles naturally holds a foremost rank, from its great position and the genius of its industrials, as well as from its geographical position, which, as the military post of honor, appears to me to represent on its shores the genius of France—dashing on all sides wherever its own land, but feeling its sword at its side. Let her reign in peace once that wish, for the interest of France—and we of Europe will commerce; let her civilize barbarous nations by increased liberty; let her show those that are free how to use liberation. Let her induce the people of Europe to come and study on her quays the portent which rises in the east and sink in the depth of its waters the jealous faults of a past age. Everything, in Marseilles even, is grand and beautiful as it now beholds her—that is to say, in keeping with the interests of France—and we of the present and future wishes will be accomplished. I drink the health of the city of Marseilles."

ITALY.

FLIGHT OF THE KING OF NAPLES.

Foreign Intelligence, ex-King of Naples, left from his capital on 6th September. The London Times correspondent writes: "This has been the most momentous of the most momentous day in the recent history of the Two Sicilies, and it may fairly realize that name in the fullest sense. Every one was on the alert in the morning as to the report of the intended departure of his Majesty. By universal consent he was veiled politically dead many hours before he left. On driving through the city I saw workmen taking down the royal arms from the doors of shops frequented by the Neapolitan soldier, and hissing ensued. Crowds were hanging about the Palace, or looking over the walls of the gardens, watching the movements within the royal journey. In Santa Lucia the cannon, which have for so many years been pointed against the Neapolitan moat beloved subjects, were being removed, and I felt that my absence of security were now far greater than they had been in the morning."

HIS LAST ADDRESS.

After the King had sailed, the following proclamations were published:

"NAPLES, September 4, 1860.

"ROYAL PROCLAMATION:

"Among the calamities presented to kings, those of the days of misfortune are the grandest and the most sudden, and those destined I intend to fulfill with resignation, free from weakness, and with a serene and confident heart, as befits the descendants of so many monarchs.

"For such a purpose I seek more address my voice to the people of this metropolis, from whom I am now to depart with bitter grief.

"An unjust war, carried on in contravention to the law of nations, has invaded my States, notwithstanding the fact that I was at peace with European Powers.

"The changed order of government, and my adhesion to the great principles of Italian nationality, were not sufficient to ward off the war of aggression, which has for object of defending the integrity of the State entailed upon me. I protest against the violence done to the Kingdom of Naples. I now solemnly protest against this indemnification, which is unjustifiable before God and man, and which can not be sanctioned by any compact.

"The dispassionate corps of the army court has known, in the midst of the most terrible reverses, how to unite with what sentiments my heart has been filled for all my subjects, and with what discretion I have in view of resorting her from ruin and set, of saving her inheritance with all their prerogatives, their glorious remonuments, her public buildings, her collections of art, and all that can add to the greatness and the civilization and of her greatness, and which, being an inheritance of future generations, is superior to the passions of a day.

HIS UNSTEERABLE GRIEF.

"The time which I have passed among these peculiarities of mine. The war is now approaching the walls of the city, and with unsteerable grief I am about to separate myself with a portion of my army to betake myself whither the defense of my rights calls me. The remainder of my army is left in company with the honorable National Guard, which I hope to preserve from contact and calumny the capital, which I recommend as a sacred treasure to the zeal of the Municipality, which I hope may be used the civic feeling of the Mayor of Naples and of the commanders of the National Guard, and which I confide to the beloved country of mine the horrors of internal discord and the disasters of civil war. I have ordered my generals to the above-named the widest powers that they may require.

"As a descendant of a dynasty that has reigned over this continent for more than a century, I leave Naples, after having preserved it from the horrors of a long vice-royalty, from anarchy, and from revolution. I go, but I protest, nor could I, without bitter grief, address words of farewell to my subjects without having in my heart the most vivid remembrance of them.

"Wherever may be my destiny, be it prosperous or adverse, I shall always preserve for them a passionate and affectionate remembrance. I have always loved them, and I have never had a greater affection for their cities than I have at the present moment. Let me at excessive zeal for my people, I have always been a loyal king.

"Whether from the fortunes of the present war I return shortly among you, or whether I am to live alone in which it may please the justice of God to restore me to the throne of my forefathers, I shall always be the same splendid by the free institutions with which I have irrevocably surrounded the throne of Italy. Then, as now, my fortune is to behold again my people united, strong, and happy.

"FRANCIS."

THE FIRST ACT OF SELF-GOVERNMENT.

After the King had gone, the following address was placed by him at Garibaldi's disposal:

"CITIZENS,—The King is leaving. In the presence of a grand misfortune I am overwhelmed with grief, although your conduct can not be doubted. The former imprudence of your rulers, the present public misery; the wise determinations of your self-denial, prudence, civil courage, the care of your property, the defense of your rights, the destinies of Italy; no one will think of lacerating the country with fratricidal struggles. Naples and Sicily will calmly await the memorable day which will open a path to your country. Then you will be able to give vigorous and effectives without new convulsions or the shedding of the blood of your brothers. I feel the necessities to the city remain tranquil; let commerce pursue its course as usual. I hope that you will support the ordinary occupations of life; let all opinions unite in a sublime agreement to save the country."

CALM OF THE CITY.

The London Times correspondent writes: "Judging, however, from the demeanor of the Neapolitan populations, one would say, were not at all necessary; for the city is so quiet as it was during the most profound of the distresses nor in the horrid festivities of the Lenten Carnival have I before seen Naples. Not a man who knew which is the greatest marvel, the rapid and triumphant progress of Garibaldi, or the apathetic indifference of the people. A throne has fallen, a king has left his capital, and yet the people are as unconcerned as though the events are open, the guards stand at the palace gates, and the sentinels pace their accustomed beats."

FORMATION OF A PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT.

As soon as his Majesty left a Provisional Government was formed, consisting of Liborio Romano, Conforti, Scialoia, Cafiero, Agresti, and Richard. Cowns were appointed, and a Ministry of War and Marine, under Turr. This, of course, is subject to modification by Garibaldi. The following is the Cabinet as Romano, writing on 7th inst., left it, published the following address:

TO THE PEOPLE OF THE PROVISIONAL GARIBALDI.

LIBERATOR OF THE TWO SICILIES

"With the greatest joy I have accepted the office of provisional to salute you as the redeemer of Italy, and place in your hands the power which I have held in your name. During this interval of expectation I shall remain firm, for the interests of the country, and for the dignity which Your voice, already made known by me to the people, is the only power which I recognize as legitimate.

"I await your further orders, and am, with redoubled respect, "LIBORIO ROMANO.

"NAPLES, September 7."

ARRIVAL OF GARIBALDI.

The Times correspondent writes: "At last twelve o'clock strikes, and a bell sends, and from a distance a signal is made that the steamer with the dictator—that is Garibaldi!—rises from a thousand voices, and the train stops at the railroad-station. The train is there, and I hugged, and kissed with that most unsecretial violence which demonstrative people only know, by every male and elderly man, who by virtue of his white beard, was taken for Garibaldi, and whose cheeks were consequently to have sunk under the operation; but the great man had given timely notice of his arrival, and was not to be had at all directions to intercept him. We drove round by a side street to the front of the station, and found by a loyalty which to win might be sought for in that of many of the most devoted subjects of the King, that the crowd struck with his calm self-possession and the extreme quietness of his suite. Among the latter were Bertani, the French Minister, though I believe it had been placed at his disposal previously by the Count de Persigny, and several superior officers by three lines of carriages he went along the Strada, and through the Porta, surrounded by thousands, and followed by their greetings, by the Lazi Camicie, and several of the officers of the Neapolitan army, who had come over with a few hours before, and entered the palace of reception by the back stairs. The crowd waited patiently for a time, and looked up to the windows and shouted for the appearance of Garibaldi, but he remained in his private apartment, and at last the hero. What a cry of 'Viva' there arose from the vast mass below! When last that history was occupied by a distinguished personage it was by the Grand Duke of Tuscany, but in answer to an call, and then he left the room to repose and take his place of prince.

HIS SPEECH TO THE PEOPLE.

"It was impossible to make himself heard amidst the noise and confusion, and he appeared, therefore, on the iron railing and gazed intently on the crowd. A wave of the hand at last acted for silence, but in vain. 'Abbi, vieto, which is at only a very short distance from the Tuscan frontier of Piedmont.

HOW VICTOR EMANUEL JUSTIFIES THE ACT.

The Official Gazette of Turin publishes a Government memorandum, addressed by the King of Sardinia to his representative abroad, and dated the 12th of September. This memorandum explains the state of things in Italy since the peace of Villafranca. It adverts to the refusal of the Court of Rome to accede to the demand of Sardinia to effect reforms in the Papal States, and to the imperative reasons the step taken by Sardinia. The Sardinian Government had not allowed the Italian movement to dissipate itself in anarchy and disorder. The pronunciamento which had occurred in several parts of the Papal States was not the work of a party, but was the result of the universal sympathy which the Italian people felt for the King, and was the work of the whole nation. The Government of Victor Emanuel could not have remained deaf to the cries of the populations, and would have been guilty of treason had it not responded to the call of the people. The memorandum concludes by declaring that the Government of Victor Emanuel has not the slightest intention to attack the territory of the Holy See, but simply to prevent popular hatred from overthrowing the Papal power. It was not in search of power example the pardon of officers and Christian toleration which would have become the law of the Court society to Islamism. Being at peace with all the great Powers, and seven years of existence, I could not make a continuous cause of disturbance and discord disappear from the centre of Italy. I intend to respect the rights of the chief of the Church, to whom I am always ready to give, in concert with the Powers, the most ample and effective guarantees of independence and security which his blind enemies have in vain hoped from the concessions of the perverse sect which conspires against my authority and the peace of this nation."

SICILIAN.

"SICILIANS!—I am accused of ambition. Yet I have a load of confidence in the principles of moral order in Italy, and of preserving Europe from the continual dangers of revolutionary war.

THE ATTITUDE OF THE GREAT POWERS.

The Papal Government is about to address a memorandum to all the Powers, in which it will complain that the Sardinian invasion of the Roman territory. This memorandum will be followed by the withdrawal of foreign volunteers, of which Sardinia complains in her circular. Spain has withdrawn her Minister from Turin, and France; the latter Power having, after the Paris Congress of 1856, insisted on the withdrawal of the Papal nuncio.

Several Powers have protested against the entry of the Sardinians into the States of the Church, as an attack upon international law. The French Government presents in the strongest terms, but would take no other steps.

The Prussian Government has written from Turin. The Paris Monitour of the 14th says:

"It proves that the facts which have not been accomplished in Italy the Emperor has resolved to withdraw his ambassador from Turin, and that Austria will remain there to conduct the business of the Legation."

The withdrawal of the French Minister from Turin is generally regarded as merely a diplomatic precaution.

ROME TO BE HELD BY THE FRENCH.

General Goyon leaves Rome for Ancona on the 15th, to take command of the French troops. It was asserted that the French army at Rome will be increased to 16,000 men.

GERMANY.

THE BANK OF HOMBURG BROKEN.

The Court Journal says: "The gambling table of Homburg was broken to-day, and with it has fallen all the enthusiastic applause of its company: one of the successful croupiers, Blanc, of Geneva, has just left Homburg, carrying with him £30,000 of winnings."

SWITZERLAND.

ANOTHER ALPINE TRAVELLER LOST.

The New York Times says: "Mr. Walker, of Paris, has met with a similar fate in the Tyrol to that which recently befell Mr. Hudson in the Alps of Switzerland, near the Col du Geant. Mr. Walker, accompanied by Mr. Frederick, a friend of Colonel Crawley, and two crossing a glacier pass, when he fell into a chasm ninety feet deep. His body was not recovered for three days afterward. A post-mortem examination showed that his death must have been instantaneous.

SPAIN.

TERRIBLE SCENA AT A BULL-FIGHT.

The Spanish journals relate an alarming scene at a recent bull-fight at Madrid. After the bull-fight, which did not show much spirit, had been disposed of by the executioner's knife, the populace called for more. He was let loose, and displayed great vivacity. He tore into the arena, and, after a few plunges, made a rush at the barrier which separates the spectators from the arena. At one bound he cleared the barrier, and, after a pause of indecision, rushed into the crowd. Terror seized the assembly, and several soldiers on duty ran over the benches to the rear. In a few seconds and bayonets; some of the spectators, too, fled outside at it, and others threw themselves into the arena. At length the wounded got in front of the bull, and with a stick skilfully directed, drove him out of the ring. The journals do not say that any persons were killed or even injured in the subsequent confusion.

CHINA.

THE LANDING AT TAKU.

Letters from China state that the French forces would land to the number of 15,000 men at the mouth of the Taku forts. The whole British force, consisting of 11,000 men, will be composed of artillery and a large train, had reached the rendezvous at Ta-lien-whan. The commissioners had not arrived, but were expected soon on account of the French not being ready.

NEW ZEALAND.

A BRITISH FORCE DEFEATED.

The English attacking party at Maitland, New Zealand, consisted of 400 men. The natives lay down on the ground until the men were close upon them, when they sprang up, fired their double-barreled guns, and met the hand to charge of their adversaries with the tomahawk. Supported by a hand-to-hand fight, the forces of the English were so urged that their dead and a part of their artillery fell into the hands of the foe. It is also reported that the natives took one gun. Great sympathy is expressed against the conduct of the commander of the attacking party, for not calling to his aid an additional force, who were known to be within his reach.

HONDURAS.

WALKER SHOT.

The British war steamer Gladiator has arrived below New Orleans with the remnants of Walker's filibuster force. Walker was executed on the 12th ult. It is stated that he was shot while tied at him, and in the silence of the native spectators. His remains were subsequently buried by the English Consul, who refused to take any part in the ceremony. Colonel Rudler was sentenced to four years' imprisonment.

BROADWAY.—RESPECTFULLY DE

A FORCED RECRUIT AT SOLFERINO.

BY ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING.

Is the ranks of the Austrian you found him;
He died with his face to you all:
Yet bury him here where around him
You honor your bravest that fall.

Venetian, fair-featured, and slender,
He lies shot to death in his youth,
With a smile on his lips, over-tender
For any mere soldier's dead mouth.

No stranger, and yet not a traitor!
Though alien the cloth on his breast,
Underneath it how seldom a greater
Young heart, has a shot sent to rest!

By your enemy tortured and goaded
To march with them, stand in their file,
His manhood (save!) never was goaded
He facing your guns with that smile.

As orphans yearn on to their mothers,
He yearned to your patriot bands—
"Let me die for your Italy, brothers,
If not in your ranks, by your hands!

"Aim straightly, fire steadily; spare me
A ball in the body, which may
Deliver my heart here and tear me
This badge of the Austrian away."

So thought he, so died he this morning.
What then? many others have died.
Ay—but envy for men to die scorning
The alien they fought side by side;

One tricolor floating above them;
Struck down mid triumphant acclaims
Of an Italy rescued to free them
And bless them with their own names.

But—without rareness or honor,
Mixed, ground in the enemy's regard,
With the tyrants who march in upon her—
Died faithful and passive: 'twas hard.

'Twas sublime. In a cruel restriction
Cut off from the uses of arms,
With most filial obedience, conviction,
His soul kissed the lips of her guns.

That moves you? nay, grudge not to show it
While digging a grave for him here.
The others who died, says your poet,
Have glory: let this have a tear.

VENUS OVER THE MONK'S TOWER.

I REMEMBER, one sunny evening very long ago, when I was a child, Nurse sitting with my little brother on her arm fast asleep, while I played at tale after tale from her with insatiable greediness; how, from her romantic heroes and heroines I rambled off to my own father and mother, marveling how my father, who was gray-headed, and, in my eyes, an old, old man, came to marry my mother, so young and merry and beautiful; but on this head Nurse was silent. I remember, too, another evening, when I ran to her with a treasure I had ferreted out of some rubbish in a lumber room—a dusty thing, all covered with cobwebs; but I held it forth in a transport of exultation, crying out that it was a picture of one of those great soldiers she used to tell me about. It was the portrait of a soldier, and as I took it from me gravely, and looked she saw my mother coming down the garden, hid it away in her bosom, nodding me back.

Shortly after that we had a birthday feast in a little half-ruined tower in the garden, which we called the "Monk's Tower." A glorious place it was, where we might go in wet weather; where we might make any amount of noise; where Nurse used to tell us all the tales I loved. And this evening there were hailstones to be drunk, speeches made, cake to be eaten; and on from sun at its height when a message came to Nurse that we were to go in, for 'a grand gentleman from the wars was come."

The little one, as my brother was called, cried out that he would not go; but Nurse gave us visions of scarlet clothing, of towering feathers, of reams of glories—none of which we were destined to see. The grand gentleman were a black coat, with one sleeve pinned to it, and terribly shocked I was, in my superior perception, when Totty crept up to him and took it, asking, gravely, "Where he kept his other arm."

He laughed, and when he laughed Totty stole back to my side, and put her hand in mine. He had a sun-burned face and thick brown mustaches, and my mother seemed glad to see him. She called him "Cousin Charles," and smiled and talked and looked so beautiful, that I was more attracted to her than to the stranger. My father had pushed back his plate, and was busy with his pencil; but just at this time he had a mania for discovering perpetual motion; he had invented and taken a patent for something which Nurse told us was very clever indeed, and only one thing was wanted to make it perfect, and that was—steel.

"Nelly," said Totty, when we were in the nursery, "I don't like him; do you? He's ugly."

But I was watching Nurse's face as I whispered, "Nurse, it is the portrait man."

She stooped and kissed us both, saying nothing. I don't think she liked him either.

The nursery was over my father's dressing-room, and looked out upon the Monk's Tower. I remember standing at the window that night, watching the long shadow of the tower upon the gravel, and filling it with ghostly inhabitants, till terror seized me, and I hurried into bed, covering myself close, and shivering.

But the grand gentleman did not go away. We were told to call him Cousin Charles; and after a while he used to follow us about into the garden, and try to make friends. Once he even came to the Monk's Tower, and began taking Totty on his knee, calling him Master Tot.

"My name is not Tot," said the boy, struggling; "and you are ugly, and I don't like you."

I saw the soldier's eyes twinkle fiercely, but he only laughed.

"I hate you!" said Totty, who had escaped, and was climbing on Nurse's knee; "if I had a gun I would shoot you! I shall tell mamma to send you away."

"Pretty pauls you have got here!" said Cousin Charles, sharply; but Nurse lent over Totty without answering, and he went away.

"Why don't you stay here, Nurse?"

It was my constant question. I was afraid of him; I could not bear to feel his step following me; I shuddered when he touched me. Nurse and he had been mamma's play-fellow when they were both children. I could not think how she bore with him.

A month had passed since the birthday feast, when I saw Cousin Charles one evening coming down toward us in the Monk's Tower. Nurse rose and went to meet him. They spoke together a moment, and I saw the soldier kiss her as she turned away. Oh, how I feared him!

When we went into my mother and he were laughing over some pictures, and my father peered as usual over a book. He laid it down, however, and said something about "steel" and "merry;" and after tea, when the piano was opened, he got up, contrary to his custom, and stood over it. No one took any notice of him, and he sat down upon the sofa, with Totty's head leaning on my lap, one thumb in his mouth and the other crawling about my neck, I watched him with silent and wondering terror, while he bit his lips and knitted his brows, and a white look of anger came over his face.

Suddenly he put Cousin Charles aside violently, and began turning over the leaves for my mother himself. The soldier's solitary arm was raised and hung over his white head for a moment. I cried out—but it fell to his side.

My father turned and said, savagely, "Children, go to bed! Why are you here?"

As we left the room I saw that my mother had risen, and was looking from one to the other in wonder, and perhaps terror. Cousin Charles, who seeming to recover himself, smiled, shook hands with her, wished my father good-night, and followed us.

I hid my face on Nurse's lap and cried. She asked no questions; probably she knew more than I did.

All the next morning we kept away out of sight. I learned my lessons, but mamma did not come as usual to hear them; and in the evening, as we lingered in the garden, the front door opened suddenly, and Cousin Charles came out. There were on his forehead, his eyes shone, and his lips were pressed down like they had been the night before.

"Nurse, where is your mistress?"

"Mammy is there," sung out Totty, pointing to the gate, "with the ugly soldier."

Anger was on the ugly soldier's face also, and something more. Whatever my mother had done or said to him, there was in her eye which I knew, child as I was, threatened vengeance deep and terrible.

"Mammy looks like a white ghost," said Totty, putting in his voice again.

Then over which, seeing the soldier, she was coming, with her hand stretched out, to my father, when something—his look I suppose—stopped her half-way. It sank back to her side, and for a moment she was lying on the gravel at his feet.

Putting Totty's hand in mine, Nurse hurried us into the house, and went back again. Wondering and sorrowful, I questioned her when she came up in the garret where she slept. "A glorious place it grew. Mamma was better; I must be satisfied, and ask no questions.

We saw Cousin Charles no more. We never heard so much as his name mentioned, except by Totty, whom Nurse soon silenced.

But what could that blight that had befallen him? What change had come over my father? Though preoccupied and busy over his books and papers, he had always been gentle and loving to us. My children; now, we dared no longer go near him. He would hardly speak to us. Totty, though, if he spoke at all, savage words of anger and disgust, as though he hated the very sight of us.

And my mother—sitting there so pale and quiet —what new look was that on her face, what blight had come over her? She watched my father closely—the only hardly spare moments from her children, even for Totty, who clamored and starved after the old petting and romping. Nurse would not let us put him away gently, and beg for peace. Instance seemed to tell her my father's wants; I have seen her offer him coffee and bread, which he would shrink and turn away as if her hand had been a serpent.

I did not understand it all: I only knew it was very wretched, and in some blundering way laid the blame upon Cousin Charles.

Every thing seemed to be changed. The house had itself put on a desolate look, the servants went about quietly; the garden was neglected, and on the Monk's Tower had lost a portion of its fascination. There was always some underthought which would not be driven away.

My mother grew paler and quieter; she could no longer bear with Totty's rough caresses or his noisy play. Once telling me to take him to the nursery, she put her hand on my head, and looked into my face earnestly, as if about to say something; but her lips began to tremble, and as she motioned me away I saw two tears roll quietly down her white cheeks. Oh! I could have cried with her then—I could have broken my heart for her.

I do not know how long this lasted, but I know when a change came. We were sitting with my mother after breakfast, Totty and I, as she lay, white and wan, on the sofa, hearing my lessons, when my father entered the room. How she started as the door opened, and then began trembling and shaking as like one in a fit. Surely a desperate spirit possessed my father that morning. Clenching in one hand something which looked like a letter, he flung himself on the sofa and stood before us.

"Children, begone; off with you, driveling little Sybarites! Nurse, I had begun to grow fond with you this moment, and don't show your faces here again!"

I could not stop to quiet the "little one," but ran off to find Nurse and tell her. She bade me go to the nursery and keep Totty good. I obeyed. All day long we kept there. Once or twice mamma came to us, looking anxious and troubled. Mamma had gone to bed, she told us, not very well; Totty must be good and make no noise.

So I told him long dreary tales, till at last his head dropped on my lap, and he slept there, breathless and happy. Then I felt, for the first time, tears were raining down my cheeks.

When supper-time came I could hardly arouse Totty to take any; and, to spare Nurse, I put him into bed myself, and then got into my own.

I had been thinking all this day of strange dreams about Cousin Charles, the Monk's Tower, and mamma. When I awoke there was a candle alight, my self-will, and I was sitting up in bed, looking over its long wick on the table, and Nurse was pacing up and down, with her hands clasped before her.

"He is a hard man, a hard man," I heard her mutter, quietly; I watched till she stooped down over Totty's bed to kiss him, and took up the light to go away. Then I called after her:

"Nurse, nurse, come here; I can not bear it!"

"Bear what, child?"

"Oh, I don't know—I don't know. I can not bear it—you must not go."

She looked at me gravely.

"Miss Nelly, you have been good enough till now: what is the matter?"

"It is so miserable."

"We have all got something to bear; yours doesn't seem very heavy quietly. I must go down stairs—God alone knows what to do; but you must not keep me here."

I suffered her to go; but as she reached the door a horrible dread of being left alone in the dark, to my own fancies and imaginings, seized me. In a moment I was out of bed, following the retreating light. I dared not speak, for fear of being rebuked and sent back. As quietly as possible I followed, until Nurse turned toward the door of my father's dressing-room. I would have rescued her now, from any of what might be going on to happen; but a look back into the dark passage made me shudder and press on.

As she opened the door, suddenly I squeezed myself into a corner of the passage, that I might not be discovered. Inside I saw my father, sitting with his arms spread out on the table, and his head upon them. Beside him lay the crumpled paper, which I had recently seen trying to smooth out. For a moment nurse hesitated, then advancing she looked over it. I know now, though I did not then, that it contained, in what seemed to be my mother's hand,

"To-night—when Venus shines over the Monk's Tower."

As the paper rustled my father looked up. I trembled for Nurse; but she was an old friend, and knew her privileges. Staring at her a moment he looked her coldly, steadily, and hiding the scroll behind a curtain he took her to the window opposite which I stood, a shivering ghost in a nightgown; he raised her hand, and pointed out to her a star was shining brightly over the Monk's Tower.

I felt that I understood it all now, and that I had in cause back to his seat and settled himself as before. But Nurse stood there gravely, with her hand on his shoulder.

"This is a forgery!"

He raised his head, but did not answer.

"I must go to her, sir, I will see for it—as you may, for you are cruel enough. My darling—my mistress I mean—never deceived you or any one. I've put her upon her knee, instead of comforting her silently, you would have known, as I know, that this is a villain's revenge for her pure duty to you."

He pointed to the letter, and waved her away imperiously.

"A forgery," she repeated, her voice growing a little louder. "I will swear it, so that you shall not dare to disbelieve me. By all my hopes of happiness—by all I hold sacred—by the cross on the back of my dear mistress' bed, I swear it. Come, and leave her speak for herself."

I must for no more. Flying along the passage, my whole heart seemed to rouse up from sleep, and suddenly, and in haste; when I heard her sob heavily, but saw no waters; when she wrapped something round us, and, without a cry, all rose and helpless with sleep, gave her hand to me, and bade me keep quiet and not question, but do as she bade me. Down into the chill night, all grave and silent, and unnatural—down into mamma's room. And I remember my father's pale face in the window, and her face on his bosom, white and deathlike; when Totty was put forward first to kiss her, and I followed. I remember my father's cry—"Good evening, my darling!"—as he watched her, and her low answer that came by snatches, telling how happy he had always made her; how good and kind he had been, making her life so bright always; but for this one mistake, which was her fault, and forgotten now, she had scarcely known trouble; and now she was happy again—so happy! A low cry from my father, and we should have fallen, but Nurse, as it seemed her, turned her eyes from the face she was watching so lovingly to his; and then she knelt in the presence of that mysterious messenger now drawing night unto us—we had no mother.

Cousin Charles is dead. Long years ago I saw his name honorably mentioned among those who fell, fighting gallantly for country or for glory. It is not for me to judge him. Perhaps there were times in his life when memory stung him bitterly; when he would have given the world, if he had had it to give, to recall those few months which bore such sorrowful fruits. Peace be to him!

SLAVES OF THE RING.

"PRAY tell me," we overheard a country squire style of man of about thirty say to a very excited friend of his, of about twenty years of age, whom he had stopped in the betting-ring, as the latter was rushing into the ring on Epsom—"pray tell me from which of those acute-looking gentlemen do you expect to win your money?"

Betting is the favorite form of gambling in modern England; with the help of railroads and telegraphs, it seems to have almost absorbed the other dragons that formerly consumed the fortunes of British youth.

To accommodate the widely-pervading taste, which prevails as fiercely in cotton-worshiping mansions and horse-worshiping Yorkshire as among the idlest and fastest society of London, the business interests of New England have created a class of professionals "who do for a living" what salesmen and gentlemen are supposed to do for pleasure. Parallel in position and calling to the horse-and jobbers of the Stock Exchange, they bet on commission for those who do not wish to appear; the desire to bet or to let capital lie at interest; or who are ready, at a price, to back or lay the odds against any horse for any race: and thus accommodate the one party, by willingly risking gambling, once or twice in the year take a ticket in the turf lottery by risking a few pounds on a favorite local horse.

Legs—that is Blacklegs—the betting brokers were formerly called; but now, respectable merchant and numerous, that title is voted ungenteel, and they are Turfmen or Commissioners. Among the mother-of-pearl shirks who live by setting their polished wits against the folly and ignorance of young gambling enthusiasts, great fortunes are realized, and many, chiefly, by losing and by winning horses. Hence familiar in their mouths are such phrases as a "dead lot," "a stopped-up race," and other sentences expressive of the advantage of betting against a horse that can by no possibility win (as for "stopped" it is a vestigial term of expressing the condition of an animal sure not to run, or, if running, "made safe not to win." In the case of a profession, a man, one Jim Dawson, was hanged for poisoning a batch of horses at Newmarket, in order to make sure the bets of his employers, some of whom were of considerable "turf" respectability; but the march of knowledge has abolished such rude methods, and it is found that a bucket of water and a little bay admistered by a bribed groom-boy at a favorite stable, is less painful, and equally effective in "stopping a fiver's gallop."

The great art of modern turf gambling is not to ascertain what horse will win, but what horse is sure, or can be made sure, to lose. A stolid countenance, a cautious and quiet manner, a command of calculation, hawk-like decision, iron nerves, and no scruples, are the chief elements of prosperity in this now thoroughly organized profession. To all these be added an appearance of candor, either under the disguise of blunt frankness or bland politeness, greater success is probable. Legs include men of all ranks: successful pimps and broken country squires. Even a convicted thief, if once possessed of the keen and penetrating insight requirements, may become in a very few years a great and honored capitalist. Undoubtedly the most successful are those who are unhampered by the impediment of respectable associations, recollections, or education. The keen-witted pupils of Cambridge has little chance against a calculating boy-groom. And it is among a mob of these hardened, cool, and unscrupulous-hearted gentlemen's-valet-like youth, fresh from the school and university, plunge, in the wild speculation of making a certain sum of horse-racing.

Wonderful are the mysteries of the veterans of the weeds-and-water. Dexterity of legerdemain, and the arithmetic which enables them to calculate the odds at a moment's notice a few points in their favor, are the things that the student must learn on the Continent for cold-blooded common sense, it is really extraordinary to note how every year from the universities—from the cathedral towns and the universities—from the citizen's mug villa and the country mansion—from the gentleman and the disinfecting minister's house—from the army and even from the navy—a crowd of young and tender aspirants for turf commissions come forth to be eaten these gentry. Of course, out of the great annual supply of recruits to the turf, some are endowed with special qualifications for "Legging," which is the playful term by which the turf-man, in his familiar moments, designates his inner hook, his "pigeon" pure and simple, or survive, being by nature's gifts, although young, incipient sharks—weaklings not yet come to their prime teeth, or use of slime, or suffocating power of tail. But the greater number of the juveniles who pit their voluble skins against the long-headed, deep-biting, cool, either perish in the conflict, or retire permanently wounded.

Some, rain means ten pounds; to others, a hundred; to others, a thousand; to others, ten thousand; of those who can afford to lose and pay, some few return to honest work, others sink to the lowest depths of unsuccessful roguery. A select few acquire strength as they go, after expending the income of a German prince in acquiring experience. The demigod of the passing generation of turf-men is said to have lost a hundred thousand pounds before he was able to turn the tables on his tutors, and, by betting, through commissions, against his own horses, "sell the ring a real bargain."

It is of him the story is told that, having written instructions to one of his traveling financial agents staying in Cottenopolis, to bet for and against certain of his hotship's stud, which were in favor with the public, but not all intended to win, he was alarmed, after a time, at seeing great alteration in the price current of the betting market. He received no answer from his commissioner, and grew exceedingly; after instituting searching inquiries, ascertained that the letter partly misdirected, had never been delivered. But, by some extensive intuition, the sporting clerks of the post-office happened to have acted in accordance with my friend's instructions.

No doubt there are unblemished gentlemen who being rich, acute, and calm, play with the turf as they would at whist, for money, for nominal stakes, and run their horses for pleasure without troubling themselves with the toil of obtrusive combination. To these the turf is a gentle relaxation from more severe pursuits, and a means of killing a little idle time.

There is a story current of a distinguished nobleman who, many years ago, when he was poor and not so famous as he is now, deferred paying his "honest" trainer's bill so long and so ingeniously that the trainer was obliged to let his lordship's filly win a private race, and then wiped the account, leaving a balance for his employer. But only a diplomatist of the first rank is equal to such a feat.

Constant in his attendance at Newmarket is the Earl of Gollingsbaa. For nearly forty years he has never missed a race-meeting there. Evidently rubbing his head, as if his whole fortune depended on its contents, he studies the running of a succession of ugly unlucky colts and fillies, which are found sometimes in front within a few lengths of the winning-post, but never, very rarely first, and thus soliloquizes softly: "Gollingsbaa wins—Gollingsbaa wins!" a little louder, "Gollingsbaa wins!" in a shout. So he don't—so he don't—so he does, and he rose as he walks his back away in disgust, "Gollingsbaa is a fool!" This enthusiastic old gentleman has some forty or fifty thousand a year, and spends ten thousand of it every year in breeding, training, and running a most unfortunate stud, considering, apparently like Charles Fox, that, next to the pleasure of winning, losing is the greatest pleasure in life. On the same heath, which was solely dedicated to the serious business of racing, until the innovation of excursion trains brought down the frivolous, night by night, and long since, a young nobleman, little past his majority, and heir presumptive to his father's estates in the counties, moved almost to tears at the loss of a thousand pounds, risked on the private secret information of one of the fair friends who surround such deep-wooled sheep. A thousand pounds to this young gentleman represents something less than five pounds to the owner of five hundred a year.

We have ourselves seen the great Baron Bolsover, whose words can make emperors flinch, lost many thousands by his humiliating confidence when his favorite colt, Contango, ran all behind for that blue ribbon of the turf, the Chalk-Down stakes.

In a word, if you would see the proudest and the most wealthiest bowed down to a level with the meanest and the neediest, watch the aspect of the betting-ring before and after a great race. In the height of the excitement of winning a great race, a duke has been known to accept the congratulations and shake the hands of a burglarious cattlemeat dealer.

The solemn festivals—the "settling" days after great races—during which Methodist-chapel looking buildings between Tattersall's sale-yard and the cows' grass-plot, where bank-notes are carried by sheets, and watched about like waste-paper, bring to a crucial test the one virtue essential for standing on the first line—the grenadiers of the guard of turf morality—prompt payment. You may be a fraudulent bankrupt, a pickpocket, a forger, free by a flaw in the instrument; you may be guilty of the foulest crimes, or notorious for the basest propensities; but, so long as you pay, you will be admitted to the pale of the subscription-room and the betting-rings. You are sure of the family fur if not friendly companionship of your fellow-professionals, when you are probably last quarrelled honored with some playful nickname, descriptive of your peculiar rascality. Palmer, who never entered the betting-ring—turf, but acquired long before his detection, the sobriquet among his fraternity implying his propensity for "doing"—that was the mild word.

Extremes meet on the turf, and port too; the best and the worst are liable to fall; Beau becomes a squire; an earl's son becomes a felon. The old adage that hypocrisy is the homage vice pays to virtue is by no means worked out in the practical approach to forms and practices of respectability, by an imitation of the habits of more scrupulous men, in the closing day of the career of a successful turfman, who, secure in his hundred or two hundred thousand pounds, abandons the ways of the world, and sets himself down to found a family. He buys an estate, or two, or three; he builds a church; he subscribes splendidly to charities; he has the best shooting in the county, and the best people he can get to shoot over it; he is easy with his dozens of good family, and prepared with ready money to lend, on good security; he marries his daughters to decent families, provides the handsomest benefices. And thus with quiet manners our black-leg adventurer gets on, until people of the moneyworshiping sort begin to say that really Mr. Crossit is a very decent, respectable man. And yet there is scarcely one of these nobilitaries whose life would bear investigation, whose turning-point of success will not be found to rest on some "famous robbery."

It would be rather curious to see our noblemen, our gentlemen, our squires, our military heroes, the seed and the pith of gentility—every proud prop of their position and their pedigree, parsons, doctors, lawyers—hooking bets, handying jests, and exchanging compliments with an ex-pickpocket, who, after having been docked in divers horse pounds and cropped in many jails for petty larcenies, has abandoned a pursuit unworthy of his genius, now has his town-house and country-mansion, and a string of race-horses whose losings pay him quite as well as their winnings. A fashionable nor of the present day is a fine sight: the ex-pick pocket's health is proposed by Major Malaria Downright, the distinguished captain of the kings of five hundred, and, since he is a major, he is entitled to speak, and, being a major, he is entitled to pass robberies, prize-fighting publicans, ex-grooms, exsheetblacks, and ex-waiters, all prosperous, luxurious, dressing the best in the land, jewelers, and bootmakers, all paying, and therefore all jostling on terms of perfect equality, seeking some private information, some secret advantage, or trying and struggling in the hope of getting the best of each other. For the essential characteristic of the present men of the turf was a man of noble family, of ancient name, of high position, the haughtiest, the boldest member of the turf was a man of noble family.

Of literary and social accomplishments above the average, to whom, by ability as well as by position, high office was open. As to his means, who limits the means of a man of rank? It was known that he betted largely, borrowed largely, and paid punctually. At length the bubble burst; the great gentleman was, within memory of man, never permitted the slightest familiarity on the part of his low-born associates, disgraced. There was a great deal of dirtiness from Hebrews calling for some sixty thousand pounds; Christian till-discounters claimed a heavy bill with double-ends, and those who did not say a word, could have claimed twenty thousand pounds. Another peer, who had been, before he took to the turf, one of the most wealthiest of his class, found the result of joint racing speculations in a loss of a hundred thousand pounds; by degrees ruined and broken, he was confirmed by the verdict of a court of law. It then appeared that this great, haughty, historically-named peer had forged, on all his friends in every way, more or less in checks, for which at the last moment he outstripped each, by writing, by which, by which, he became of less than a thousand a year, he had for many years paid thirty thousand a year in interest at sixty per cent. He had lived under our fast turf education; but innumerable smaller instances occur: Manchester, Liverpool, Sheffield, supply their full quota to the roll. Every year, every year, instances of larceny, instances of forgery. As for forgery, it is so common a sequence of unsuccessful turf speculation, that the young gentleman who takes to the betting-ring as an easy and genteel mode of increasing his income, has the very great sure of shaking hands with a gentleman who has forged, or is about to forge. It is an old rule with the sharp practitioners, that all friends in every man of respectable connections a forged acceptance is a better security than a genuine bill.

THE HAMMERS.

Is our travels through the town—
Where the forges' flames are blown
By the humming fan that makes a drum,
Where the sledging falls on wedges
Like the rolling of the surges
To the shapes of all the labor-saving hum—

We have watched the falling hammer,
In its clinging, banging clamor,
As it rolled its music out, and rolled it in ring—
And the ringing, ringing, ringing,
Always sets our head to singing,
Something like these words to the hammer's drum,

Like the ringing of the bells,
When the wedding chiming swells
Through the merry-pealing steeple, to the gay
So the clang, and bang, and rattle
Of the hammers in the battle,
Fall, like music, on the dull and quiet air.

"In the battle?" Ay, the battle!
For it is no idle prattle
That we sing. Tis the battle against WANT
With all its sprites grim and gaunt,
And his suppers few and scant—
'Tis the battle of the CAN 'gainst the CAN'T.

AFTER AN OSTRICH.

IT lion-hunts, and in tiger-hunts, and in bear-hunts (now are not these the three long hounds I mean have heard; but of the ostrich-hunt the world, that is not used to running after ostriches, has heard very little. Little does, indeed, the world of lookers-down story about negroes who, being dressed in the skins of the birds, are mistaken by the flock for actual ostriches, and are suffered to come near enough to shoot any bird they may pick out with their arrows. But of the ostrich-hunt, which (now is only a fable), that the ostrich, when pursued, will hide his head in the sand and believe himself invisible. I know the ostrich has a stupid face; but he is, for all that, a sharp fellow, who knows his own interest as well as the rest of us. He is wary and long-sighted, one of the last creatures to put his own head in a hole. I have hunted him in his own deserts and can testify.

Every year, as summer sets in, horsemen arrive at the oasis of Derej from the mountains in the south, commencing their journey. They come after the ostrich, and stay only during the summer, as it is only when the heat is greatest that a horseman can have any chance of overtaking the swift-footed bird. In cold weather he will outstrip every pursuer, but beneath the rays of a noon sun in the African summer I suppose he finds his feather coat and trousers too warm to run well in.

An Arab friend of mine, with the short name of Sidi Mohammed ben Omar ben es-Sheikh Abderahman Burjeeb el-Baghani, who was bound for the hunting-ground, persuaded me to go with him and try my skill at running down an ostrich. My friend Sidi Burjeeb is a good scar, and holds my dignity, although his trip to Derej was made for the sake of gain. I, who went only for sport, was little better than a mere respectful wonder by my fellow-sportsmen.

We managed to reach Derej a day or two before the hunt. Then we might rest and prepare for our fatigues to come. The hunt began on a sultry morning at the rising of the Dog-star. Cold wind or simoom had been blowing for several days, and the thermometer had only fallen to ninety-eight degrees, or hotabout, just before starting. We were to have one of the hottest days of a Saharan summer. So much the better. The warmer cooled and thinned, still I felt, and so shall we. The dangers of this chase do not arise from the fierceness of the animal pursued, but from the fierceness of the sun that may strike down the huntsman. An Englishman is much more likely to come off unscathed from an encounter with a lion than fro return from an ostrich-hunt without getting sun-stroke or brain fever.

Our party consisted of ten horsemen and a few scouts who had been sent out at daybreak to explore the nest for footprints of ostriches and track them to their feeding-ground. We knew fairly mounted Iroon animals not so fat as to conceal the beautiful lines of their ribs. The bones of their haunches were large, and set apart out through the skin. These features, however, are common enough in Arab horses, and only show that animals are in light weights as we could be, having dispensed with four out of five thick pieces of felt which invariably form the Arab's side-cloth, and thrown off every superfluous article of clothing; only taking care to have our heads well wrapped up as protection against the fierceness of the sun.

We started about two hours after sunrise, and followed leisurely on the trace of our scouts. After proceeding four miles or six miles, we came upon a scout who said that five fine birds were a little way off grazing in a valley. Knowing that they would not stray far we dismounted to give ease for a few minutes to our horses and ourselves, and to allow our scouts to ride still further into the "kaila," or mid-day heat. A sultry feverish wind blew from the south, and the sun's glow was retained from the earth, reflected and under our feet with almost unlessened strength. What a dryingground was here for washes-women! Wet clothes, by ten minutes' exposure, to be taken in as fast as they were taken out.

The Arabs' saddles are made of very porous clay, absorbed long draughts of water, and hung little gourd bottles of water to their saddle-bows. We moistened ourselves well. From the top of a little hill, if you could call by that name a height of about ten yards above the bottom of the wady, we saw the scouts, and suspect they had some knowledge of us before we were visible. They had already started at full trot; and seemed to skim along the surface of the ground, flapping their small downy wings to help them onward, and, like horses in full trot, kicking up stones behind with them. We went after them at a canter: had we tried at once to catch them in a gallop, our horses would soon have been blown, and the birds would have got out of reach. Our plan was to follow them as closely as might be, without frightening them into their highest speed, and to keep them in view.

The birds soon parted from one another: two going together one way, and the others starting off each in a different direction. We followed a single ostrich. For the male, the feathers of the male being most valuable.

Noon passed, and the sun was rapidly declining. We had been pursuing our ostrich for more than four hours, but not in a straight line, since these creatures have a whim for running in large circles, so that we were within the birds' journey from our starting-point. I had no very great notion of heat, but my head began to feel as if fast it would have been skinned out salted. The excitement and emulation among us made me, however, forget every thing but the object of our chase. One by one the horses of the Arabs dropped behind, dead-beat. Sidi Hesters, two of the Arabs, and myself, being the best mounted, alone kept up the hunt. Our aim was to turn the ostrich, and so drive him back to our companions. The two Arabs picked their steeds with a full gallop, one to the right, the one to the left, and tried, by making a circuit, to get ahead of the bird, and to head him back on the ring outdone by the other Arabs, so he made a dash at the game on his own account. His horse had a little spirit left, and a few long bounds brought him alongside. The bird saw that he was outrun and outwitted. With a little stick, such as we all carried for this purpose, Sidi tapped his horse on the neck, turned him, and drove him back to me like a tame creature. Our two companions were coming up, crying out, "Sabah! sabah!" Allah yatik es-sahn!" which means, "Well done! well done! may God give you health!" An Arab equivalent for "Hurrah! hurrah! go it again, old boy!"

The ostrich was, of course, a Mussulman, and was convinced that it was in vain to strive against his fate. One by one we came up with our beaten companions; and we then surrounded our bird, caught him, and cut his throat, with the pious words, "Bism-Illah Akbbar" (in the name of the great God). It would have been simpler to tap him on the head and strangle him, for then there would have been no fear of damaging the feathers with the blood. But such a death is not in accordance with the Moslem creed concerning hole and unholy food; and of an animal so slaughtered the flesh could not have been eaten.

Ladies, I trust, are satisfied with the amount of trouble taken to get for them their court plumes. But it is a pity that each feather which emit them a guinea scarcely brings a shilling to the Arab sportsman.

When we had skinned our bird, and cut off the best joints, we rode leisurely back to Derej, which we reached in little after sunset, and there we looked up. Heartily glad was I, after a good supper of broiled leg of ostrich—which is a meat, not choice, but welcome to the hungry—to lie on the soft sand and take a nap that lasted until sunrise the following morning.

I passed the following day with my fellowsportsmen, and learned much about the habits of the ostrich tribe, and the various ways of taking it. Running it down in the manner just related is considered the best way, though the most tedious, for it involves the least chance of injuring the feathers. The commonest plan, however, is to lay snares of rope in places where the birds frequent. Another way is to dig a hole in the earth near a bush, or some slight cover, in a valley to which the ostriches come to graze. One of the hunters, armed with his long gun, hides in the hole, and his companions, having strewed brushwood over him, effaces their footmarks from the sand. The gun remains, with only the muzzle of the gun visible outside his hiding-place, until an ostrich passes: when, if the shot be near enough, he is an easy prey.

Ostriches pair about the beginning of March, and the female begins laying her eggs toward the end of April. She generally puts a score or two down in the sand, which is first carefully and scraped out of the sand. She arranges the eggs in a triangle, with the point in front of her when sitting upon them. She or their male therefore, do not get sufficiently warmed by her body, and from underneath eggs she breaks to provide food for the young birds during the hours they are after they have left their shells. The young birds, hatched in a few weeks, take their own to attain their full size; they appear to live much with their parents, and even make their nests near theirs. They are sometimes there still to steal the nests of a whole family together—grandfather and grandmother in the middle, and the younger generations scattered around. Does the grandsire in the middle receive from the young ostriches upon the outskirts of the nest the same reverence to which he may suppose himself entitled? In the first year of her breeding the female lays smaller eggs than afterwards, but the birds hatched from them grow to the usual size. Cock and hen sit on the eggs alternately—one sitting while the other goes for food; even by night. On Sunday, by law their eggs to be hatched by the sun.

The male is very attentive when he begins his courtship, and seems to be lady about whom we also goes. After marriage, however, his conduct undergoes a change. If, while sitting on the newly laid eggs, he immediately leaves the eggs, fetches his wife, and makes her take his place. He then watches at a little distance; and if, after a long delay, he satisfies himself that all is safe, he allows his mate to return to her meal, and resumes his place over the eggs. The Arabs, when they found a nest near any convenient bush, or other shelter, make a pit, as before described. The birds, on their approach, take flight. The men, having watched as fast as possible, leave one of their number with the gun in the pit, and disappear. When the birds come again to reconnoitre the ground, if they think matters satisfactory, the hen is seat to sit, and she resumes sitting for the rest of the hours. The sportsman does not shoot her, as his aim is to bring down the male. He waits, therefore, till he is relieved from the duties by the bird he wants. The best shot among the Arabs is always chosen for pit-guard. As he kills his bird, he receives a double share of the profits; when he misses the bird, he must pay a fine and less his office. After the male is killed, the female will immediately come to look for him, and to visit the eggs, when she also may be taken. But were the female bird shot first, the male would never trouble himself any more about the eggs, but would go from the spot, probably forever.

Ostriches are not particular in the selection of their food. They live generally on grass, seeds, and even insects; but they have been domesticated, a great particularity for half-pence, steel-pens, nails, keys, spoons, small-boxes, and so forth. Whether they are good digest these I do not know; but I have heard many tales of ostriches being found with such things half-digested in their stomachs. The ostrich is very quick in its great avidity, and must find it in some way to their advantage so to do. They are a very kind and timid animal, who seem used to the society of men, are very sociable, wandering about the neighborhood of their owner's house, and return visits wherever they find an open door. When annoyed, they are dangerous; for, besides biting, they will knock a man down with a fly or a wing or a stroke of the foot. They are generally sedate, silent birds, and, if not frightened, walk about slowly and gravely. Their cry is a short roar; but with this they seldom favor human ears, though when out of temper they will sometimes utter a low hissing noise. The upper part of the neck of the ostrich is bare; then comes very delicate black down, which, increasing in size toward the tail, cover the whole body. In the wings and tail are the beautiful white feathers so much admired upon the heads of ladies. The female has not such fine white feathers as the male, and even her black feathers want his raven hue. Indeed, the greater part are rather grayishbrown than black. The skin of the female (Rakfa'it is called by the Arabs) does not fetch nearly so high a price as that of the male (Dhaleem). One of the best skins, in its rugged plumage, will sometimes fetch from the Arabs three or eight pounds But this is an unusually high price.

ROBERT FLEURY'S GREAT PICTURE OF THE BURNING OF HERETICS BY THE ROMAN CATHOLICS AT AN AUTO DA FE.

AN AUTO DA FE.

We publish above an engraving of Mr. Robert Fleury's magnificent painting of an Auto da Fé, which has lately placed its author in the first rank of modern painters. Never has that terrible theme been more vividly wrought out. The contrast between the terror expressed in the countenance of the poor girl, who is evidently loth to part with her life, and the stern calm of the old Jew who is to suffer with her; the brutal ferocity of the priests and their assistants; the powerful drawing of the two victims who are already on the stake; the life and motion of the whole picture are calculated to arrest and rivet the attention, and to leave an image on the memory that will not readily be effaced.

Of the history of Auto da Fe all of our readers have heard something. The word signifies an act of Faith, and was first used by the Inquisition when the officers of that body compelled heretics to abjure their heresies and to perform an act of Faith in presence of tortures and the stake. As many of the Jews and Christians who were seized by the Inquisition remained steadfast in their belief even under menaces of the most cruel of deaths, the word came to signify the punishment which was inflicted by the Inquisition in consequence of the refusal to perform an act of Faith.

It is supposed that many thousands of persons fell victims to the Inquisition during its long and bloody reign in Spain. Every few weeks the stakes were surrounded by a gaping crowd, and some poor heretic was burned alive amidst the curses and shouts of the mob. It came to be a popular spectacle, and must have gone far toward brutalizing the public mind of the day. Perhaps the most curious fact in connection with the Inquisition is the recent discovery by a Protestant Englishman that the most famous and most bloodthirsty of the grand Inquisitors of Spain was, in reality, a man of gentle, humane temper, who was guilty of burning scores of human creatures solely because he was taught that it was his duty, and who suffered in heart for his victims as acutely as the warmest of their friends.

A DAY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER.

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER X.

"YOUNG lady in deep mourning, Sir—crape shawl and bonnet, Sir," said the official, in answer to my question, aided by a shilling fee; "the same as asked where was the station for the Dover line."

"Yes, yes; that must be she."

"Got into a cab, Sir, and drove off straight for the Sou'-Eastern."

"She was quite alone?"

"Quite, Sir; but she seems used to traveling—got her traps together in no time, and was off in a jiffy."

"Stupid dog!" thought I; "with every advantage position and accident can confer, how little this fellow reads of character. In this poor, forlorn, heart-weary orphan, he only sees something like a commercial traveler."

"Any luggage, Sir? Is this yours?" said he, pointing to a wool-sack.

"No," said I, haughtily; "my servants have gone forward with my luggage. I have nothing but a knapsack." And with an air of dignity I flung it into a Hansom, and ordered the driver to set me down at the South-Eastern. Although using every exertion, the train had just started when I arrived, and a second time was

"ANY LUGGAGE, SIR? IS THIS YOURS?" SAID HE, POINTING TO A WOOL-SACK.

I obliged to wait some minutes at a station. Resolving to free myself from all the captivations of that tendency to day-dreaming—that fatal habit of suffering my fancy to direct my course, as though in pursuit of some settled purpose—I calmly asked myself whither I was going—and for what? Before I had begun the examination I deemed myself a most candid, truth-observing, frank witness, and now I discovered that I was canonical and "dodgy" as an Old Bailey lawyer. I was haughty and indignant at being so catechised. My conscience, on the shallow pretext of being greatly interested about me, was simply prying and inquisitive. Conscience is all very well when one desires to appeal to it, and refer some distinct motive or action to its appreciation; but it is scarcely fair, and certainly not dignified, for conscience to go about seeking for little accusations of this kind or that. What liberty of action is there, besides, to a man who carries a "detective" with him wherever he goes? And, lastly, conscience has the intolerable habit of obtruding its opinion upon details, and will not wait to judge by results. Now, when I have won the race, come in first, amidst the enthusiastic cheers of thousands, I don't care to be asked, however privately, whether I did not pinch some little bit of rather unfair jockeyship. I never could rightly get over my dislike to the friend who would take this liberty with me; and this is exactly the part conscience plays, and with an impudent air of superintendence, as though to say, "None of your shuffling with me, Potts! That will do all mighty well with the outer world, but I am not to be hoodwinked. You never devised a scheme in your life that I was not by at the cookery, and saw how you mixed the ingredients and stirred the pot! No, no, old fellow, all your little secret rogueries will avail you nothing here!"

Had this conscience been actually addressed to me by a living individual, I could not have heard them more plainly than now they fell upon my ear, uttered, besides, in a tone of cutting, sarcastic derision. "I will stand this no longer!" cried I, springing up from my seat, and flinging my cigar angrily away. "I'm certain no man ever accomplished any high and great destiny in life who suffered himself to be bullied in this wise; such irritating, pestering impertinence would destroy the temper of a saint, and break down the courage and damp the ardor of the boldest. Could great measures of statecraft be carried out—could battles be won—could new continents be discovered—if, at every strait and every emergency, one was to be interrupted by a low voice, whispering, 'Is this all right? Are there no flaws here? You live in a world of frailties, Potts. You are playing at a round game, where every one cheats a little, and where the rogueries are never remembered against him who wins. Bear that in your mind, and keep your cards "up."'"

When I was about to take my ticket, a distum of the great moralist struck my mind: "Desultory reading has slain its thousands and tens of thousands;" and if desultory reading, why not infinitely more so desultory acquaintance? Surely our readings do not impress us so powerfully as the actual intercourse of life. It must be so. It is in this daily conflict with our fellow-men that we are moulded and fashioned, and the danger is to commingle and confuse the impressions made upon our hearts—to cross the wiring on our natures so often that nothing remains legible! "I will guard against this peril," thought I. "I will concentrate my attentions and travel alone." I slipped a crown into one of the guards' hands and whispered, "Put no one in here if you can help it."

As I jogged along, all by myself, I could not help feeling that one of the highest privileges of wealth must be to be able always to buy solitude —to be in a position to say, "None shall invade me. The world must contrive to go round without a kick from me. I am a self-contained and self-suffering creature." If I were Rothschild I'd revel in this sentiment; it pleases one so immeasurably above that busy ant-hill where one sees the creatures hurrying, hastening, and fagging "till their hearts are broken." One feels himself a superior intelligence—a being above the wants and cares of the work-a-day world around him.

"Any room here?" cried a merry voice breaking in upon my musings, and at the same instant a young fellow, in a gray traveling suit and a wide-awake, flung a dressing-bag and a wrapper carelessly into the carriage, and so recklessly as to come tumbling over me. He never thought of apologizing, however, but continued his remarks to the guard, who was evidently endeavoring to induce him to take a place elsewhere. "No, no!" cried the young man; "I'm all right here, and the cove with the yellow hair won't object to my smoking."

I heard these words as I sat in the corner, and I need scarcely say how grossly the impertinence offended me. That the privacy I had paid for should be invaded was bad enough, but that my companion should begin acquaintance with an insult was worse again, and so I determined on no account, nor upon any pretext, would I hold intercourse with him, but maintain a perfect silence and reserve so long as our journey lasted.

There was an insufferable jauntiness and self-satisfaction in every movement of the new arrival, even to the reckless way he pitched into the carriage their small white canvas bags, neatly fully sealed and docketed, the address—which I read—being, "To H. M.'s Minister and Envoy at ——, in Italy, the Right Hon. Butler Auteché," etc. So, then, this was one of the Young Guard of Diplomacy, one of those sucklings of Talleyrands, which form the hope of the Foreign-Office and the terror of middle-class Englishmen abroad.

"Do you mind my smoking?" asked he, abruptly, as he scraped his lucifer-match against the roof of the carriage, showing the most complete indifference how little he cared for my reply.

"I never smoke, Sir, except in the carriages reserved for smokers," was my rebukeful answer.

"And I always do," said he, in a very easy tone.

Not condescending to notice this rude rejoinder, I drew forth my newspaper, and tried to occupy myself with its contents.

"Any thing new?" asked he, abruptly.

"Not that I am aware, Sir. I was about to consult the paper."

"What paper is it?"

"The Times Leader, Sir, at your service," said I, with a sort of sarcasm.

"Rascally prices—vile, low, radical, mill-owning organ. Pitch it away!"

"Certainly not, Sir. Being for me and my editorial brethren, I will keep it in the strongest manner as to how I deal with it."

"It's deucad low, that's what it is; and that's exactly the fault of all the daily papers. Their tone is vulgar; they reflect nothing of the opinion one hears in society. Don't you agree with me?"

I gave a sort of muttering dissent, and he broke in quickly,

"Perhaps not; it's just as likely you would not think them low; but take my word for it, you're right."

I shook my head negatively, without speaking.

"Well, now," cried he, "let us put the thing to the test. Read out one of those leaders. I don't care which, or on what subject. Read it aloud, and I pledge myself to show you at least one vulgarism, one flagrant outrage on good breeding, in every third sentence."

"I protest, Sir," said I, haughtily, "I shall do no such thing. I have come here neither to read aloud nor take up the defense of the public press."

"I say, look out!" cried he; "you'll smash something with that long stick of yours. Why, I don't mistake, it's Bohemian glass. No, no; all right," said he, examining the number, "it's only Yarmouth bloaters."

"I imagined these contained dispatches, Sir," said I, with a look of what he ought to have understood as withering scorn.

"You did, did you?" cried he, with a quick laugh. "Well, I'll bet you a sovereign I make a better guess about your pack than you've done about mine."

"Done, Sir; I take you," said I, quickly.

"Well, you're in cutlery, or hardware, or lace goods, or ribbons, or alpaca cloth, or drugs, ain't you?"

"I am not, Sir," was my stern reply.

"Not a bagman?"

"Not a bagman, Sir."

"Well, you're an usher in a commercial academy, or 'our own correspondent,' or a telegraph clerk?"

"I'm none of these, Sir. And I now beg to remind you, that instead of one guess, you have made about a dozen."

"Well, you've won, there's no denying it," said he, taking a sovereign from his waistcoat pocket, and handing it to me. "It's deucad odd how I should be mistaken. I'd have sworn you were a bagman!" But for the importance of these last words I should have declined to accept his lost bet; but I took it now as a sort of vindication of my wounded feelings. "Now it's all over and ended," said he, calmly, "what are you? I don't ask out of any impertinent curiosity, but that I hate being foiled in a thing of this kind. What are you?"

"I am, Sir," said I, "a Sir," said I, indignantly, for now I was outraged beyond endurance—"I'll tell you, Sir, what I am, and what I feel myself—one singularly unlucky in a travelling companion."

"Bet you a five-pound you're not," broke he in. "Give you six to five on it, in any thing you like."

"It would be a wager almost impossible to decide, Sir."

"Nothing of the kind. Let us leave it to the first pretty woman we see at the station, the guard of the train, the fellow in the pay-office, the stoker, if you like."

"I must own, Sir, that you express a very confident opinion of your case."

"Well, bet."

"No, Sir, certainly not."

"Well, then, shut up, and say no more about it. If a man won't back his opinion, the less he speaks the better."

I lay back in my place at this, determined that no provocation should induce me to exchange another word with him. Apparently he had not made a like resolve, for he went on:

"It's all bosh about appearances being deceptive, and so forth. They say 'not all gold that glitters;' my notion is, that with a fellow who really knows life no disguise that was ever invented will be successful: the way a man wears his hair!—here he looked at mine—"the sort of gloves he has, if there be any thing peculiar in his waistcoat, and, above all, his boots. I wish you knew the devil was ever more revolted in his hoof than a snob by his shoes." A most condemnatory glance at my extremities accompanied this speech.

"Must I endure this sort of persecution all the way to Dover?" was the question I asked of myself.

"Look out, you're on fire!" said he, with a dry laugh. And, sure enough, a spark from his cigarette had fallen on my trowsers, and burned a round hole in them.

"Really, Sir," cried I, in passionate warmth, "your conduct becomes intolerable."

"Well, if I knew you preferred being singed, I'd have said nothing about it. What's this station here? Where's your Bradshaw?"

"I have got no Bradshaw, Sir," said I, with dignity.

"No Bradshaw! A bagman without Bradshaw! Oh, I forgot, you ain't a bagman. Why are we stopping here? something smashed, I suspect, eh? Eh! what! isn't that the? Yes, it is! Open the door!—let me out, I say! Confound the lock!—let me out!" While he uttered these words, in an accent of the wildest impatience, I had time to see a lady, in deep mourning, pass on to a carriage in front, just as, with a preliminary snort, the train shook, then backed, and at last set out on its thundering course again. "Such a stunning fine girl!" said he, as he lighted a fresh cigar; "saw her just as we started, and thought I'd run her to earth in this carriage. Precious mistake I made, eh, wasn't it? All in black—deep black—and quite alone!"

I had to turn toward the window, not to let him perceive how his words agitated me, for I felt certain it was Miss Herbert he was describing, and I felt a sort of revulsion to think of the poor girl being subjected to the impertinence of this intolerable puppy.

"Too much style about her for a governess; and yet, somehow, she wasn't, so to say—you know what I mean—he wasn't altogether that; looked frightened, and people of real class never look frightened."

"The daughter of a clergyman, probably," said I, with a tone of such reproof as I hoped must check all levity.

"Or a flash maid! some of them, nowadays, are wonderful swells; they've got an art of dressing and making up that is really surprising."

"I have no experience of the order, Sir," said I, gravely.

"Well, so I should say. Your beat is in the haberdashery or hosiery line, eh?"

"As it not yet occurred to you, Sir," asked I, sternly, "that an acquaintanship brief as ours should exclude personalities, not to say—not to say—" I wanted to add "impertinences," but his gray eyes were turned full on me with an expression so peculiar, that I faltered, and could not get the word out.

"Well, go on—out with it: not to say what?" said he, calmly.

I turned my shoulder toward him, and nestled down into my place.

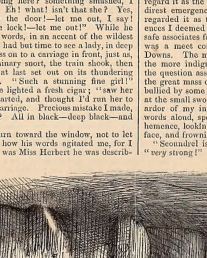
"There's a thing, now," said he, in a tone of the coolest reflection—"there's a thing, now, that I never could understand, and I have never met but one person to explain it. Our nation, a nation, is just as plucky as the French—no one disputes it; and yet, take a Frenchman of your train—an economic-voyageur, or any thing that way—and you'll just find him as prompt on the point of honor as the best noble in the land. He never utters an insolent speech without being ready to back it."

I felt as if I were choking, but I never uttered a word.

"I remember meeting one of these fellows—traveler for some house in the wine trade—at Avignon. It was at table d'hôte, and I said something slighting about Communism, and he replied, 'Monsieur, je suis Fourriste, and you insult me.' Thereupon he sent me his card by the waiter—Paul Delege, for the house of Gorgon, père et fils.' I tore it, and threw it away, saying, 'I never drink Bordeaux wines.' 'What do you say to a glass of Hermitage, then?' said he, and flung the contents of his own in my face. Wasn't that very ready? I call it as neat a thing as could be done."

"And you bore that outrage," said I, in triumphant delight; "you submitted to a flagrant insult like that at a public table?"

"I don't know what you call 'bearing it,' said he; 'that thing was done, and I had only to wipe my face with my napkin."



"No more than that?" said I, sneeringly.

"We went out afterward, if you mean that," said he, quietly, "and he ran me through here."

As he spoke, he proceeded, in leisurely fashion, to unbutton the wrist of his shirt, and baring his arm mid-way, showed me a pinkish cicatrix of considerable extent. "It went, the doctor said, within a hair's-breadth of the artery."

I made no comment upon this story. From the moment I heard it I felt as though I was traveling with the late Mr. Palmer, of Rugely. I was, as it were, in the company of one who for what he would have scrupled to dispose of any, at any moment and in any way that his fancy suggested. My code respecting the Duel was to regard it as the last, the very last, appeal in the direst emergency of dishonor. The men who regarded it as the settlement of slight differences I deemed assassins. They were no more safe associates for peaceful citizens than a wolf was a mate companion for a flock of South Downs. The more I ruminated on this theme the more indignant grew my resentment, and the question assumed the shape of asking, "Is the great mass of mankind to be hectored and bullied by some half-dozen scoundrels with skill at the small sword?" Little knew I that in the ardor of my indignation I had uttered these words aloud, spoken them with an earnest vehemence, looking my fellow-traveler full in the face, and frowning.

"Scoundrel is strong, eh?" said he, slowly; "very strong!"

"HE WAS FAST ASLEEP, AND SNORING LOUDLY."

"Who spoke of a scoundrel?" asked I, in terror, for his confounded calm, cold manner made my very blood run chilled.

"Scoundrel is exactly the sort of word," added he, deliberately, "that once uttered can only be expiated in one way. You do not give me the impression of a very bright individual, but certainly you can understand so much."

I bowed a dignified assent; my heart was in my mouth as I did it, and I could not, to save my life, have uttered a word. My predicament was highly perilous; and all incurred by what?—that passion for adventure that had led me forth out of a position of easy obscurity into a world of strife, conflict, and difficulty. Why had I not staid at home? What foolish fascination had ever suggested me the Quixotism of these wanderings? Blended had done it all. Were it not for him, I had never left old Admiral Dyke, talked myself into a stupid wager, lost what was not my own; in fact, every disaster sprang out of the one before it, just as twig adheres to branch and branch to trunk. Shall I make a clean breast of it, and tell my companion my whole story? Shall I explain to him that at heart I am a creature of the kindliest impulses and most generous sympathies; that I overflow with good intentions toward my fellows; and that the problem I am engaged to solve is how and in what manner most happiness? Will he comprehend me? Has he a nature to appreciate an organization so fine and subtle as mine? Will he understand that the fact that endows us with our gifts at birth is reckoned to be munificent when she withholds only one high quality, and with me that one was courage? I mean the coarse, vulgar, combative sort of courage that makes a prize-fighter and a bargee; for as to the grander species of courage, I imagine it to be my distinguishing feature.

The question is, will he give me a patient hearing, for my theory requires nice handling, and some delicacy in the developing. I will present me short in his bluff, abrupt way, and say, "Our truth is, old fellow! you wants to avoid a bit of this quarrel." What am I to reply? I shall rejoin: "Sir, let us first inquire if it be a quarrel." And the ghost of Aristides down in the Crimean war there has not been one instance of a conflict that did not originate in misconceptions, and has not been prolonged by explanations! Let us take the Peloponnesian war." A short grunt beside me here cut short my self-mentation. He was fast sound asleep, and snoring loudly. My thoughts at once suggested escape. I could but put away I fancied I could find space in the world never again to see myself his neighbor.

The train was shirling along between deep chalk cuttings, and at a furious pace; to leap out was certain death. But was not the same fate received for one if I remained? At last I heard the crank—crank of the brake! We were nearing a station; the earth was at rest; her still recorded; the view opened; a spire of a church, trees, houses appeared; and our speed diminishing, we came bumping, jolting, and snorting into a little trim, garden-like spot, that at the moment seemed to me a paradise.

I beckoned to the guard to let me out—to do it noiselessly, I slipped a shilling into his hand, I grasped my portfolio, and my wrapping-cloak forever away. Oh, the happiness of that moment, as the door closed without awakening him!

"Any where—any carriage—what class you please," were my words to "There, youder," broke I in, hastily, "where that lady in mourning has just got in."

"All full there, Sir," replied the man; "step in here." And away we went.

My compartment contained but one passenger; he was buried round his oil-skin cap, and seated the captain of a mail steamer, as I subsequently learned. He glanced at me as I came in, and went on reading his newspaper.

"Going north, I suppose?" said he, bluntly, after a pause of some time. "Going to Berlin?"

"No," said I, rather astonished at his giving me this destination. "I'm for Brussels."

"We shall have a rough night of it, outside. Glass is falling suddenly, and the wind has chopped round to the south'ard and east'ard!"

"I'm sorry for it," said I. "I'm but an indifferent sailor."

"Well, I'll tell you what to do: just turn into my cabin—you'll have it all to yourself; lie down flat on your back the moment you're aboard; rub the forward to give you a strong glass of brandy-and-water—the captain's brandy, say, for it is real old stuff, and a perfect cordial, and my name isn't Hobbes if you don't sleep all the way across."

I really had no words for such unexpected generosity. How was I to believe my ears at such a kind proposal of a perfect stranger? Was it not in my appearance that something have marked me out as no object for these attentions? I don't know how he took my confusion, said I, in confusion; "and when I think that we must now for the first time—"

"What, that signify?" said he, in the same short way. "I've met pretty nigh all of you by this time. I've been a matter of eleven years on this station!"

"Met pretty nigh all of us!" What does that mean? Who and what are we? He can't mean the Postses, for I'm the first who ever traveled even thus far! But I was not given leisure to follow up the inquiry, for he went on to say how, in all that time of eleven years, he had never seen threatenings of a worse night than he saw now.

"Then why venture out?" asked I, timidly.

"They must have the bags over there—that's the reason," said he, curtly. "Besides, who's to say when he won't meet dirty weather at sea? One takes rough and smooth in this life, eh?"

The observation was not remarkable for originality, but I liked it. I like the reflective turn, no matter how beaten the path may be that elicits its exercise.

"It's a short trip—some five or six hours, at most," said he; "but it's wonderful what ugly weather one sees in it. It's always so in these narrow seas."

"Yes," said I, concurringly, "these petty channels, like the small events of our life, are often the source of the greatest storms."

He gave a little short grunt; it might have been assent, and it might possibly have been a laugh pent and suppressed for moralizing; at all events, he resumed his paper and read away without speaking. I was left to examine and speculate on the singular enrollment of the scenes he was about to open. The very fact of the sea, therefore, been struck by something in my face, or bearing, to suggest to those mysterious sympathies which are the hidden motives that guide the lot of our lives that I was to be, as it were, said to himself, 'I like that man. I have met more pretentious people: I have seen persons who desire to dominate and impose more than he; but there is that about him that, somehow, appeals to the instincts of my nature, and I can say I feel myself his friend already.'

As I worked at my little theory, with all the ingenuity I have by ever to employ on such occasions, I perceived that he had put up his newspaper, and was gathering together, in old travel-fashion, the odds and ends of his baggage.

"Here we are," said he, as we glided into the station, "and in capital time. Don't trouble yourself about your traps. My steward will be here presently, and take all your things down to the packet along with mine. Our steam is up, so lose no time in getting aboard."

I had never less intention to play the loiterer. The odious attache was still in my neighborhood, and until I had got clear out of his reach I felt in my bones I was unsafe. If, I remembered, was for Calais; so that, by taking the Ostend boat, I was at once separating myself from his detested companionship. I not only, therefore, accepted the captain's offer to leave all my effects to the charge of his steward, but in sooner than I could have thought it possible, out, hastened through the thronged station, and made at all my speed for the harbor.

In it to remove the impediments to quitting one's country, and, by interposing difficulties, to give the enemy opportunities to escape, is twice about expatriating himself, that the way from the railroad to the dock at Dover is made as circuitous and inconvenient as the ingenuity of Are these obstacles invented in the spirit of those official details which make bans on the church-door, a delay of three weeks, ere procede a marriage? as though to say, Hait, impetuous youth, and think well what you are doing! Are these among the wise precautions of a truly paternal rule? If so, they must occasionally create opportunities for evasion, for when I reached the pier the packet had already begun to move, and it was only by a vigorous leap that I gained the bulwarks and thus scrambled on board.

"Like every one of you," growled out my weather-beaten friend; "always within an ace of being left behind."

"Every one of us!" muttered I. "What can he have known of the Potts family, that he dares to describe us thus characteristically? And who ever presumed to call me a scientific smuggler?"

"Step down below, as I told you," whispered he. "It's a dirty night, and we shall have bucketing weather outside." And with this friendly hint I at once complied, and sank down in the hidden. "Show that gentleman into my state-room, steward," called he out from above. "Mix him something warm, and look after him."

"Ay, ay, Sir," was the brisk reply, as the bustling man of brandy and basins threw open a small door, and ushered me into a little den, with a mingled odor of the whiten, and wet mackintoshes. "All to yourself here, Sir," said he, and vanished.

To the Ladies!

Andrews' "Excelsior" Yeast Powder

Takes the precedence over all others, for the good reasons:

It is always perfectly pure in its ingredients, and none but the best are used, and it always rises to the same height in baking.

It is reliable for any length of time in any climate, and the directions for its use are simple and explicit.

It has already become widely known and used for making BISCUITS OR TEA-CAKES, by those who have practically tried it, and the universal verdict is, that Andrews' Yeast Powder is not excelled, if equaled, by any of the many kinds now offered for sale.

It is a saving of time and fuel in baking, but increases its weight, and is a great saving of flour, and makes the family cook feel triumphant.

It is ready for use in one minute!

It is a science, and has been established ever ten years!

It will go an average 1200 cans per day—over 360,000 per annum.

The Best Trade throughout the South, West, and East consolidate patronize ANDREWS' EXCELSIOR YEAST POWDER, and no family once using it will ever have any other.

Purchase of no Best Trade everywhere, and beware of the common deleterious mixtures, which are sold cheap, and which are injurious to health.

Try Andrews' Excelsior Yeast Powder—the Standard Article for general excellence.

BY A SOUTHERN AUTHOR.
Hints for the Million. A Practical Treatise on The Philosophy of Human Beauty; showing how to Acquire and Retain Bodily Symmetry, Health, Good Vigor, Grace, and Long Life; and to avoid the Infirmities and Deformities of Age. By D. H. JACQUES, of South Carolina.
This is an elaborate and deeply interesting work, replete with wonderful facts and important deductions, and presenting many original applications of the principles of Physiology, Hygiene, Mental Science, and Æsthetics to Human Physique and Improvement. Our author, himself, but an earnest and sincere disciple of Science, and it is in the light of a rational Philosophy, and not in a spirit of charlatanism, that he here shows us how the physical organization of man may be developed and perfected—how man may become strong, active, efficient—in a word, mostly how woman may attain to the fullness of bodily health, freshness, and adorn herself with all the charms which properly belong to her sex. Every one should read this book and self-instruct, may grow up into the ripened should of perfect manhood or womanhood. Indeed, no one may read the book; he everybody is certain to find many helpful hints and valuable instructions, which if followed in a sense time so elasticity and vigor to the body as to fill it, as that essential elasticity and vigor to the body as to fill it, as that essential elasticity and vigor to the body as to fill it, as that essential

The Grover & Baker
Noiseless
Family Sewing Machine

is rapidly superseding all others for family use. The Double Lock Stitch now formed by this Machine is found to be the only one which survives the washtub on blue denims, and, therefore, the only one genuinely valuable for Family Sewing.

READ THE FOLLOWING TESTIMONY:

"MR. JEFFERSON DAVIS presents her compliments to Grover & Baker, and takes pleasure in saying that she has used one of their Machines for two years, and finds it still in good order, makes a beautiful stitch, and does easily work of any kind."—Washington, D. C.

"I take pleasure in saying, that the Grover & Baker Sewing Machines have more than sustained my expectations. After trying and returning others, I keep three of them in operation in my different places, and, after four years' trial, have no fault to find."—D. Hamstead, Senator, of South Carolina.

"My wife has had one of Grover & Baker's Family Sewing Machines for some time, and I am satisfied it is one of the best labor-saving machines that has been invented. I take much pleasure in recommending it to the public."—Hon. T. G. Harris, Governor of Tennessee.

"The Grover & Baker Sewing Machine has performed fully equal to representations. My nieces always were made with it last fall, and again this spring; and the clothes for winter are now being made with it. The coarsest knseys, lowells, denims, etc., were used for the clothes. It has been used on many fine articles, such as calicoes, etc., for family wear. I am perfectly satisfied with it, and would not be deprived of its use for three times the cost of it."—Hon. Jacob McGuire, Mowroe, La.

"On the recommendation of a friend, I procured, a month since, one of your Family Sewing Machines. My family has been most successful in its use from the start, without any trouble or difficulty whatever in its management. My wife says it is a 'family blessing,' and would not be induced to dispense with its use—in all of which I most heartily concur."—James Pollock, Ex-Governor of Pennsylvania.

Perry Davis's
Vegetable
Pain Killer.

We beg to call the attention of the public to this long tested and valuable

Family Medicine.

The Pain Killer is a purely vegetable compound; and while it is a most efficient remedy for Pain, it is a perfectly safe medicine even in the most unskilful hands.

The Pain Killer

is considered by the attendants it has unrivaled. A few doses will relieve the severest cases of Indigestion,

and it is often a perfect cure for

Dyspepsia

in its most aggravated forms. Its tonic and stimulating properties arouse the system to vigorous action, render it a most efficient cure for

Coughs and Colds,

when used according to directions.

For external application it is unsurpassed by any medical preparation known.

Rheumatism

and Neuralgic Affections are quickly relieved and often cured by it. Any soreness in the muscles or joints can be relieved by its application. It cures instantly the most violent

Toothache.

It should always be kept near at hand, to be used in cases of severe

Burns or Scalds.

If applied immediately, according to directions, it will give instant relief and prevent blistering.

Directions accompany each bottle.

It has been tested in every variety of climate, and by almost every nation. It is the utmost constant companion of the sailor, the miner, the backwoodsman and the traveler—and no family should be without one should travel on our lakes or rivers without it.

NUTTING TIME.

THE nuts are ripe and the day is fine,
The purple hills in the sunlight shine,
And the brown nuts redden the trembling tops
Of each gnarled tree in the hazel copse.

The copse is filled with the happy noise
Of laughing girls and climbing boys,
And the beaten branches yield their fruit
That heavily drops at each old tree's root.

Under the brow of the copse-crowned hill,
Ethel and I sit silent and still,
And I hold in mine her small white hand,
The smallest and whitest in all the land.

Gather your fruit, ye lads above,
And fling the nuts at the girls you love:
The only fruit that to me was dear
I have gathered to-day in the white hand here.

THE ENTRY INTO NAPLES.

HE came! not with the pomp of state,
With bayonets flashing round him;
But in the broad glare of the day,
Where frantic thousands filled the way,
And hopeful, knelt to weep and pray,
We found him.

He came! not as a conqueror comes,
With rattling drum and clashing sabre,
But like an angel from the skies,
With form erect and flashing eyes,
He stood, clothed in the simple guise
Of labor.

He came! as Heaven's own chosen king,
His throne a trampled nation,
Claiming no power but such as came
From the great glory of his name—
No weak or meretricious fame,
No station.

Out rang the vivas fierce and long,
Made louder by each patriot's wrong,
And manly shout joined woman's song,
Where Marinella's half-crazed throng
Hailed freed Italia's son.
'Twas noon, high noon, along the way,
And sunlight danced upon the bay;
The shouting thousands swayed and swung,
A hundred bells the chorus rang;
And Naples, mad from fear and doubt,
Screamed forth the hero's welcome shout,
Screamed forth the hope so long deferred
With every long forbidden word:

"UNA—UNA—UNA—VIVA!
DEATH AND HELL TO THE DECEIVER!
VOGLIAMO, VIVA, VIVA!
GOD'S GREAT GRACE TO THE ACHIEVER!"

Calm and unmoved amid the whole,
With eyes that shadowed forth the soul,
The patriot hero stood.
Cry upon cry has rent the air,
But still the self-same words are there:
Viva Garibaldi!
Una—vogliamo, l'Italie—una!

Night falls, the deep-mouthed cannons boom
Their notes of freedom through the gloom,
And from a thousand hands and throats
The wildering music swells and floats.
Along the gay Toledo's pave
The joy-mad crowd their greeting's rave,
And banners flash upon the night,
And torches shed a mid-day light,
Unvailing every hideous sight.
The beggar jostles with the lord,
The master with the man,
The wearer breaks the tyrant's sword,
And kisses where he can.

Still high above the crash of all,
The song is loud and clear—
Above the cannon, bells, and shouts,
It breaks upon the ear:
Viva, viva Garibaldi!
Vogliamo, l'Italia!
Una—una—una—viva!
God's great grace to the achiever.

White-armed women, heaving breasted,
Fiery eyed, and voiced aloud,
Half of flowing robes divested,
Wander through the surging crowd,
Singing loud,
Viva, viva Garibaldi!

Far along the Marinella,
Through the night the cries still ring,
Echoed from Largo Castello,
To the palace of the King
Still they ring,
Viva, viva Garibaldi!
Saver of his native land;
Vogliamo, l'Italia,
Una—una—una—viva!

NAPLES, Sept. 8, 1860.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE OF WALES AT THE TOMB OF WASHINGTON, OCTOBER, 1860.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE PRINCE AT THE TOMB OF WASHINGTON.

On the preceding page the reader will find a picture of one of the most striking scenes of the Prince's tour through this country—his visit to the Tomb of Washington at Mount Vernon. The Herald reporter, to whose reports we are so constantly indebted, thus describes the scene:

"The day was all that could be desired—the finest that the Indian summer could give. Having carefully inspected the house, the Prince stood reverently uncovered in the room in which Washington died, looked at the plate which he presented to Mr. Lewis, and examined the key of the Bastile presented to Washington by Lafayette. The party expressed their gratification at the old mansion and its contents, and left the apartments of the place, and then proceeded to the Tomb of Washington.

"The Italian band had already arrived, and, concealed by a neighboring thicket, began playing a dirge composed by Mozart. The scene was solemn and impressive. The party, with uncovered heads, ranged themselves in front of the tomb, the people yet on ground in the cemetery, and looked in through the iron-grated door at the sarcophagus which contains the remains of the Father of his country. Then retiring a few paces, the Prince, the President, and the royal party, grouped in front, silently contemplated the tomb of Washington.

"The occasion will become historical. A sad cloud suddenly and unlighted, the quiet, solemn strains of the beautiful dirge floated around, bringing unconscious tears to eyes unused to weep. Without regal state reverently contemplated the last abode of one who, though once pronounced a rebel and a traitor by the very statesmen of Britain, became above all kings—the Father of a Country second to none.

"Around were the representatives of that old colonel, which once struggled against every injustice of power, now doing homage to the great representative republican. Beside the President were those who, in the days of battle between England and this country, had taken a not unprominent part, while he himself had once been arrayed against the very country whose future ruler was now his honored guest. Without lessons all must have learned from this visit—what thoughts must have occurred to each—how forcibly must have felt that, short and brief as God reigns supreme, ordering events for his own wise purposes, and working miracles, not, as once, by his instantaneous fiat, but by the slower process of time.

"At the request of the Mount Vernon Association, the Prince planted, with but little formality, a young horse chestnut tree, to commemorate his visit to the place. The tree was planted upon a beautiful little mound, not far from the tomb.

"The ceremony being over, the party again stood for a few moments before the tomb, and then, turning away in thoughtful silence, slowly and silently retrace their way to the Mansion House, which during their absence had been transformed, by means of canvas and gay flags, into a beautiful dining saloon, with covers laid for the entire party.

THE CASE OF THE ARTISANS' BANK

THE contingency to which we referred in a late number as remotely possible has actually occurred—the Artisans' Bank has stopped payment. Fortunately for the city, the municipal moneys had been previously transferred to a stronger institution—the Park Bank. On Saturday afternoon, 29th September, the Chamberlain left his own safe safely effected that transfer. On Monday afternoon, 1st October, the Artisans' Bank decided to suspend payment. It was, as the boys say, "touch and go." Rumor, indeed, asserts that when the Chamberlain insisted on the transfer, the Artisans' Bank found it necessary to meet his choice, and that the Park Bank solved the difficulty by re-discounting the discounted paper of the Artisans' to a large amount. However this may be, it is certain, we believe, that the city money is at the present time out of danger, and that nothing has been lost by the failure of the Artisans' Bank.

Two reflections are naturally suggested by the Providential escape. The first is, that it is no fault of Mayor Wood's that the city has not lost a million or more by the Artisans' Bank. When he removed Mr. Stout and appointed Mr. Platt chamberlain of the city, he must have known the condition of the Artisans' Bank. There were many reasons why he should have known it. The banker of experience was in doubt on the subject. The capital of the Artisans' was too small for so heavy an account, and that, small as it was, was known to be impaired. Mr. Platt is a merchant and not a banker; no word has been uttered in our hearing against his integrity; but Mr. Platt was not versed in the matter, and any bank officer of some years' standing could have supplied Mayor Wood with other reasons, independent of those we have mentioned, for not transferring the city account to the Artisans' Bank. In the face of all this, the account was transferred; Mr. Platt was appointed by the Mayor and confirmed by the aldermen with a haste which in itself was suspicious. Is it matter of wonder that people should whisper to such strange tales of corrupt discounts and gross bribery?

Another point which presents itself in the new light in which these transactions place the city account. When the city deposits were in the Mechanics' Bank, and subsequently in the Shoe and Leather, the public believed that they were placed there solely for the sake of safety. Nor was that belief ill founded. When, some years ago, a Mayor of the city—we do not say that it was the same functionary who now fills that office—sent for the City Chamberlain, and suggested that he needed a small loan—less than $10,000—that officer calmly informed him that the Mechanics' Bank could accommodate him with the money, on receipt of negotiable paper. In those days the city account was not—like the Roman Empire—sold to the highest bidder. Times are changed now, if there be any basis for the rumors which are in every man's mouth. If common report is to be believed, the Artisans' Bank might have survived every thing but the insatiable greed of the corporation blood-suckers. And who knows what it has cost the Park Bank to keep the account? The Shoe and Leather Bank is said to have saved money by losing it.

These city deposits, unless some change be made, will come to be regarded as one of those fatal gifts which destroy their recipient. No bank can hold them without being open to a suspicion of favoritism and those corruptly, and of retaining them by practices which can not but be hurtful to the credit of any financial institution.

THE ITALIAN NUT CRACKED.

WHEN last we wrote on the question of Italy, we observed that the great difficulty was to know what to do with the Pope. Nobody cares about taking the responsibility of attacking him in the Vatican; and yet, so long as he stays there, it is evident that the Italian question will remain unsettled. Our latest intelligence encourages the hope that the question may be settled by the Pope running away.

Garibaldi has driven most of the Papal States, with the exception of Rome, Ancona, Civita Vecchia, and a small region round Rome, was in the possession of the Revolutionists. Ancona had been bombarded and was preparing to surrender; the advance of Garibaldi from the south, and Cialdini from the north, upon Rome, could not be stayed. What, then, could the Pope do under the circumstances? He has ten thousand, and is promised other ten thousand Frenchmen to guard him; but an army of forty thousand can not protect him if the Italian army attacks Rome. At least forty thousand would be required to keep the peace there, and the Vatican against the people of Rome itself. As to resisting an outside foe, the thing is out of the question. What could the Zouaves do to throw an overwhelming force into Rome. To this he can not do.

The probability is that the problem will be solved by the Pope running away and leaving the city of Rome open to Garibaldi. It would be a most happy solution of the difficulty.

Some rumors are afloat that there is a difference of opinion between Garibaldi and Cavour. It has long been known that the great Free Captain and the Wily Statesman did not absolutely each other. Garibaldi was a failure in the Sardinian Chambers; Cavour never appreciated the unprecedented merits of Garibaldi. But it is not likely that the dispute will be attended with any fatal consequences. The Italian movement is now fairly on foot, and neither Garibaldi nor Cavour is essential to its success. Both might disappear, and it would still go on. If the Pope can be disposed of, we shall hear very little of the wranglers of minor agents in the drama.

A HOPE FOR AFRICA.

OF all parts of the world Africa is the one which, for several centuries, has been the most discouraging to optimists, and the most saddening to lovers of humanity. Civilization first dawned—to the best of our knowledge—on the banks of the Nile. When England and France were howling wilderness the region which we call Algeria was the home of a thrifty, agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing race. Time was, we are told, when the whole of the torrid realms of the King of Dahomey were of mercantile importance, and Phœnician traders found it pay to forget every thing by the guidance of their sun-dials, round Cape Verde and even the Cape of Good Hope. But these are almost forgotten times. For centuries Africa has been a torment to travellers. Nothing but sickness, good has come out of it, and it has taken nothing in. To philanthropists and statesmen it has presented a problem which defies solution, and used it to prove theories of the relative power of the various races of mankind; while theologians and reformers have given up proving its unhappy condition as a proof of the efficacy of the curse of Ham.

Now, however, there seems to be a dawn of light in the darkness of the African horizon. For some years some of the bravest and best men in the civilized world have devoted their lives to the discovery of the African problem. The continent has been triangulated; our maps of the interior will very soon be complete. Livingstone has sailed up the Zambesi; Burton has forced his way through the Somal country nearly to the Mountains of the Moon; Barth has elaborately studied and depicted Lake Tsad and its vicinity; Du Chaillu has explored the equatorial region; the French are energetically prosecuting researches toward the sources of the Nile and the upper waters of the Senegambia; while English expeditions in the south and up the Niger are likely to leave nothing unexplored in those most interesting regions.

That Africa has a future no one who believes in God's providence and the eternal wisdom can for a moment maintain can question; and, in the age of material progress, there seems to be a possibility that that future may at least be dimly discerned. There is more life in African trade people generally are aware. They have a railroad at last, and, despite the hostile opposition of the English, the Suez Canal will soon be a reality. The Emperor of the French has just taken the first step toward the guidance of material development which he has formed for that part of his dominions. He has elsewhere shown his skill in the sinking of systems of artesian wells through the desert, and some of the most learned men in France are busily employing their skill and geography of the country with a view to improved systems of agriculture. In Senegal great progress has been made since the establishment of the Empire; St. Louis has now a trade of some four million francs per annum. In the south and southeast Great Britain is laboring with equal vigor. Another year will settle the cotton question finally; and, even should it be settled against the production of the staple in Africa, new regions may be found for export of Caffre corn. Africa will be opened to Christianity and civilization. Thus, on every side, there is at least an awakening from the sleep in which the continent of Africa has been plunged since the first spread of Christianity.

THE END OF WALKER.

WE record, in another column, the end of the filibuster Walker. No one regrets that he has received the merited penalty of his repeated infractions of law and sacrifices of life and property. He lived by the sword, and by the sword he has perished—as he deserved. One may pity him, as one may pity any wrong-doer who is justly chastised; but no one can say that, in his case, the punishment was undeserved or inappropriate, or that the world would have been a gainer had he escaped his doom. Mankind and civilization have no pity in his case.

At the same time public opinion will not justify the conduct of Commander Salmon, of the British navy, who betrayed Walker into the hands of the Hondurenos. We have not the details of the filibuster's capture. He surrendered to Commander Salmon, of her Britannic Majesty's Navy. He became a prisoner to the English, not to the Hondurenos. Commander Salmon claimed his sword, not as an agent of Honduras, but as a British officer; and on these terms he received it. Alvarez, and the other Honduras officials, Walker would doubtless have declined to surrender to him as a British officer that Walker gave himself up. And Commander Salmon no sooner had him in his power than he surrendered him to the Hondurans without any trial.

Commander Salmon had better resign the commission he holds, and seek employment in the service of the Pasha of Egypt, or some other business which requires no exercise of honor or conscience. He is evidently out of place in the British Navy. British naval officers are generally believed to be men of honor and spirit; Commander Salmon can not feel at home among them. By surrendering his commission, and devoting his energies to some disreputable pursuit—such as nature intended him for—he will probably forestall the action of the British Admiralty, which will doubtless remove him without delay.

He has had the glory of betraying to his death one of the most daring-headed but bravest men of the age. It is time now that he retire on his laurels. A meaner act than his can not be found in history.

THE LOUNGER.

THE NEW SENSATION.

THAT is to say, M. Berger, the French billiard-player. In the midst of the utmost public excitement in a Republican election, M. Berger has actually made himself conspicuous. He has received the homage of amateurs of the game, of its artists, and of publishers. He has also lodges his cocked repention with a peculiar eloquence possible only to the French genius. Not only does it impress the eye, but it affects the ear. It delights the critical billiard-player. His game, in fact, seems to have the same kind of effect that Rossini's music has.

A pleasant party assembled to verify the credentials of his fame, under the auspices of our own hero of the cue, Phelan. The party found M. Berger the most frank of Frenchmen, enjoying his own successes with the utmost good nature. Before beginning the exhibition of his skill, M. Berger made a speech. Does any body think that American are peculiarly speech-makers? Listen, then, to the champion of the green baize and the shining balls.

"Gentlemen, in seeing here the élite of a great nation, I experience a double pride.

"The man receives his part of it; the artist his.

"Let Ducks be rendered to your celebrated Professor Phelan, who, by his great talent, has habituated intelligence to honor the career of billiards.

"I thank you then sincerely, gentlemen, and pray you to accord me some minutes of attention, enough to comprehend my thought and to transmit it to your innumerable readers."

"I come to America as a brother in billiards, not as a champion.

"Explain, I pray you, my thought to your readers, and I shall be very happy.

"The American game is different from the French: each is difficult, as you will presently see. The American game is executed by Mr. Phelan with the greatest ease of extraordinary talent, and he surpasses all that I have hitherto seen of that game.

"It is not, then, astonishing that you should accord to Mr. Phelan so much sympathy, for he is as good a billiardist as he is a great artist. I declare, with happiness, that I have been received by Phelan as a gentleman and friend, and I am happy to announce it to all America.

"Mr. Phelan, with the strongest players in the United States, have offered me the aid of their talent at very exhibitions, the first of which will take place on Monday next, in a hall which I owe to the courtesy of Mr. Phelan."

"On Monday, if my ability corresponds with my ardent desire of pleasing you, I shall fervently execute the finest of billiards to inspire me with the most fantastic combinations, and to vouchsafe to me, for their execution, the most magical and the most confounding effects. Long live America!"

Compare that with the speeches of Mr. Benicia Boy and Mr. Champion Sayers—the bashful nod of the head, and the thick "All right, my boy, we've only professors of the fist! How M. Berger nurses his wrist! How he circlingly lets fly at his adjectives! Do you wonder that, under the spell of his speech, one of the gentlemen who watched the game that followed describes it as "Berger" it? Mr. Phelan plays from the mind: M. Berger plays from the heart. That is the game of judgement: this of inspiration. The one of intellect and the poetry. As Berger himself defines it—he sculptures, he ornamentals. . . . . Players in this country will certainly revive the latent romance of the billiard-room, and recruits will flock to the table under the influence of the genius inspired with something of his own gallant and poetic spirit."

Bless! play is marvelous. He makes balls run along the top of the cushion, then descend, and caroom. He caroms into a hat; upon another table; and, presently, into the next room. Whatever is wonderful and unexpected and impossible, he does. So unprecedented always—sometimes not until after several trials. Therein he seems to fall below Bloodin, who never fails at all, but executes his tours at once. M. Berger's ordinary game is understood to be worthy his extraordinary power; and in a country so devoted to the billiard his progress will be a triumphant as that of Bloodin along his rope, of the Prince through his colonies, and of Mr. Douglas to his mother. Long live the Billiard!

THE TIMES OF TOM AND JERRY.

LAST week having a sly glance in advance at the next number of the Cornhill, the Lounger helped his readers with a wonderful to some of Thackeray's gossip about the Times of George Fourth, and the England of thirty-five and forty years ago. Here is a little more about the novels of that time:

"For our amusements, besides the games in vogue, which were pretty much in old times as they are now (except cricket, which was unknown), we had recourse to the play of their bowling, and suppose Armstrong and Whitworth will meet at times, and bowl to the fields of each, there was novels —oh! I trouble you to find such novels in the present day! Peregrine Pickle, didn't we swop over it! Mr. Mysterious of Lisle, didn't I and Briggs minor drive pictures out of you, as I have said?

* * * * * * *

"Novels indeed, but still giving pleasure to us and our friends. 'I say, old boy, draw us Vivaldi tortured in the Inquisition,' we 'Drew us Don Quixote and the windmills you know,' another would say, to keep us both at love of drawing. 'Peregrine Pickle' we liked, our fathers reading it, too, and laughing at the plot and boys' it was equal fun; but I think I was rather bewildered by it, though Bartolo Random was our favorite hero of all. Don't remember having Sterne in the school library, no doubt because the rector had drawn over the passages full decked for young people. Ah! not against thy genius, oh, father of Uncle Toby and Trim, would I say a word in disrespect. But I am thankful for my own share in that we longer have the temptation to write so as to call illusion on vows, novels, and would almost as eager about the allusion to honest boys. Then, above all, we had Walter Scott, the kindly, the manly, the pure—the companion of what remedies delightful hours; the purveyor of how much happiness; the friend of whom we think as the greatest benefactor of our youth! How well I remember the type and the broadish paper of the old duodecimo 'Tales of My Landlord'! I am sorry for them, sakes they in their time have found their romancer—their charming Schehera-zade Bydlo—my! what a row when you are writing, and who is the favorite novelist in the fourth form now? Have you got any thing so good and kindly as dear Miss Edgeworth's 'Frank?' It used to belong to a fellow's sisters generally; but though he pretended to despise it, and said, 'Oh, stuff for girls!' he read it; and I think there were one or two grownups which would try my eyes now, were I to meet with the little book."

Of one of the most famous books-about-town of that day, "Tom and Jerry," Thackeray says:

"As for Thomas and Jeremiah (it is only my witty way of calling Tom and Jerry), I went to the British Museum the other day on purpose to get it; but somehow, if you will press the question so closely, on reperusal, Tom and Jerry is not so brilliant as I had supposed it to be. The pictures are just as fine as ever; and I shook hands with Bobadil, Corinthian Tom, and Jerry himself, with infinite delight, after many years' absence. But the style of the writing, I grew, was not pleasing to me; I even thought it a little vulgar—well! well! other writers have been considered vulgar—and as a description of the sports and amusements of London in the ancient times, more curious than amusing.

But the pictures!—oh! the pictures are noble still! First, there is Jerry arriving from the country, in a great coat and leather gaiters, and being measured for a fashionable suit at Corinthian House, by Corinthian Tom's tailor. That scene is the cut of professional gentlemen. The punk! delicious excitement—the theatre! the debauch! the gentlemen! supper-house life—the watch! (well! I like then perhaps to Temple Bar, to knock down a Charley there! There is Jerry and Tom, with their hats cocked, little cocked hats, coming from the opera—very much as gentlemen in waiting on royalty are habited now, except that they are not, indeed, amidst a crowd of high-bred personages, with the Duke of Clarence himself looking at them dancing. Now, strange change, there is Queen Victoria parlor, where they don't seem to be a with him at home than in England before his! and there is Prince Albert Newgate, seeing the irons knocked off the malefactors' legs previous to execution. What hardened ferocity in the countenance of the despondent to yellow treachs! What composure in the nose of the gentleman in black velvet, whose legs have been forging, and who clasps his hands, and listens to the chaplain! Now we know every lineament in Tattersall's ring, and the whole assemblage what a funny fellow that actor was who performed Dicky Gossip in that scene at the play!); and we are at sea in a private party, at which Corinthian Tom is writing card to the ground floor, as pretty as most country houses in Kent, while Bob Logic, the Oxonian, is playing on the piano.

"Here, for instance, is a specimen of their talk and wells. "If you please, I'll engineer it myself, and then you may make the most of an evening at Vauxhall, more than at any other place in the metropolis. I'll be with you every day. Stay as long as you like, and depart when you think proper. Consider me your knight in shining armor," replied Jerry, 'that I do not care how soon the time arrives for me to start.' Logic propounded a 'bit of a strife' in order to get rid of an hour or two, which was immediately accepted by Tom and Jerry. As two or two in the afternoon, a stroll through Vauxhall, a look in at Tattersall's, a return through Pall Mall, and a street on the Corinthian path, fully occupied the time of our heroes until they sat down to dinner arrived, when a few glasses of Tom's rich wine soon put them in the best vein. Vauxhall was then the object in view, and the Trio started, bent upon enjoying the pleasures which this place so amply affords."

MR. GOUGH.

The effect produced by the famous Temperance orator upon his audiences is a curious study. The narration of the broad impression of the purely dramatic style of oratory. It is another tribute to the influence of the power of the drama. Mr. Gough is not a thinker—he is an actor. His pictures of the misery of intemperance, in its many stages, are drawn in vivid and thrilling that the spell over the audience is that of the most emotional actor. The effect is immediate and immense, but it is a mere temporary because it has no intellectual root.

When Sheridan had finished his speech in the Warren Hastings trial, and when Macaulay sat down in the last days of the last Legislative Assembly of Louis Philippe, after an attack upon the Government, it was moved that the House adjourn, that they might not legislate or judge under the effect of strong passion. But the real effects are akin to these. He sweeps all before him, except the passionless reason. That may coincide the judicial of his cause, but it does not before he begins. It is not affected by his funny or tragical anecdotes.

Somebody said, "Let of an eloquent speech be had heard the night before; "and I will tell you what he said." "Stop, stop!" exclaimed Fox, "if you can tell me what he said, it was not an eloquent speech." Measured by Fox's standard, Mr. Gough's eloquence is not great. But it is to be reported and read, the wonder of those who listened and yielded to its charm would be amusing.

For its immediate purpose of persuading his hearers to sign the pledge nothing can be more admirably suited than this extraordinary style of speech. The man who has long seen the curse of the dram-shop sees the final effect of his passion upon himself and his family depicted with such power before his eyes—forced home upon his imagination so that it haunts him and frightens him—he will not stay to reason or dally, but will rush and seize the pen, as if the signature of his name had secured him against temptation itself. A man who has this power over others, and exerts it for their welfare and the peace of society, is certainly a human benefactor. Before this tremendous temperation his comparative claims as an orator disappear, and only the man whom other generations will bless remains.

THE EDITORIAL BUND.

Any philosophic Lounger who reads the papers regularly must often feel disposed to remind them of an invariable rule, namely, that familiarity breeds contempt. If you print every thing you publish, capitals presently cease to be impressive. If you "double lead," and crowd with all kinds of exclamation points, every other kind of point is inevitably lost. When every possible event is a tremendous forerunner of tremendous consequences nobody believes in any thing tremendous. You have defeated your own purpose.

Moreover, it is well sometimes to remember that the people of this country are tolerably intelligent, and know a little of their own affairs. Being thus intelligent, when their neighbor, who survives by creating excitements and sensations, thrusts into his paper an article bristling with interjections and solemn warnings and lugubrious prophecies, the good people smile at the effort of their worthy neighbor, and congratulate him upon his enterprise in trade. But as to being frightened by his terrific performance—that is another thing. They see the innocent face of Soup the Juicer behind this fearful rearing and raging lion; and they know that the active little Soup is doing a sly bit of business strictly in the line of his trade.

When Soup informs us that the terrible running off the track of the Sniggville freights and accommodation train is but a sign in advance of the total ruin of the wheat crop, and prints it all in leaded lines and capitals, it would have an alarming appearance, and inspire terror for five minutes, except for the consoling fact that Soup has printed us to the same dish any time these ten years. We can't get up the appetite, with the best will in the world. Thank you, we had such a large piece yesterday that, really, you must excuse us. And Soup, after all, is not the only or the principal one you might suppose, for in the very same paper which contains the woeful prediction he proudly announces the important between ours and the wheat-fields of all the world.

Be moderate, therefore, in your pleasures, you elders of the land, for you are the vulgar, not the strip! There is going to be some great treat, yet.

THE AMERICAN NOVEL.

To the second edition of Mr. Lowell's "Pictures of Life and Character," there is one which represents good little boy just entering the dentist's dreadful door. At the top some impertinent critic has inscribed number one says to naughty street-boy number two,

"Oh! I wouldn't be 'im. Won't there be a scr-s-s-w-u-n-c-h in neither?"

That is the expression which naturally arises to the American mind when the American book about to be judged by John Bull, Doctor of Literary Law. He look deserves the profoundest of all compassionate souls. Won't there be a scr-s-w-u-n-c-h neither!

That process is held to be good for the mouth and for the general system. It is good, we are told in tender years, to go to the dentist. By dint of repeating we are partially assured that the teeth are kept in tolerable order. Doctor Bull has been lately taking an entire class of Americans in hand for treatment, and his polish-bed the results of his diagnosis. The class is no other than the American novel. Of this class a pair of novels lately published in New York. One of them enjoys very great popular favor at the present time, and has received the most unqualified praise from the papers. As the public knows what it likes and why, it will not be sorry to hear Doctor Bull's opinion of the last specimen of American novel, which includes all offenders of the same kind. Now hear the strong-minded:

"American writers are very susceptible to impression from the books they read, but they are not able to absorb and assimilate something more substantial. Their habit of fiction are in the transitional stage of wishing to imitate the works which have caused them pleasure—to reproduce, without digesting, the nourishment they derive from their own souls for inspiration; they are roused by the excitement of others, but their own powers are kept tranquilized into knowledge. When they have to describe a little of class, or to delineate a character, instead of the prefer to do so by a quotation or by an allusion to some passage in another author who has described it before. It is easy. They do not draw simply and truthfully upon their own consciousness of what is. The result of this is an unnatural, artificial manner, which is the more to be condemned in a society where they are not sure of the support of the general. The American novel is to have recently seen new remarkable for their undisciplined force of style, their profusion of richly-colored epithets which are in bad taste to say nothing else of their want of finish, correctness, ellipsis, elegance, of external accuracy, drama, and decorum. Their language is generally full of high flash of rhetoric, and though sometimes eloquent, is more frequently an unmeaning outgrowth of high-sounding words. There is an evident striving after an ideal, it is true; but that ideal is generally the stuff out of which dreams are made, rather than an effort to catch the 'sense of inward things' stirring in their own soul, and which we feel ourselves to be real light which every man, if he will only watch for it. Instead of the simple utterance of the heart speaking to another, there is a high-flown rhetorique of thoughts and ideas picked up out of books the authors have read and admired. Their style is also influenced the authors seem to be chiefly of the emotional kind. There is little trace of the intellectual power which is to depart from the labor of past years, when to learn was the object, without any further aim than to know. Lately, as I mentioned, are the characteristics of American fiction. It is an unripened fruit—but although there is little more than the rind, a part of it is that of the real—it is present, it may, and we expect will, grow into a better thing. The new works at the head of our critical columns are of a new mark.—Indulge' is something between a French novel and an Miss Sewell's stories—and in which there is a constant strain to be romantic, which the author seems to think consists in giving the hero some slighting reflection on women, and an spurning of every one not revered since some fatal night many years before the story commences. It is an egotistic story, remarkable only for the self-conceit and arrogance of the heroine, who narrates her own history throughout with a complacency which would be a writer and better than every body else in the book. She seems to be written for the sake of letting her commend and makes herself inevitable for so earthly motive, unless it were to torment the worthy man, the hero, to see if she could wear him out. Every body in this book is more or less having loved him all along."

Doctor Bull speaks sapprovingly of the "Household of Bouverie," but not without a great many hits and hints.

A KINGSTON GIRL TO THE YANKEE GIRLS.

A patriotic and indignant "Kingston girl" writes to the Lounger correcting some aspersions, as she thinks them, upon the Princes of Wales. She also says some sharp things about the Orangemen, which the Lounger hopes that body will not remember it worth while to read his correspondent:

"It is stated that his Royal Highness burn into tears (on account at the troubles at Kingston). Now that is not true, Mr. Lounger. He felt very and depressed that circumstances were as they were; but he did not shed a tear on the subject. The story was originated by those dreadful Orangemen, and was not worth repeating. I only take the trouble to contradict it because I do not wish the 'Yankee girls' to think our Prince is such a baby. But the Duke of Newcastle—oh! Mr. Lounger, let them look out for him; he is so handsome the Princes is sweet. Only think, when we went out in boats and tried to catch a glimpse of the Royal young lion, having never seen one in a state of freedom, we scarcely alone him to come out on the deck of the Kingston to answer the cheers of thousands who were not those obnoxious Orangemen, hoping you will see that his error is corrected, I remain,

"Yours sincerely, A KINGSTON GIRL."

THE RIGHTS OF RAILROAD OFFICERS.

Two or three weeks since the Lounger published a somewhat peevish note from a traveler who thought he had been unduly used by the officers of some railroad, and the Lounger added a little moralising. To-day he has a reply to the very point. It reminds him of the "traveling public" that they have duties as well as the officers of the railroads, and that the man outside the office should be as patient and polite as the man inside. Yes, and even more so, if you press the point, because the insider is supposed to be identified for his shortcomings; but the outsider may swell and swear and bully, and then shelter himself in his character of "Railroader" has a great deal of right upon his side.

QUINCY, ILLINOIS, Sept. 1860.

DEAR MR. LOUNGER,—In your column to-day you receive a dash at railroad ticket agents, and you intimate that such dashing is frequently submit to be bored and reduced by every body has no business in such a situation.

Signed L. GRIMES.

Yesterday a man, who looked as though he ought to have been a gentleman, presented to your humble servant a railroad ticket, and observed the following he replies three repeated and several times within the space of fifteen minutes.

Q. "What time does the next train leave for Chicago?"

A. "Half past five and ten minutes."

Q. "Isn't there any train sooner than that?"

A. "No, Sir."

Q. "What time does it get there?"

A. "At six o'clock in the morning."

Q. "What time is it now?" (N.B. Individual standing facing a large railroad clock.)

A. "Five minutes to."

Q. "How long before the train starts?"

A. "Two hours and a half."

Q. "What's the fare?"

A. "Eight dollars."

Q. "Can't you give me a ticket for less? I shall get no change."

A. "Eight dollars is the lowest rate."

He finally went away intimating he didn't believe a word I said.

My equanimity was unruffled this time, but I am not fully responsible for it. I was in a very comfortable way to say when similar or more provoking scene so astonished me that I forgot the rule which I am acquainted.

Now where is the son of Adam who will blame a ticket agent for "cutting up" when lower circumstances?

Mr. Lounger desires to know what would be your frame of mind under similar and oft-repeated inflictions.

The truth is that the duties of the traveling public are agreeable persons, but a portion of them are any thing but. Traveling is a wearing, irritating business, and so many persons are disposed to relieve the monotony by venting their ill-humor upon officials.

Railroaders are not more tempered than any other class of men, while they are subject to more provocations.

Please to redirect upon this side of the question a little, my friend. Very truly, your friend,

"RAILROADER."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

LADIES' HUNTING SONG.

BRIGHT MAIDELIE skips like a fawn,
Green from the lawn is torn;
Ps cheeks his fan to frequent yawn,
Ps eyes to scorn.

Calm round the handsome Colonel
To wish that sparkling eye.
He wins his way with easy swing
To win his ardent sigh.

With a high-bred, courtly mien
Albi sir glance, I win—he
Still spies Julia the Queen.

Those girls in tall and thin—he
Who likes this shy
Though loud I play.

"Good-by, sweet, good-by!"
With tuneful art I grace my song
To wake the sleeping dogs.

In fancied wreath of hazel crowned
I mark his bow so pale,
And there in the meadow reserved
For thereby hangs a tale.
Some white rose in his button-hole strong,
He'd for his country die;
Let martial airs be the song of my song
To win his ardent sigh.

With a high-bred, courtly mien
Albi sir glance, I win—he
Still spies Julia the Queen.

Poor me! why did my heart adore
A hero in gilded lace,
I'll be a silly no more,
But hide my burning face.
Girls! if you'll be my friends, my song
Some other measure try.
And learn your hearts to bring home from song
To win a Queen's sigh.

With a high-bred, courtly mien, etc.

SENSIBLE POPPET.—A blasphemous rogue of a Roman Catholic priest at Naples attempted to create a diversion in favor of Francis II. by the base method of getting up a miracle, consisting in the perspiration of an image meant for the Virgin. The trick was found out, and the thing exposed; as will, let us hope, the bursting of the Bomba fiction of the Pope's Zouaves, who have set the object of the priest at rest. But the statue, beyond that of true Bourbon and alarm among the Leonardi, it is a place where even the Virgin's prodigy would not have only be interpreted into a hint to the Bourbon that Naples was getting rid of the Pope, or else to consider where he expected to go to, lest his ultimate destination should be a place where even the Virgin's sweat, as the poet in "Macbeth" says, have to "sweat for it."

THE WORLD KNOWN NOTHING OF ITS GREATEST MEN.—The man who invented the cochineal cactus and the aniline is left in the fogs of obscurity—such is the base ingratitude of this world!—may be said to be almost as great a man as Harvey; it is true that the latter genius discovered the circulation of the blood, but how! in the invention of the former tended more than any thing else to promote the circulation of the Bottle?

"I did so," promptly answered the witness.

"Well, Sir, that is direct at all events. Now, Sir, will you tell me, in as brief a way as possible, what motive induced you to do so?"

"The bro-motive, to be sure."

"This advice seems very much like telling me to wash myself," said the patient.

"Why, sir," said Abernethy, "it may be open to such a construction."

The Sunderland Rifle Corps marched to Rhyope the other evening, accompanied, as is usual upon on similar occasions, by numbers of young ladies. One of the gallant volunteers, addressing a fair friend, pointed to, putting his arm round the taper waist of one of the young ladies, and said instantly stood to order by Corporal Down—"Private Smith," he said, "Government ain't going to keep you with arms for that purpose." THE LATE GENERAL WALKER.

WE publish herewith, as matter of history, the portrait of the famous filibuster Walker, who was executed in Honduras on 12th ult. His life has been eventful and romantic.

He was only thirty-six years old when he died. Born at Nashville, Tennessee, in 1824, he was bred a lawyer; his father, a Scotch banker, occupied a prominent position in society, and enjoyed the respect of the community in which he lived. The son was a scape-grace. He failed as a lawyer; tried medicine, and achieved no particular success in that profession; finally fell back on the press, and so, in 1851, at the dawn of civilization on the Pacific slope, he looms up as the editor of a paper at San Francisco.

It seems likely that the unsettled and turbulent temper of the people with whom he lived shaped the uncertain aspirations of William Walker. He had not been very long in California, and was dealing a good business, when he suddenly crossed the frontier, and, squatting on some unoccupied land in Northern Mexico, proclaimed "an independent Republic of Lower California." This farce did not last long. There was a stir among the Mexican authorities, and an appearance of vigilance among the United States troops; but the point of the struggle was that the "independent Republic" and her newly-constituted rulers had nothing to ent. Walker surrendered himself and his party to a representative of the United States, went through the form of a trial, and was promptly acquitted. At that day filibusterism was all the rage.

Not cast by experience, but rather encouraged by the sympathy his not very glorious exploits had won, Walker two years afterward undertook his second filibustering affray. The Democrats of Nicaragua offered him twenty thousand acres of land to lead on their side against the aristocratic party. A similar offer led Sir De Lacy Evans to fight against the Carlists in Spain, General Gayon to take a command in the Hungarian army of independence, Lord Cochrane to take a leading command in South America; Lafayette and Steuben fought for less in the United States, General Church was satisfied with less in Greece, Colonel Upton in Siam. General Walker made some further stipulations on behalf of his men, then chartered his vessel.

Five years ago last May that vessel, the Vesta, lay in the harbor of San Francisco, with General Walker and fifty-six men on board. She was under seizure. A deputy-sheriff's officer had possession. At midnight on Monday, the 4th May, Walker requested the sheriff's officer to step below to examine some documents in the cabin. The unsuspecting official complied. The door shut, he was informed that he was a prisoner.

"There, Sir," said Walker, in a slow, drawling voice, "are cigars and Champagne; and there are handcuffs and irons. Pray take your choice."

The deputy, a sensible man, took the former, and was in a very happy frame of mind when he was put on board the steam-tug to be taken back to the scene of his official duties. In the mouth of June General Walker arrived in Nicaragua. The Serviles were prepared in force to resist him; he fought a battle every three weeks. The capture of Granada was quickly followed by the massacre at Virgin Bay, and the necessary inauguration of General Walker's power in Nicaragua.

In the course of a short while a treaty of peace was signed between the contending forces; a native named Patricio Rivas was appointed President, and Walker General-in-chief of the army. This was the culminating moment of Walker's career. He held real power in the Government of Nicaragua, Rivas being simply his tool. He had a free transit route in full operation, which brought him hundreds of immigrants every month. Great Britain and the United States, sick of the unsuccessful endeavors of the Spanish Americans to establish stable governments, were both ready to recognize and support him. In this country especially every one was in his favor; he could have obtained money and men to any extent on a mere requisition. Finally, there is reason to believe that the best people in Nicaragua were fascinated by his brilliant success, and really believed that he was destined to be the regenerator of their country.

All this fair edifice of present power and future prospects Walker now proceeded deliberately to destroy. He shot Corral, his old foe, the head of the Serviles—a Central American gentleman of high standing—charging him with having plotted against the government they had combined together to establish. He revived, without cause, the transit grant to the Nicaragua Company, and seized steamers belonging to American citizens, thereby shutting himself and his new country out from the world, and closing the door to immigration. He made war upon Costa Rica, and managed matters so badly that his troops were beaten at the first encounter. He lost patience with Rivas, dismissed him, and usurped the Presidency. From that moment to the close of the Nicaragua campaign his history was one of defeat, disaster, disappointment, and distress. The Nicaraguans and Costa Ricans combined against him; drove him from place to place, and at last so beleaguered him that, had it not been for the presence of an American shop of war, which received him and his followers on board, he must have perished then and there. So ended the second filibustering expedition of Walker.

"WHILE I SCREAMED MURDER IN EVERY LANGUAGE I COULD COMMAND."

THE LATE GENERAL WALKER, THE FILIBUSTER.

The third and fourth expeditions, both directed against Nicaragua, may be briefly disposed of. They were both ill-advised, and ill-planned; they both failed miserably; both would have terminated fatally for Walker and his followers but for the kindly interference of American and British vessels of war.

Walker's fifth and last filibustering raid was originally intended to be prosecuted against the famous Bay Islands which Great Britain is just ceding to Honduras. Several Anglo-Saxon residents of the islands had expressed unwillingness to be handed back to Honduras; Walker saw the opportunity of erecting a new independent empire. Unfortunately for him, Honduras forewarned his gauge, and requested Great Britain to delay the cession of the islands. Thus disappointed, Walker cruised about in the Bay of Honduras for some weeks, literally seeking what he might devour, and finally, to his ruin, fell upon Trujillo. Forced to evacuate this place by the British war vessel Icarus, he was chased to bay by the Hondurenos; and refusing to claim either British or American protection, he died the death of a soldier at the hands of the Honduran authorities. The details of his execution will be found in the news columns.

Walker was undoubtedly a mischievous man, better out of the world than in it. He never displayed any constructive ability; his energies were wholly destructive. He was brave, persevering, and energetic; but he had little or no foresight, no compunctions of honor or conscience, and not a spark of human pity in his breast. His works, from first to last, have been injurious rather than beneficial to the world.

A DAY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

CHAPTER XI.

I TAKE it for granted that all special "charities" have had their origin in some specific suffering. At least I am aver that my first thought on landing at Natal was, Why has no great philanthropist thought of establishing such an institution as a Refuge for the Sea-sick? I declare this publicly, that if I ever become rich—a consummation which, looking to the general gentleness of my instincts, the wide benevolence of my nature, and the kindliness of my temperament, mankind might well rejoice at—if, I repent, I ever become rich, one of the first uses of my affluence will be to endow such an establishment. I will place it in some one of our popular ports, say Southampton.—Surrounded with all the charms of inland scenery, rich in every rustic association, the patient shall never be reminded of the scene of his late sufferings. A velvety turf to stroll on, with a leafy shade above his head, the mellow lowing of cattle in his ears, and the fragrant odors of meadow-sweet and hawthorn around, I would recall the sufferer from the dread memories of the slippery deck, the sea-washed stairs, or the sleepy state-room. For the rattle of cordage, and the hoarse trumpet of the skipper, I would substitute the song of the thrush or the blackbird; and, instead of the thrice odious steward and his basin, I would have trim maidens of nicest pleasing to serve him with syllabubs. I will not go on to say the hundred devices I would employ to cheat memory out of a gloomy record, for I treasure the hope that I may yet live to carry out my theory and have a copyright in my invention.

It was with sentiments deeply tinctured by the above that I tottered, rather than walked, toward the Hotel Royal. It was a bright moonlight night, and, as if in mockery of the weather outside, as still and calm as might be. Many a picturesque effect of light and shade met me as I went: quaint old gables flaring in a strong flood of moonlight showed outlines the strangest and oddest; twinkling lamps shone out of tall, dark-sided old houses, from which strains of music came plaintively enough in the night air; the sounds of a prolonged revel rose loudly out of that deep-pillared chateau-like building in the Place, and in the quiet alley adjoining I could catch the low song of a mother as she tried to sing her baby to sleep. It was all human in every touch and strain of it. And did I not drink it in with rapture? Was it not in a transport of gratitude that I thanked Fortune for once again restoring me to land? "O Earth, Earth!" says the Greek poet, "how art thou interwoven with that nature that first came from thee!" Thus musing, I reached the inn, where, although the hour was a late one, the household was all active and astir.

"Many passengers arrived, waiter?" said I, in the easy, careless voice of one who would not own to sea-sickness.

"Very few, Sir; the severe weather has deterred several from venturing across."

"Any ladies?"

"Only one, Sir; and, poor thing, she seems to have suffered fearfully. She had to be carried from the boat, and when she tried to walk up stairs she almost fainted. There might have been some agitation, however, in that, for she expected some one to have met her here; and when she heard that he had not arrived, she was completely overcome."

"Very sad, indeed," said I, examining the cards for supper.

"Oh yes, Sir; and being in deep mourning, too, and a stranger away for the first time from her country."

I started, and felt my heart bounding against my vest.

"What was it you said about deep mourning, and being young and beautiful?" asked I, eagerly.

"Only the mourning, Sir—it was only the mourning I mentioned; for she kept her veil close down, and would not suffer her face to be seen."

"Bashful as beautiful! modest as she is fair!" muttered I. "Do you happen to know whither she is going?"

"Yes, Sir; her luggage is marked 'Brussels.'"

"It is she! It is herself!" cried I, in rapture, as I turned away, lest the fellow should notice my emotion. "When does she leave this?"

"She seems doubtful, Sir; she told the landlady that she is going to reside at Brussels; but never having been abroad before, she is naturally timid about traveling even so far alone."

"Gentle creature, why should she be exposed to such hazards? Bring me some of this ricandeau with chicory, waiter, and a pint of Beaune; fried potatoes, too. Would that I could tell her to fear nothing!" thought I. "Would that I could just whisper, 'Potts is here; Potts watches over you; Potts will be that friend, that brother, that should have come to meet you! Sleep soundly, and with a head at ease. You are neither friendless nor forsaken?" "I feel I must be naturally a creature of benevolent instincts for I am never so truly happy as when engaged in a work of kindness. Let me but suggest to myself a labor of charity, some occasion to sorrow with the afflicted, to rally the weak-hearted and to succour the wretched, and I am infinitely more delighted than by all the blandishments of what is called "society." Men have their allotted parts in life, yet no certain fruits are meet for certain climates. Mine was the grand comforting line. Nature meant me for a consoler. I have none of those impulsive temperaments which make what are called jolly fellows. I have no taste for those pleasures which go by the name of conviviality. I can, it is true, be witty, anecdotic, and agreeable: I can spice conversation with epigram and illustrate arguments by apt example; but my forte is tenderness.

"In not this veal a little tough, waiter?" said I, in gentle remonstrance.

"Monsieur is right," said he, bowing; "but if a morsel of cold pheasant would be acceptable —mademoiselle, the lady in mourning, has just taken a wing of it—"

"Bring it directly. Oh, ecstasy of ecstasies! We are then, as it were, supping together—served from the same dish! May I have the honor?" said I, filling out a glass of wine and bowing respectfully, and with an air of deep devotion, across the table. The pheasant was exquisite, and I ate with an epicurean enjoyment. I called for another pint of Beaune, too. It was an occasion for some indulgence, and I could not deny myself. No sooner had the waiter left me than I burst into an expansive acknowledgment of my happiness. "Ever," said I, "you are richer in that temperament of yours than if you owned half California. That boundless wealth of kindly instinctive is a real prompting can exhaust. Go on, doing imaginary good forever. You are never the poorer for all the orphans you adopt, all the distressed you relieve. You rescue the mariner from shipwreck, while you mend your feet. You interpose at the head of a squadron without the peril of a scratch. All blessed be the gift which can do these things!"

You call these delusions; but is it a delusion to be a king, to deliver a people from slavery, to carry succour to a drowning crew? If I have done all of these, that is, I have gone through every changeful mood of hope and fear that constantly pursues these actions, sipping my glass of Beaune between whiles.

When I found myself in my bedroom I had no inclination for sleep, I was in a mood of enjoyment too elevated for mere repose. It was no delight of the eye no longer at sea, but rescued from the miseries of the rocking ship and the reeking cabin, that I would not lose the rapture by dozing. I was in the mood for great things, too, if I only knew what they were to be. So, as I thought I, suddenly, I will write to her. She shall know that she is not the friendless and forsaken creature that she deems herself; she shall hear that, though separated from home, friends, and country, there is one near to watch over and protect her; and that Potts deems himself to her second self. I opened my desk, and in all the impatience of my ardor began:

"Q. Madam'—Quere: Ought I to say 'dear?' We are not acquainted, and can I presume upon any sentiment that implies reciprocity? No. I must omit 'dear;' and then 'Madam' looks fearfully stern and rigid, particularly when addressed to a young and unmarried lady; she is certainly not 'Madam' yet, surely. I can't begin 'Miss.' What a language is ours! How cruelly hard to all the tender emotions is a dialect so matter-of-fact and formal! If I could only start with 'Gentilissima Signora' but I would get well. What an impression the words lend me! What 'way on me would they impart for what was to follow! And how cool mental tongue there is nothing for it but the third person: 'The undersigned has the honor,' etc., etc., etc. A chilling,—it is positively repulsive. Let me see, will this do?—

"'The gentleman who has fortunate enough to render you some trivial service at the Milford station two days ago, having accidentally learned that you were alone and unprotected in a spectator, in all humility offers himself to afford you every aid and counsel in his power. No stranger to the touching interests of your life, deeply sensible of the delicacy that should surround your steps, if you deign to accept his devoted services he will endeavor to prove himself, by every sentiment of respect, your most faithful, most humble, and most grateful servant.

"P.S.—His name is Potts.'

"Yes, it will do but the confounded post script. What a terrible bathos—His name is Potts? What if I say: 'One line of reply is requested, addressed to Algernon Sydney Potts, Esq., at this hotel?'

I made a great many copies of this document, always changing something as I went. I felt the importance of every word, and fastidiously pondered over each expression employed. The bright sun of morning broke in at last upon my labors and found me still at my desk, still composing. Alas! I lay down without sleeping.

"Is she gone, waiter?" said I, as he entered my room with hot water. "Is she gone?"

"Who, Sir?" asked he, in some astonishment.

"The lady in black, who came over in the last mail packet from Dover; the young lady in deep mourning, who arrived all alone."

"No, Sir. She has sent all round the hotels this morning to inquire after some one who was to have met her here, but apparently without success."

"Give me this; place it in her own hand, and as you are leaving the room say, in a gentle voice: 'Is there an answer, mademoiselle?' You understand?"

"Well, I believe I do," said he, significantly, as he slyly pocketed the half-Napoleon fee I had tendered for his acceptance.

Now the fellow had thrown into his countenance—a painfully astute and cunning face it was—one of those expressive looks which actually made me shudder. It seemed to say, "This is a conspiracy, and you are in it, Sir!"

"You are not for a moment to suppose," said I, hurriedly, "that there is any mystery in that letter which could compromise me, or wound the delicacy of the most susceptible."

"I am convinced, Monsieur has written it with most consummate skill," said he, with a supercilious grin, and left the room.

How I detest the humor of a foreign waiter! The fellows can not respond to the most ordinary question without an aftertaste of showing off their immense acuteness and knowledge of life. It is their eternal boast how they read people, and how they can anticipate precisely they can decipher all the various characters and temperaments that pass before them. Now this impertinent lacker, what is to say what his he not imputed to me? Utterly incapable as such a creature must necessarily be of the higher and nobler qualities of the nature of my order, he will doubtless have ascribed to me the most base and degenerate motives.

I was nervously pacing one word to the fellow. I might have said, "Take that note to Number fourteen, and bring me back his answer; or, better still, if I had never written at all, but merely sent in my card to ask if the lady would receive me, I might have an insolence of a few minutes. Yes, such would have been the discreet course; and then I might have trusted to my memory, my tact, and a certain something in my general bearing, to have brought the matter to a successful issue. While I thus meditated, the waiter re-entered the room, and cautiously closing the door, approached me with an ostentatious pretense of secrecy and mystery.

"I have given her the letter," said he, in a whisper.

"Speak up!" said I, severely; "what answer has the lady given?"

"I think you'll get the answer presently," said he, with a sort of grin that actually thrilled through me.

"You may leave the room," said I, with dignity, for I saw how the fellow was actually revelling in the opportunity of insolence.

"They were rending it over together for the third time when I came away," said he, with a most perfidious look.

"Whom do you mean? who are they that you speak of?"

"The gentleman that she was expecting. He came by the 9.40 train from Brussels. Just in time for dinner, Sir. They have ordered three words, a violent ringing of bells resounded along the corridor, and he rushed out without waiting for more.

I turned in haste to my note-book; various copies of my letter were there, and I was eager to recall the expressions I had employed in my addressing her. Good Heavens! what had I really written? In every style in that letter, and in absurdity; poetry too! verses to the "Fair Victim of a recent War," with a number of rhymes for the final word, such as "love," "dove," "mow," etc.—all evidences of composition under difficulty.

While I turned over these rough copies the door opened, and a large, red-faced, stern-looking man, with a suit of red-brown tweed, and a heavy gray shade on his head, entered; he closed the door leisurely after him, and I saw that he locked it. I saw that he also took the key in the lock. He advanced toward me with a deliberate step, and in a voice measured as his gait, said,

"I am Mr. Jopplyn, Sir—I am Mr. Christopher Jopplyn."

"I am charmed to hear it, Sir," said I, in some confusion; for, without the vaguest conception of wherefore, I suspected lowering weather ahead.

"May I offer you a chair, Mr. Jopplyn? Won't you sit down?" I was trying to have a lovely day, I fancy—a great change after yesterday."

"Your name, Sir," said he, in the same solemnity as before, "your name I apprehend to be Pottinger?"

"Pardon me, if you permit me; Pottinger, not Pottinger."

"It shall be as you say, Sir; I am indifferent what you call yourself." The assertion that sounded like a horse sigh, and proceeded: "I am not indifferent to the document that stands between us. Is that document your writing?" As he said this, he drew, rather theatrically, from his breast-pocket the letter I had just written, and extended it toward me. "I ask, Sir—and I mean you to understand that I will suffer no prevarication—is that document in your writing?"

I glanced all over as I took it, and for an instant I determined to disavow it; but in the same brief space I bethought me that my denial would be vain. I had, in fact, but a single, bold, and brazen it out; I fancied to laugh it off as a mere pleasantry, and failing in courage for each of these, I essayed, as a last resource, the argumentative and discussional line, and said,

"If you will favour me with an indulgent hearing for a few minutes, Mr. Jopplyn, I trust to explain, to your complete satisfaction, the circumstances of that epistle."

"Take five, Sir—five," said he, laying a ponderous silver watch on the table as he spoke, and pointing to the minute hand.

"Really, Sir," said I, stung by the peremptory and dictatorial tone he assumed, "I have yet to learn what intercourse between gentlemen is to be regulated by clock-work, not to say that I have to inquire by what right you ask me for this explanation."

"One minute gone," said he, solemnly.

"I don't care if there were fifty," said I, passionately. "I disclaim all pretension of a perfect stranger to obtrude himself upon me, and by the mere assumption of a pompous manner and an imposing air, to inquire into my private affairs."

"There are two!" said he, still with the same solemnity.

"Who is Mr. Jopplyn?" said I, in my excitement, "that he is to presume himself in my apartment like a commissary of police? Do you imagine, Sir, because I am young, that I am to be insulted with impunity—Lord what a gulp it cost me—'is to pass unpunished? Do you fear that a red hair and a heavy walking-cane are to strike terror into me? You may think, perhaps, that I am unarmed—"

"Three!" said he, with a bang of his stick on the floor that made me actually jump with the stick.

"Leave the room, Sir," said I. "It is my pleasure to be alone—the apartment is mine—I am the privileged here. A very little sense of delicacy, a very small amount of good-breeding, might show you that your presence is declined, to receive company, when he shows himself indisposed to the society of strangers—"

"One minute and a half," said he, in a low growl, while he proceeded to button up his coat to the neck, and make preparation for some opening event.

My heart was in my mouth, I gave a glance at the window, it was on the third story, and a leap out would have been fatal. What would I not have given for one of those weapons I had so proudly proclaimed myself possessed of! There was not even a poker in the room—I made a sparing at the bell-rope, and before he could interpose, pulled it out, though it brought down the cord, resounded through the whole house.

"Time is up, Porringer," said he, slowly, as he replaced the watch in his pocket and grasped his murderous-looking cane.

There was a huge table in the room, and I intrenched myself at once behind this, armed with a light cane-chair while I ceremoniously order in every language I could command. Failing to reach me across the table, my assailant tried to dodge round the side starts, now at this side, now at that. Though a large fleshy man he was not inactive, and it required all my quickness to baffle him. These manœuvres being unsuccessful, he very quickly placed a chair beside him, and mounting upon it, he now hurled my chair at him, he warded off the blow and rushed on; with one spring I bounded under the table, and mounting upon it, I descended from the table he turned it on edge—the effort required strength. I seized the uppermost and with every ounce of force I had in me, I threw it full at his head. It struck him in the forehead, and he came over with the weight of one of the chairs, and I could hope I may live to remember you for it.

"Are you cowed? Can you defend me?" cried I, in terror; "or shall I help in and swim for it?"

"I'll stand by you. Don't be afraid, man," said he, drawing my arm within his; "no one shall harm you. Were they robbers?"

"No, Christopher Joppl'n!" said I, gulping, for I was heartily ashamed of my terror, and determined to show "cross why" in the plural.

"Come in here, and have a glass of something," said he, turning into a little cabaret, with whose proprietor he seemed not unfamiliar. "You're all safe here," said he, as he closed the door of a little room. "Let's hear all about it, though I'll not tell the story already."

I had no difficulty in perceiving, from my companion's manner, that he believed some sudden shock had unsettled my faculties, and that my intellects were for the time deranged; nor was it very easy for me to assume sufficient calm to dissuade him of his error, and assert my own perfect coherency. "You have been ill, I'm sure, for you look mighty shaky," said he. "You have been at one of those ten-gardens and got into a row with some stout Fleming. I'll tell you what, you go through that sort of thing. Ain't I right?"

Never more mistaken in your life, captain. My current sins, if landed would not discredit a canon of St. Paul's. In fact, all my habits, my tastes, my pursuits are averse to every sort of junketing. I am essentially retiring, sensitive, and, if you will, over-fastidious in my choice of associates. The story is simply this: My reader will readily excuse my repeating what is already known to him. It is enough if I say that the captain, although anything rather than mirthful, held his head several times over his eyes, and once laughed out loudly and boisterously.

"You don't say it was Christy Joppl'n, do you?" said he, at last. "You don't tell me it was Joppl'n?"

"The fellow called himself Joppl'n, but I know nothing of him beyond that."

"Why, he's mad jealous about that wife of his—that little woman with the cork-screw curls and the aesthetic face—you came over with us. Oh! you did not see her on board, you went below at once, I remember; but there was she in her black ugly, and her old crape shawl—"

"In mourning?"

"Yes. Always in mourning. She never wears any thing else, though Christy dresses gay in colors, and not particular as to the tint either."

There came a cold perspiration over me as I heard these words, and perceived that my proffer of devotion had been addressed to a married woman, and the wife of the "most jealous man in Europe."

"And who is Joppl'n?" asked I, haughtily, and in all the cool confidence of my present security.

"He's a railway contractor—a sort of, you of fellow, with plenty of money, and a good hand on his shoulders; sensible enough in every point except his jealousy."

"The man must be an idiot," said I, indignantly, "to rush indiscriminately about the world with accusations of this kind. Who wants to supplant him? Who seeks to rob him of the affections of his wife?"

"That's all very well, and very specious," said he, gravely; "but if men will deliberately set about keeping a watch on a married lady, summoning their aunts for fine sentiments, and toiling to find proper expressions—" the captain, it does not require that a man should be as jealous as Christy Joppl'n to take it badly. I don't think I'm a rush or an hasty man, but I know what I'd do in such a circumstance."

"And, pray, what would you do?" said I, half interrupting him.

"I'd just say, 'Look here, young gent, is this baldcrinkly here yours?' and then I'd say exactly those words. Yes, eat them. I mean what I say. Eat up that letter, seal and all, or, by the oath, I'll have every bone in your body broke."

"It is exactly what I intend," cried a voice, hoarse with passion; and Joppl'n himself sprang into the room and dashed at me.

The skipper was a most powerful man, but required all his strength, and not very diagnetly exercised either, to hold my enraged adversary. "Will you be quiet, Christy?" cried he, holding him at the risk. "Will you just be quiet for one instant, or must I knock you down?"

"Do! do! by all means," muttered I, for I thought if he were once on the ground I could finish him off with a large pewter measure that stood on the table.

With a rough shake the skipper had at last succeeded in that resistance was useless, and ordered him to consent to a parley.

"Let him only tell you," said he, "what he had told me, and—"

"Don't strike, but hear me," cried I; and safe in my stockade behind the skipper, I recounted my whole case.

"And you believe all this?" asked Joppl'n of the skipper, when I had finished.

"Believe it! I should think I do! I have known him since he was a child that high, and I'll answer for his good conduct and behavior."

Heaven sees you for that bail bond, though Joppl'n did not, for he shook skip roughly and I only hope I may live to requite you for it.

Joppl'n was appeased but it was the suppressed wrath of a lion! how he raved that the vanquished nigger of a man. He had booked himself for something cruel, and he was miserable to be baked. Nor was it long before I came to own it—an emblem of perfect forgiveness. I have omitted to say that I was for a constitutionally timid man, of weak proportions, to forgive the bullying superiority of brute force. It is about this, perhaps, that human forgiveness can be submitted to: so that when Joppl'n, in a vulgar spirit of reconciliation, proposed that we should be friends and dine and sup all the day, I declined the invitation with a frigid politeness.

"I wish I could persuade you to change your plans," said he, "and let Mrs. J. and myself see you at six."

"I believe I can answer for him that it is impossible," broke in the skipper; while he added, in a lower whisper, "You'll have about any delay—they have to put on the steam at high pressure from one end of Europe to t'other."

What could be possibly mean by imputing such baseness to my movements, and who were "they" with whom he thus associated me? I would have given worlds to ask, but the pressure of Joppl'n's presence was such that I could simply assent with a sort of foolish laugh, and a muttered "Very true—quite correct."

"Indeed, I know you must to be here now I can scarcely imagine," continued the skipper. "The last of young coats that ever brought the kind a mile of knots, and a cold chicken with him into the train, rather than halt to eat his supper—but I'll not spoil you know best."

What confounded mystification was passing through his marine intellects I could not fathom. To what point the brotherhood of important travelers had he ascribed me? Why should I not "take more time to think?" All this was mystranlizing and very irritating, and finally ending a pressing engagement, I took leave of them both, and returned to the hotel.

I was in need of rest and a little composure. The incident of the morning had jarred my nerves and disconcerted me much. But a few hours ago, and life had seemed to me like a flowery meadow, through which, without path or track, one might ramble at will; now, it rather presented the aspect of a vulgar kitchen garden, fenced in, and divided, and partitioned off, with only a few very stony alleys to walk in. "This boasted civilization of ours," exclaimed I, "what is it but snobbery! Our class distinctions—our artificial distinctions—are hypocritical professions—our deference for externals, are they not the flimsiest pretences that ever were fashioned? Why has no man the courage to make short work of these and see the world as it really is? Why has not some one gone forth, the apostle of frankness and plain-speaking, the same to prince as to peasant? What I would like would be a man who would be the less esteemed of the a rabble through his less esteemed of the a rabble through his less esteemed of the a rabble through his

GRAND PROCESSION OF WIDE-AWAKES AT NEW YORK ON THE EVENING OF OCTOBER 3, 1860.

THE WIDE-AWAKE PARADE.

THOUSANDS of torches flashing in high, narrow streets, crowded with eager people, and upon house-fronts in which every window swarms with human faces; with the mingling music of scores of military bands, and the rippling, running, sweeping, and surging sound of hozzas from tens of thousands, but generally a silence like the quiet flow of a vast river; with the waving of banners and inscriptions and mottoes of endless length, and through all, out of all, and over all, the splendor of exploding fire-works, of every color—these combined, artificial, are an imposing spectacle; and these every one in the city saw at the Wide-Awake festival on Wednesday night.

It was certainly a theatric approach to a purely poetic popular demonstration that we have had. Torches have in all European antecedents, in all works are of no party. Splendor and beauty are not yet proscribed. Every man who has at heart the municipal honor of New York (nominal now, or?) must have been glad and gratified on Wednesday evening. There was never, perhaps, so immense a political fire which passed off more peacefully. Even the bitterest political opponents of the party in which the organization belongs could not but confess how beautiful the scene was.

Standing at midnight in Broadway, near the corner of Tenth Street, and looking up and down Union Place, you saw the entire street sheeted with flickering light, and Union Place bright with showers of fire-works; while down town, as far as the New York Hotel, and beyond, there was the same blazing torrent of life and enthusiasm, from which, in place and incessant explosion, burst the Roman candles of every celestial hue.

A RASH LITTLE LADY, AND WHAT BECAME OF HER.

CHAPTER I.

A RAVINE, long, deep, jagged, hung with bushes, trees, flowers, and rocks. A man in blue overalls, gray bobtail coat, and paper cap, knocking away with a little hammer at the ledge of rock against the side of the ravine, moving stealthily this way and that, gazing earnestly at particular spots, touching them with his finger, and sometimes scratching carefully with his thumb-nail. "Blue limestone—subcarboniferous—fossils very numerous—" These were the mutterings at intervals, dropping the fragments into the brook, which tinkled on the creek dialect—all Greek to him, on its way to the surf at the foot of the ravine.

Now the man didn't know—how should he?—that a little lady was curled—Bella, by name—at her at the brown house over yonder—sat on the green plat a little above him, with her feet under her brilliant sweeping round her and hiding her feet, gathering specimens of flowers and grasses, trying how many different kinds she could find within the radius of her white arms and reaching fingers. He knew nothing about it. And if he had to wouhn't have cared. For Bella belonged to neither tertiary formation nor drift—was neither mineral nor fossil—and the great geologist was too absolutely absorbed in the investigation before him to be drawn from it by any thing less imposing than the last trump, or less hideous than a three-headed

So the little lady in curls sat gracefully on the green-sward gathering specimens. "Fourteen, fifteen, sixteen," she said, holding them light in one hand, leaning till almost prone, and reaching with the other. "My! how very curious! here are all these varieties within my reach. How rich the world is!"—and the man rapped away with his little hammer, muttering, "Flint—conglomerate—north and south vein"—neither knowing nor thinking about the other, and neither caring a wisp of straw for any body who might be near.

"Twenty-five, as I live!" said Bella, sitting quite upright, all aglow, and pressing her little round waist with both hands as though her slender dress had made her extend her specimen-circle to its utmost possible circumference—as indeed it had.

Rap—tap—rap.

"Hooray!" said the little lady; "spirits down there, I guess. I should really like to know what that is. Must be somebody down there; and I'm going to have a look at the creature."

So the little lady gave her head a toss which sent the curls flying behind her shoulder, rose, arranged her dress just a bit—as any lady of her size, little, would certainly have done—and walking demurely to the brink of the ravine, looked cautiously over.

"A man with a hammer! Funny little hammer—silent at once, sharp at the other. I wonder if he's a mining man; and not very elegantly dressed, either. I suppose he thinks it's no use to try. Right, I guess. Seems to have. Wonder what he'd do if he knew I was looking at him."

Upon this the mischief-loving brain under the curls conceived the idea of making the man look up; and forthwith it became a necessity, for the little lady was just as unfurious as any little lady you ever saw, and liked a spice of adventure "ever so much," as she herself would have said it.

The girl touched her tiny slipper to a little piece of rock, and it rolled down the declivity.

"Wonder if he looked up then."

It was likely enough that he did; but then there was no means of knowing; and what fun was there in making him look up if you couldn't look over and see him do it? So Bella, who began to feel considerable interest in the experiment, sat down close by the edge, and, holding by a stout shrub, leaned over and let fall another bit of rock.

"I declare! what a row! He must be deaf."

Down went a third little boulder, slipping from one projection to another, and lodging in the brook.

"Hem! Deaf, I guess. Wonder if he has the sense of feeling left. I'll try it; anyhow" and the saucy little Bella tossed another bit of rock with such capital luck that it struck plump upon the man's paper cap, right over the organ of ideality.

Of course the man in the paper cap looked up: but Bella was so startled by the success of her toss as to dart back involuntarily; and then she lay, flat and reclining on the sward, frightened, but laughing exuberantly over his probable amazement.

"I wonder if the stupid man looked up then," said the little lady. "What a fool I was to hide before I found out whether the poor fellow was not the sense to look up. I declare, I would like to see what he's doing now. I will—I'll look over. I'm not going through all this performance and then be too cowardly to look over. I'm certainly all it. So, now for one more look. Didn't that little stone hit him sharp enough? Ah, he's looking. He's she knew very well she had done enough and had better go home, stood up with a queenly grace and stepped sublimely toward the edge. Bella was a spoiled child.

The geologist's organ of ideality having been hit by a piece of rock, it had immediately roused into action; and hence he looked up with a vague expectation of finding something beautiful in the stuff. Nothing in sight but a few rustling shrubs. But the habit of abstraction which fits so closely to every one of science and art, had its share in the garment; and so the man gazed upward several seconds longer than an ordinary mortal would have done, and so got more of a well-defined notion of what he was looking for.

Bella placed her little foot carefully upon the edge, took graceful hold of the curls sweeping in front of her shoulders, and touching the lace-trimmed edge of the blue-spotted muslin—and looked over.

"Oh!" There was a man's great face looking, full at her!

The sudden start loosened the jutting edge of earth upon which she had rested her foot as she leaned over the brow of the hill, and it plunged, rattling, the little lady could only save herself from falling by yielding to the force of gravity and dancing, and skipping involuntarily, and with the utmost rapidity, down the steep declivity, saying, in the dazed fits of breathing left to her by fear—

"My! What shall I do? Oh! catastrophe, sure enough!"

The man in the paper cap spread his arms mechanically—hammer in one hand, and a piece of limestone in the other—and with a confused impression that an avalanche was coming, and which cloud, and garlanded with roses, was flying toward him, received the will-o'-the-wisp. With a spirit of her utmost agility, momentum got the better of her, and catching her foot in the skirt of her dress she could only helplessly fall into his arms.

"Why—really—now—excuse me—" stammered the confused geologist. He persists to this day that he was never so "put out" in his whole life as to say in all his life.

Bella, though a child in one sense, was a queenly little woman in an emergency; as self-possessed and dignified as swift-thoughted and brilliant. Recognizing herself, and seeing that no help or love, she stood the personification of ease and womanly command; and looking at him with a countenance tinted with the loveliest blushes, "Sir," she said, "I am very much obliged to you."

"I thank you, Sir, for saving me from falling. I was playing a girlish trick upon you, Sir, and deserved the punishment. Will you please to go?" And she held out her little hand.

The geologist took it. Selling very much as though his own was a lion's paw with a little bird in it. Had it been a specimen of mineral he would have known what to do with it. He should have turned it over and scratched it with his thumb-nail; but this little velvety hand was also gather out of his way. Bella, with a moment rather awkwardly, looking at it half-professionally, he gave it back again, with the assurance that he "had nothing to say—was glad he could help her," or words to that effect.

"Sir, I am very much obliged to you, Sir, for not looking up at me sooner," said Bella, playfully, and lowering herself from his presence.

The geologist followed me figure with his eye as long as he could, then took a fragment of conglomerate, and, sitting down on a boulder, began to examine it. First, he picked out the little pebbles, and brought the loose sand; then he turned it over, over, over, slowly, perhaps a hundred times. I do not pretend to know much about his thoughts at this time. I do not suppose that he was deeply in a lump of ideality with a piece of quartz, excitement of that organ is pretty sure to follow.

"Oh, oh, oh," murmured Bella, as soon as she had turned an angle of the ravine. "There there, there! Now I've done it, sure enough. Now I'm in for it, I don't care. I'll tell him all about it; and he'll put me under the children, and say, 'Little dear, little thing, Bella, and ought to get punished now and then.' But mercy!—My! I wouldn't she should know it for the world. I'm sure I'm crying for nothing at all. She'd hold up her hands, and say I'd done a very improper thing indeed. Well, I suppose I have done it; but we could all have fun now, I should like to know? Well, it was the funniest thing that ever did happen, and—Didn't Lin him nice, though?" And Bella, having cast a quick glance to see that no one was near, burst into a rich laugh, which rang like the tinkling of fairy bells.

"One good thing—he doesn't know me at all, and I shall never see him again. So I'll just tell Harriet and Fanny, and we'll have a fine time, and that will be the end of it. Heigh-ho! Wasn't he frightened, though?"

The little lady set her father before she reached home, and, full of the subject, depicted the scene critically, half-bursting with merriment all the while.

"You see, he is a miner, or something of that sort; old, and ever so ugly. No, he wasn't ugly in his face—that was real live-looking—great, you like years, too. But then his clothes were ugly; and—Well, I guess he is a mineralogist, papa."

The father patted his spoiled child under her chin, and said the very words Bella had put into his mouth.

Passing on the lawn, under the elms, and pressing her close to his great heart, the father gave Bella better kisses than any other human being could bestow. Then they went in, with perfect love and perfect trust between them—the oak and the vine.

CHAPTER II.

THERE were signs at the close of the last chapter that the episode of the ravine was to end in love and laughter—filial love and girlish laughter. Certainly nothing was farther from Bella's thoughts than the idea of ever meeting the geologist again, whom, out of compliment to his gray coat and paper cap, she had pronounced a miner of the field degree. And yet on the very next day, as she sat in summer silk and winged laces listening to the doubtful rhetoric of the village pastor, what should follow the lovely professional tread of the sexton straight to her father's pew but the very face which had looked up at her from the bottom of the ravine! The paper cap was not there, not the gray coat, nor the heavy boots; but the face, that was there matched in its strength by a figure which carried broadcloth as though born to it.

What could it mean? Her father smiled the smile of a friend; and when the man sat down, although wishing to welcome an old friend, while not forgetting the proprieties of the place, her father could not but conclude civilly out and chat that of the stranger in a silent grasp.

"There I've done it, thought Bella, the blood crimsoning to her forehead and rushing to the tips of her fingers. "Could any thing be more unlucky?" Thereupon she privately resolved that no sooner should she reach her own little chamber than she would have one good cry. And she did. Felt better. Then, after a copious application of cold water and a proper concentration of mind upon her toilet, she came down to dinner with a man at dinner with her usual ease and modishly dignity.

She said scarcely a word at dinner; partly because of a lingering embarrassment, and partly because she had nothing to say. Mr. Caxton and her father talked of old times—when they were together in England or somewhere—making their talk conglomerate by mingling pebbles of remembrance with sand-grains of abstruse subjects. The gentleman scarcely noticed her at all—treating her with grave politeness—almost amounting to reference, however, when circumstances made it necessary that he should turn to her.

"I don't believe he remembers me at all," thought Bella; "and oh, I'm so glad! A perfect gentleman, any way! Almost as old as father, though. But—Well, I'm old—young enough to be handsome, any way. Let me see—pa is thirty-eight, and I'm—Why, I'm almost over thirty. What a noble father I have got! Oh, I shall never love any body half so well as I do my father, I know."

Bella, with her usual quickness of mind, girlish, Is not Walter coming home from sea? Walter, the dashing, handsome sailor. Walter, your schoolgirl love, pictured in the verses "round the Horn" —boy when he left you, man when he returns. Walter, your father's favorite, whose you are by your father's own choice, seconded by your own child-preference years ago! You know nothing about it? You have never consulted the geologist as a member of the family for a month or two, pursuing his researches in the country round.

Mr. Caxton was in conversation aside very soon. Indeed, she was sure Mr. Caxton had not the slightest suspicion that she was the fairy that ran into his arms.

"Isn't it funny, Fanny? Well, he is a gentleman, any way—and he considers me with as much freaks! I declare! he is ever so much like my only he isn't my father, you know;" and Bella kissed Fanny on the cheek again, pronouncing her a dear good girl, in ecstatic maidenly phrase.

Bella's knowledge of botany was of very great service to Mr. Caxton, who had long wished to obtain a practical acquaintance with the science. Besides, this was a peculiarly favorable opportunity, for his mineralogy had so much her pleasant instructions by teaching her to distinguish geological specimens.

The truth is, they roamed the fields together very much, the man gathering rocks, the maiden flowers, Bella and Fanny—rocks and flowers. The strongest contrasts and most beautiful unions in all the world.

Bella's quick ear and eyeful eye caught at the geologist's facts and illustrations with a readiness that often drew him out beyond himself. Especially in speaking of theories of stratification, of the ages of deposit, and the vast eternities in which the earth was slowly fitting for man to live upon. Mr. Caxton would warm into the deep eloquence of genius, and throw off sparks of thought which would not kindle in his more ordinary talk.

Bella never felt so much at home, and yet so lost to herself, as when sitting, or walking, or talking with Mr. Caxton. It was curious. The impression was that of being enveloped, lifted.

"I'm afraid of him? Not a bit, Fanny. What an idea!"

"Well, I am. He's so learned and dignified. Why, when he looks at me, I want to creep into my slippers."

"What a funny girl you are, Fanny! Well, I have heard a great deal about learned, father people—but then, somehow, I don't feel it. See what he gave me to-day—a whole handful of rocks and flowers, all mixed up together. Isn't it queer?"

Is it possible that two months have gone?—more than eight full weeks!—sixty days! Even so. And the good ship Montezuma has reached her port at last. Full. Sperm-oil, bringing a round figure in the market. Walter will be home to-morrow.

And Bella—poor dear little Bella—fluttering like a feather in wavering and eddying breezes!

Four years have translated her. They have brought contour, curve, blush. They have opened a revelation of thought, emotion, power—new life. And now she is tremulous, restless, timid, anxious. And why?

Bella does not know.

She knows that four years of life, marked by activity, adventure, danger, have also wrought their work upon the boy who went out at nineteen, and comes back at twenty-three. What is he now? Is he boisterous and brave, and manly as her girl-heart pictured him then; or was she foolish and unpenetrating, like other children, and will he come back a wreck of the promise of four?

These were some of her thoughts, driven into her mind by the relation of their school-life, and by her father's partiality for Walter. But away down in a corner of her heart—a very wicked corner, Bella thought—there was the least possible sense of regret, ill-defined, and not comprehensible. What could it mean? She was glad to have Walter come—of course—and was glad to have him come home to his mother and sisters; glad to see him herself.

And yet sometimes it seemed so sudden—breaking in so upon her very, very smooth and pleasant daily life. So sudden.

"I wonder what Mr. Caxton will think of him?"

Early one morning, while the dew was yet on the grass, a young sailor stepped from the deck of a packet which had just swept gracefully and gracefully to the street of the pier. He walked proudly, strongly, with the sea-swing, through the streets of the village. Whole families pressed their faces against the window-panes; young fellows left the axe in the log, and, with a welcome slightly sentorian, met the returned in the lane. Old men stood tottering at gate-ways, holding fast by rough posts, to welcome Walter, in the changed but kindly voice of age. Matrons, too, sweeping, to the door-way, with shrill but broken words of cheer, as he passed along; and then followed his mastering form with eyes that glistened, as they thought of the unutterable joy of that mother, the sound of whose voice floetide now arose from the brown sides of the house toward which he was hurrying.

Walter raised the latch and went in. The teams in the street whipped on, the women and children left the windows; the axe was resumed; the old men turned back to their respective doorsteps; and while mother, son, and sisters wept together, a hundred warm hearts joined silently in the greeting.

Not long after Walter and Bella met at the threshold of the house—the handsome sailor and the pretty little Bella.

"Yes, Fanny, he is just as handsome—handsome than when he went away—but—"

"But what, Bella?"

"Oh, I don't know. Don't plague me."

"I won't plague you, darling; but what do you mean by 'but'?"

"Why, nothing, only— Well, we haven't got fairly acquainted yet."

Now it happened at precisely this juncture that Mr. Caxton, who was then in her employ, was called to the State Capitol to superintend the publication of a huge volume of reports, and to attend to other matters equally dry. For, though, this was not a trumped-up excuse for leaving his old friend's family in ease and comfortable retreat, which he was bound to obey. Mr. Caxton went promptly.

But just on the eve of his leaving, Mr. Vaughn—Bella's father—took an old friend's liberty, and said, clapping his hand on his shoulder,

"Caxton, my dear fellow, why don't you settle down and get married?"

"I can scarcely tell, Mr. Vaughn, that has been so absolutely that I suppose I have thought less of the pleasures of domestic life than I ought. We scientific men have our wife and children of our books and our specimens, you know."

"But just compare your condition with mine, Caxton," said Mr. Vaughn, with some remains of spirits, "Just note the difference between a homeless bachelor like yourself and a married man like me, in the midst of such a family as this, with my little one, my Frank, and my precious little Bella there."

Mr. Caxton looked up just an instant.

"I tell you what, Charles," continued his host, waving cordially, "I have a plan for you—a capital plan. May I tell it unreservedly?"

Mr. Caxton said "Yes."

"It is just this: you remember Mrs. Cleff, the nice young widow to whom you were introduced one evening, about a week ago? A middle, elegant person, not much more than thirty; only one child, and she a bright little thing, Caxton."

And Mr. Vaughn pronounced the name with a slow, smiling, genuine emphasis. "That—is—the—woman—do—you. Mark my words."

Having thus delivered himself, he was gladly a mile or two; found the ravine in which he was first discovered, and sat down and pondered. That omnipresent hammer of his shattered conglomerate into myriad flying fragments. What was plaguing under those strong and noble features it is not my privilege to know. Certainly there was turmoil and wrestling: and the conflict was long and fierce. But the conqueror was stirred into a strength of meaning which few countenances have the power to mirror under the strongest of emotion. After about two hours of this silence and pantomime the geologist slowly rose from his seat, saying,

"Forty years old, and as weak and foolish as a boy!"

Just after Walter arrived, Mr. Caxton left for the State Capitol. The house was full of light when he went away. The handsome sailor was there, the father and mother were radiant, and Bella in thus unfathomable mood of suddenly embarrassment, pleasure, and regret.

He addressed himself to the long, dry work before him with the concentration of his profession, analysing, abstracting, generalising, til the absorption of his energies gave only time for a dreamlike memory of the episode of which we have been writing as long; but it was memory striking into his thoughts every day with the flash of a very vivid dream.

He learned that he was not only a man of science but a man of weakness and emotion as well. God help us when we think we are strong!

CHAPTER III.

Two weeks later. Bella and Walter have been out walking very often—have been together in the sitting-room during the mornings of the family mysteriously withdrawn. Walter has driven often to the cottage-door with a proud bay horse in a faultless harness of silver and black, and a chaise so nicely balanced as to float, balloon-like, in the air.

The two have played at grass-hoop on the grass of the front lawn, many a time; often ending the sport with a tea-kettle, in which more grass in the chief projectile, falling in a feathery cloud over Bella, or dashing full in the face and clinging to the curls and beef of the handsome judge.

Fanny has been with them often—joined in their walks, their rides, their tête-à-têtes. Bella has never visited her now. But Fanny has felt guilty, as well as lonely, when with them; guilty, that she should share the time which every holy else resigned to her as lonely, as mamma—even when they see, or fancy they see, the shimmer of the light which has never yet reached themselves.

Fanny has grown demure, abstracted, half-sad. Bella has grown tired, listless. She round of adventure has grown revolting. She begins to feel lonely again. She is half-conscious of a thirst for something better, higher, more substantial, than Walter is there she is gay, rollicking even. Walter watches her face with a little twig, and Bella nibbles him roundly and very prettily. When Walter stands by the edge of the river, throwing rocks for the benefit of Blucher, his dog, Bella attempts to join in; and then there is a bit of a skirmish and some musical screaming.

Fanny's poor little heart sinks within her for very loneliness, as on these gay doings she sees, reflects on the beauty and life of the sailor, and Bella's self-possession when the two are together.

Bella goes away by herself, almost disturbed, and yet unable to tell, for the life of her, what is the matter.

Thus Fanny gets sad and still; and Bella becomes abstracted and watery. Both lose hold of each other, and half-regret. Bella has her life and her secret.

Bella walked down the ravine one day. There was no sound of hammer now; but she thought she would look over.

"Worse and worse! all happen this time," said she, resting her tiny slipper in a sure place, and bending over.

"Why, there's Fanny, as I live! all alone, too, and looking as though she had lost every friend in the world!"

Fanny had thrown down her hat, loosed her hair till it fell in heavy wealth upon her shoulders, and, leaning upon one elbow, was pulling flowers into bits, and tossing them upon the little brook, which ran chattering away with them as though it understood and the leaves were sad.

Bella tripped down a winding pathway, and in a few seconds was close by Fanny's side, closing her arms about her neck.

"I will—I will make a confidante of Fanny—tell her every word," thought Bella, as her friend laid her cheek to hers, yet half sadly against her own.

"Fanny, darling, do you love me?"

"Why, Bella, you know I do," said Fanny, almost reproachfully, her eyes filling with tears as she glanced into the face of her friend.

"Yes, I do know it—but then, lately, you have seemed so different—so reserved."

"So have you, Bella."

"I know it, but I'm not going to be so any more. You see, I haven't told you all my thoughts as I used to—that makes a difference; and you have kept secrets from me too, Fanny. Now I am going to be just my old self; and you shall meet me half-way, darling, will you?"

Fanny trembled very much, was silent, then burst into weeping. Warm and tearful were the caresses as the two leaned together on the turf. At last the bargain was made; for kisses had sprouted the door to each secret chamber of each little heart.

"Well, Fanny," said Bella, buoyant with the joy of unsealing one more, "I am going to tell you every thing now—every thing. Oh! I have been so unhappy, you don't know! And I am just as wicked as I can be. I know I am, and yet I can not help it. I have tried and tried, and—"

"So am I," sobbed Fanny, "more wicked than you are—a hundred times worse. When you know how bad I am you'll want to kill me—I know you will."

"Foolish Fanny!" said Bella, gathering spirits as her friend lost them, "it is so much thing. Now see;" and the pretty little sinner collected her thoughts to begin.

"You know Walter likes me, Fanny—of course."

"Yes—I know."

"And you know father likes him ever so much, and expects me—you know all about it, Fanny?"

"Yes."

"And you know he is just as handsome as he can be, and full of fun, and a good sailor, they say, and young, and all that?"

"Yes," It was said faintly, but frankly. Fanny lay still in Bella's arms, the tears filling like summer rain, her fingers trembling like the necklaces of grass. Now and then a half-shudder ran through her frame.

"Now, you won't hate me, darling, when you know how wicked I am," said Bella, folding the little figure closer, and beginning to cry, partly from sympathy and partly from the imminence of the coming confession.

Fanny kissed the cherry lips, which was saying "No" with emphasis.

"Then you shall know the worst. I don't love Walter a bit! I have tried just as hard as I could, because I don't want to disappoint father, nor any body; and Walter is very good, and handsome, and all that, you know. But I can't love him. I never have, and I won't—so, there! I know I am foolish and wicked, and you have both a thousand of me, and all that; but as for being his wife, I can't think of it—I can't—I can not—and I won't—there!"

Hereupon Bella brought her pouting lips in close proximity to Fanny's, but started, with,

"Why, Fanny! you don't love—love—Why, what's the matter, darling?"

"Nothing. Let me be still a little while—don't speak."

They sat a long time silent, wound in each other's arms.

"Now, Bella, shall I confess?"

"Yes."

"Put your face down to mine—there—so! Bella, I love Walter; and—and he told me just now that he—he loved me."

At this juncture Bella behaved most unseemly. Springing to her feet, and lifting Fanny as though she were a child, the impulsive Bella danced, like her arms about her, dipped her hands, cried and laughed at once; kissed her lips, her eyes, her forehead; and then, throwing herself on the sward, indulged in a really joyous cry.

CHAPTER IV.

The clock struck three.

Thomas Prentice, the broker, turned the key of his desk, locked and double-locked his safe, hung his overcoat on a hook behind the door, and putting his hat upon his briery head, walked into the street with an air that seemed to say to the throng:

"Better not cross near me; I shall catch you and scratch you."

Soon men seem to have been born with thorns sticking out all over them, as the briers we find among the underbrush of forests. They lay hold of every thing that comes near them, scratching hands and faces till the blood comes, and tearing all kinds of fabrics into dilpidation.

The broker was one of these men. Not a man to violate the letter of the law, and thus bring himself into disgrace; but a scheming, selfish, money-grubbing, powerful, wicked man, not a whit the better because he treated his victims as poachers do chickens—wring their necks silently.

He took out a pocket-book, and looked in business contemplations, came upon the post-office, passed contentedly up the granite steps, and deposited a rather bulky letter in one of the mysterious crevices through which we all drop those freighted packages—all, poor and rich, loving and hating.

"A hard case, a very hard case!" said Mr. Prentice, half-audible communion with his own self; "can't help it, though."

"Bella, close the shutters in about an hour. The sun will be up then, and the light will trouble me," said Prentice, opening the door and leaving the young girl with her father.

Oh, the long hush of the sick chamber! Bella bent over her father an instant, watching the slow breathing of the sick man's slumber; then sat with folded hands thinking how fearfully still it was; then gave her forehead a gentle touch with the touch of her dripping white hand; smoothed a wrinkle in the counterpane and brushed a speck from the pillow; turned her head to the wall to hide a rustle which in the hush seemed fearfully loud; and then sank into a long fit of thought of dear father, running off to a thousand things besides.

The door swung slowly and noiselessly open, and a package of letters was put in Bella's hand. They were her father's letters—all of them. So Bella sat and waited. Mr. Vaughn had been so long accustomed to a life of incessant travelling—physician sluught it best to allow Bella to read his core-spondence about to him, even in the first days of his convalescence. It was a little thoughtful of his daughter, running off to a thousand things besides.

The sick man stirred, threw an arm from under the covering, and opened his eyes with the clear look which comes of refreshing sleep.

"Letters," said his daughter, holding up the package.

"Well, read them."

One was folded small and tucked in a little white envelope, the which bore the tremulous chirography of age. It was Mr. Vaughn's mother. Another was from a stranger making some curious request. Others, upon various business topics. The heaviest was opened last. The very letter we saw deposited in the city office with the granite steps. It contained a startling story. A story of losses.

"I regret exceedingly to make this announcement, Sir," wrote the broker, "to unexpected, so utterly unforeseen. My own losses are also very heavy; heavier than yours."

"Oh, father! father! dear father! don't look so. Turn to me. Kiss me. Do, father!"

The sick man turned his pale face, with the strange look, startling even, upon his bewailing daughter, and tried to look cheerful.

But the effort was vain; for the iron had entered.

The sick room knew a deeper hush, and a deeper shadow. The curtains drooped a little lower, and the few footfalls were very light and careful, as though the touch of a soft slipper upon a softer carpet were a fearful noise.

The doctor came more gravely in, spoke in lower tones, with a touch of sympathy in them; and when he said, "Speak as cheerily as you can, and don't let him see your face sad," though the order was began with cheer in the voice, it ended in a tone which seemed to say, "Poor sister!"

The hush grew deeper still. The touch of that little hand upon the pillow was lighter and lighter, and when it crept to the warm forehead it lay there longer and longer.

One morning, just at dawn, a human life went out from that hushed room, leaving Bella alone.

Then friends came in to do kindly duties, and the hush of the bedside was broken.

When the funeral was over he left Bella alone. She had clung to one, and in the fall of the one she, too, was bereaved.

Not till now had the child the least adequate conception of the tenacity of her clinging, nor any thing like a consciousness of the utter lack of other support than her father's heart and arm. The mother—well, it was all expressed in Bella's own words: "I never understands me;" and when so she had gone to her father, and her father had been her all.

Now, in her deep grief, came thoughts of her father's friend, more continuous and swaying, even, than the pleasant memories which had lived in her heart all along the time since he went away. He was so earnest, so kind, so noble. Unconsciously she had thought of him, till he became the standard by which she judged other men.

Sometimes, as she sat looking forth from the unconsecrated window of her little bed-chamber upon the moonlit sea, and hills, and tree-tops, she would think of him, the impulsive Bella would, with his earnest nature and wealth of noble thought, as in the old-time wanderings across the fields, and nestling by his handsome window, she experienced anew the sensation of being "enveloped, lifted."

The only friend in the wide world upon whose directing hand she could fully rely was at this instant on shipboard, bounding along over the seas for California, and leaving the little Bella of months ago, but putting reins upon his bounding, and turning her face toward him as he believed that it was a very foolish thing to wish that he, instead of the handsome sailor, could have cared for the dear child.

The geologist was not a man to be blind to his own emotions. That he loved, unreasonably, but quite consciously, the object of his pity, he knew well. That Bella could have lighted his home forever—a very, very long time—was a matter of consciousness; but that, if he could have done so, he would have been justified in calling her to his side and sealing the contract impossible. Therefore Mr. Caxton endeavored to think very sensible things, gave her mentally to Walter, went over the seas type by which to compare her very hair to be betrothed. "God help us when we think we are strong!"

We can not follow Bella into the daily duties of her village school of the first ten month—the beginning of the year 1850—the year of the Californian diversion.

Mr. Caxton is commissioned to Australia, early in the lapse of these two years; and he goes, carrying Bella's image, as he carried her picture to California a year before—carrying a memory, a regret, and a longing.

In the middle of her discipline Bella has reached the position of teacher in a very select institution, where the limit of pupils is fifteen, and the price extravagant. She has but a few hours of her time are occupied, and her classes are in the higher branches.

At the close of this third year we may look in on her a moment, just before she closes her apartments to go to her father's home, for the reviewing of its early associations. A pleasant, well-furnished room; a fire in the grate—just a little, to hallow the chill of a November evening. Books, papers and books on the table; a port-folio of drawings, open. Bella, the student and worker of the past three years—fresh and buoyant, but with that sweet dignity which comes of chastening such a springing and loving heart as hers—more beautiful, her figure just perfected by the habit of command.

At this instant she is looking at a drawing—a face—drawn from memory more than a year ago.

Mr. Caxton, just returned from the great island, is passing out of sight of land.

The geologist reaches his hotel, and there finds a letter stating the death of a brother in Florida, and the need of his presence.

Passing under that window a dozen times a day, thinking of Bella as a long ago dream-friend many miles away, perhaps the wife of the handsome sailor, Mr. Caxton completes his arrangements for a visit to Florida and embarks for Florida. Does he very Bella as when he sailed to one and the other land of gold? Yes; and I suppose he always will.

CHAPTER V.

The gray morning broke slowly upon a village on the coast of Florida. A terrible storm, the night long the wind had rushed shrieking over the bare hills and by the isolated houses, making enough and blasts of fence, chimney, and the dead limbs of the few buttonwood trees, whose leafless trunks yet stood erect because no breeze could so ignore the old associations as to put the axe to them and see them fall. Old men as they stood in the morning could compare the storm to nothing within more recent recollection than thirty years. Every family as it sat around the breakfast board, startling even, upon the bewailing daughter, and tried to look cheerful.

But the effort was vain; for the iron had entered.

The sick room knew a deeper hush, and a deeper shadow. The curtains drooped a little lower, and the few footfalls were very light and careful, as though the touch of a soft slipper upon a softer carpet were a fearful noise.

Now, in her deep grief, came thoughts of her father's friend, more continuous and swaying, even, than the pleasant memories which had lived in her heart all along the time since he went away. He was so earnest, so kind, so noble. Unconsciously she had thought of him, till he became the standard by which she judged other men.

Sometimes, as she sat looking forth from the unconsecrated window of her little bed-chamber upon the moonlit sea, and hills, and tree-tops, she would think of him, the impulsive Bella would, with his earnest nature and wealth of noble thought, as in the old-time wanderings across the fields, and nestling by his handsome window, she experienced anew the sensation of being "enveloped, lifted."

The only friend in the wide world upon whose directing hand she could fully rely was at this instant on shipboard, bounding along over the seas for California, and leaving the little Bella of months ago, but putting reins upon his bounding, and turning her face toward him as he believed that it was a very foolish thing to wish that he, instead of the handsome sailor, could have cared for the dear child.

The geologist was not a man to be blind to his own emotions. That he loved, unreasonably, but quite consciously, the object of his pity, he knew well. That Bella could have lighted his home forever—a very, very long time—was a matter of consciousness; but that, if he could have done so, he would have been justified in calling her to his side and sealing the contract impossible. Therefore Mr. Caxton endeavored to think very sensible things, gave her mentally to Walter, went over the seas type by which to compare her very hair to be betrothed. "God help us when we think we are strong!"

We can not follow Bella into the daily duties of her village school of the first ten month—the beginning of the year 1850—the year of the Californian diversion.

Mr. Caxton is commissioned to Australia, early in the lapse of these two years; and he goes, carrying Bella's image, as he carried her picture to California a year before—carrying a memory, a regret, and a longing.

In the middle of her discipline Bella has reached the position of teacher in a very select institution, where the limit of pupils is fifteen, and the price extravagant. She has but a few hours of her time are occupied, and her classes are in the higher branches.

At the close of this third year we may look in on her a moment, just before she closes her apartments to go to her father's home, for the reviewing of its early associations. A pleasant, well-furnished room; a fire in the grate—just a little, to hallow the chill of a November evening. Books, papers and books on the table; a port-folio of drawings, open. Bella, the student and worker of the past three years—fresh and buoyant, but with that sweet dignity which comes of chastening such a springing and loving heart as hers—more beautiful, her figure just perfected by the habit of command.

At this instant she is looking at a drawing—a face—drawn from memory more than a year ago.

Mr. Caxton, just returned from the great island, is passing out of sight of land.

The geologist reaches his hotel, and there finds a letter stating the death of a brother in Florida, and the need of his presence.

Passing under that window a dozen times a day, thinking of Bella as a long ago dream-friend many miles away, perhaps the wife of the handsome sailor, Mr. Caxton completes his arrangements for a visit to Florida and embarks for Florida. Does he very Bella as when he sailed to one and the other land of gold? Yes; and I suppose he always will.

CHAPTER V.

The gray morning broke slowly upon a village on the coast of Florida. A terrible storm, the night long the wind had rushed shrieking over the bare hills and by the isolated houses, making enough and blasts of fence, chimney, and the dead limbs of the few buttonwood trees, whose leafless trunks yet stood erect because no breeze could so ignore the old associations as to put the axe to them and see them fall. Old men as they stood in the morning could compare the storm to nothing within more recent recollection than thirty years. Every family as it sat around the breakfast board every morning grew quiet, as though each heart were busy with pictures of these sad scenes with which the dwellers on the coast are so familiar.

Bella had been the first to descry a small black speck in the edge of the horizon, coming into view and then receding, but growing larger and more constant as the morning grew. The roar of ocean in a storm having been no part of her lullaby in the last three years, she could not sleep; and because the brown house stood apart from the rest on elevated ground, she could see from the window had been thus rewarded. Fanny saw it next, for she was watching elsewhere. Walter had sailed from a home port only a day or two since; he was in the merchant service now.

Though the waves rolled thundering to the shore, and the storm was yet wild, Fanny found her way to the lower house early in the day, leaving her little boy in charge of a neighbor's daughter. Fanny and Bella sat together, saying little; Fanny very anxious, and Bella under a mysterious pressure.

The speck grew larger. Slowly but surely it tumbled in toward the land a massless hulk. As the morning wore on groups of men gathered on the headland between the town house and the shore, watching the curved outlines and beautiful proportions of the half-dismasted thing to which the sometimes kindly shores must first come, a rough welcome now. Women congregated at the town house and waited for the first tidings from land. And still the gale blew wildly; and the billows held their winding sheets aloft a moment, then spread them on the shifting sand. The ship came on as gracefully as though her march were not to death, rather a bright green sea-floor into view with every climbing to the summit of a wave.

There were men on board. There were signals of distress—signals of sights to the groups on shore men and weeping women. She approaches nearer. The women forget the storm and are hurried by a kind of unguided impulse to the shore. Nearer —nearer—nearer—she strikes—is buried in foam—rises low-lie, shaking her sea-green mane—strikes again—sounds rocks or fragments.

Here and there a human form struggles into view upon a mast-head or main chips. Now one is thrown violently up the cliff, stunned, and carried back by the retreating wave to struggle never again. She is surrounded by the savage of the ocean; but what can mortals do? For such as strike against the cliff there is no hope. A few, clinging to a mast or timber, are carried into the mouth of the ravine. The cruel billows play with them—lift to a seeming eternity of minutes and then, as if willing to spare a few poor lives, push them within the rocks' sides upon the level floor. And there they lie in motionless at last.

The villagers, with that stern, earnest look which the powerless brave wear in the presence of death and calamity, gather the fear in strong arms, and place them on a patch of green-sward a little up the ravine. But long ere this Fanny has been a watcher—of hope and anguish as she recognizes the still features of the handsome sailor of a few years ago—of her husband—of her boy. And so it was his ship that had been swept by the tempest, and all through the long, wild morning had rolled fearfully in to the death-wielding shore.

There men and women of the coast were too familiar with shipwrecks to let a life go. As the bodies was taken by a few of the most experienced, subjected to tests of life, and brought under the influence of means which a long seafaring had taught to use so well. There were reversings of position, flushings, pressure upon the chest. One—a lad of eighteen—came to himself at once, after a little care. At last, after long and patient trial, Walter gave a gasping groan, the fire was again at the return of life; and Fanny, bursting for the first time into tears, threw herself frantically upon the body of her husband. Even the strangest spectacle sounds had a music in them—the music of returning life.

An hour passed, and yet the two remaining bodies gave no hopeful signs. Another hour was almost gone, and the effort of the most sanguine began to lose their vigor. Only had they been so long continued because of the entreaties of the women, to whom those strangers were to-day friends, husbands, brothers, on other shores, needing the toil which was theirs to bestow to-day—the effort which would end in a resurrection. The men ceased; but Bella, watching, had detected a little flush—a faint color—thought she saw, and entreated earnestly for another brief endeavor. Thus one of them was saved. Then the efforts were increased and the time extended, but to no avail. The other never woke.

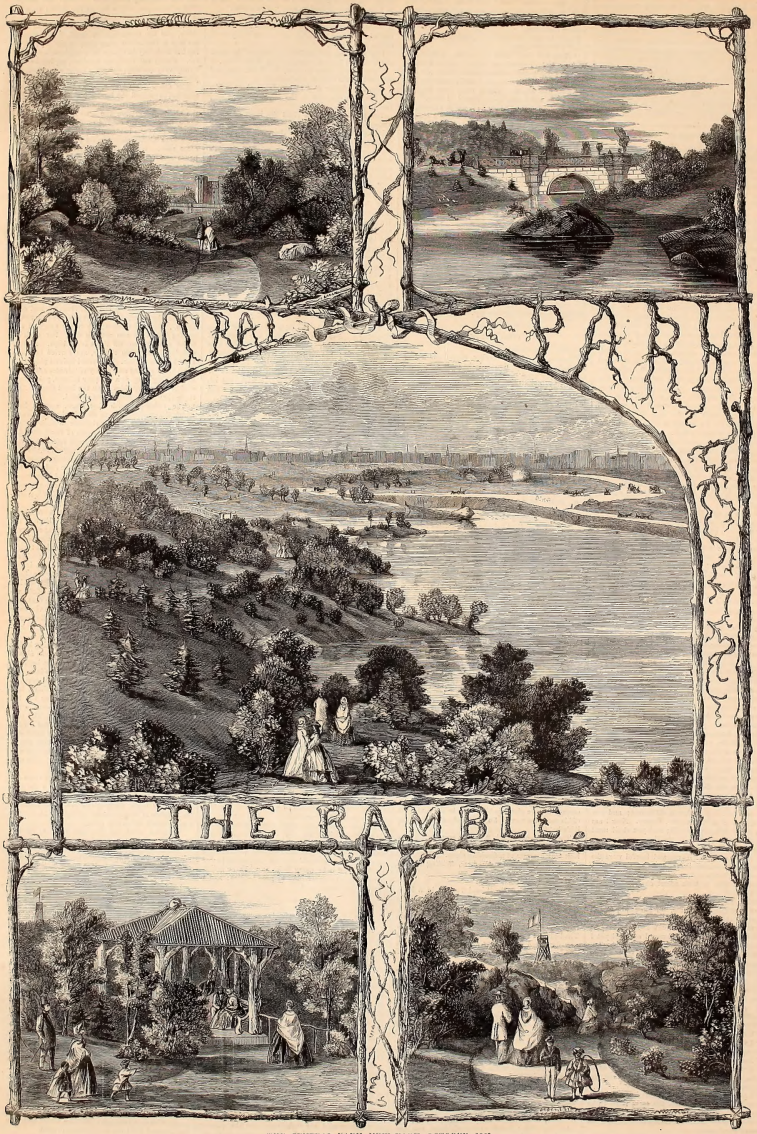
That afternoon the town house held them all. In the night Bella and Fanny sat by the dead in that subdued converse which befits a presence so august. And the handsome body was taken by the friends of the deceased, and given to sleep in the cemetery of its city home.

"Walter, Walter, was this man's name?" asked Bella's old friend, the physician.

"A passenger, going to the vicinity of Tallahassee, to take charge of a plantation which had fallen to him somewhere. I believe he was a broker."

"What was his name?"

"Mr.—it sounds like Tresley."



"Treston?"

"Yes, that it!—Preston."

As he rode homeward, the old man murmured to himself, "Poor child! I am little thinks that she has been sitting and watching by the body of her father's murderer! Murder I call it."

It was a strange coincidence—a very strange coincidence—that it was Walter's ship in which the geologist had taken passage; and thus the Providence "which shapes our ends" had thrown these three together, upon the shore within the old village. And Bella and Fanny had been brought to meet them there.

Three years of total had brought into full bloom the perfection of high womanhood which Mr. Caxton had found in little Bella, and worshiped ever since, despite himself. As he saw her now there were no misgivings lest she should find no genial, matching spirit in his staid and weighty self. So he told her a story of three years' length; and Bella, looking back, saw for the first time that the mystery of her emotions was no mystery at all. And while they walked hand in hand through the world the gravity of the one was seen to break often into ripples, and the buoyancy of the other to gain in it a strength and sense which added to its diamond light the weightiness of gold.

THE CENTRAL PARK, NEW YORK, OCTOBER, 1860.

THE POPE AND HIS GENERAL.

THE public will be glad to have a portrait of the Pope and of General Lamoricière, who figure so prominently in the news from Europe, and whose career appears at length to be drawing to a sudden close.

Pope Pius the Ninth was born at Senegalia in 1792, and is consequently at the present time about 68 years old. His family was ancient and wealthy; his name is Mastai Ferretti. In early youth he was destined for the army, and it is said—though this has been denied—that he served some time in a regiment of dragoons. However this be, he fell in love, when a very young man, with a beautiful English girl, who refused to marry him unless he would become a Protestant. Declining to pay this price for a wife, and unable to bear the mortification of losing her he loved, Mastai resigned his commission, entered the Church, and won golden opinions by his fervor, zeal, and intelligence. At the age of thirty he was dispatched to Chili to reorganize the Church there, which had been thrown into disorder by the revolution. This mission he fulfilled with such success that, on his return, he was intrusted with an important post in the Government at Rome. He shortly afterward became Papal nuncio at Naples. There he won no little fame by the courage and disinterested kindness which he displayed toward the sick; the cholera was raging among the lazaroni, and many priests, overcome by terror, refused to perform their offices to the dying. Mastai not only spent his whole time at the bedside of the sufferers, but sold his plate and carriages, and devoted the money to their use; preferring, as he said, "to walk on foot so long as the poor of Jesus were dying in the streets."

Under Gregory XVI. Mastai Ferretti, who had been appointed a cardinal, administered the diocese of Imola, in the Romagna, and by his skill and conciliatory policy contrived to soothe much of the discontent which prevailed in that region. On Gregory's death he was summoned to Rome to assist at the conclave which was to elect a new Pope. It was generally understood that Gregory's successor was to be Cardinal Lambruschini; Cardinal Ferretti was one of the scrutineers. On the third ballot he was elected Pope. His excitement when, as scrutineer, he made the astounding discovery, was so great that he fainted.

As Pope, Pius IX. commenced his career nobly. He liberated the thousands of political prisoners who had been thrown into jail by Gregory. He reformed many departments of the Government. He encouraged the national Italian feeling. He spoke openly against the Austrian domination. So novel a stand for the head of the Church attracted the world's attention. Pius became the most popular man in Europe, and the excitable Italian people ripened for revolt. The French revolution of 1848 kindled the flame. Then Pius tried to stem the tide by reactionary measures. It was too late. He refused to be a party to any revolutionary proceedings, and appointed the most unpopular noble in Rome—Count Rossi—to be his Prime Minister. It was fatal. The Romans rose, murdered Rossi, took the government into their own hands, and imprisoned the Pope, who was only too glad to fly, some time afterward, in the disguise of a Bavarian valet.

He made his escape to Gaeta, where for some months he held his court. At length, the Austrians and their despotic allies having begun to crush out revolution, Pius was restored by the French and Neapolitans.—Ever since then he has been upheld on his throne by a French army. Were the French to leave Rome the old man's head would not be safe for an instant.

It is due to truth to say that, since his restoration to power, Pope Pio Nono has evinced very little of the spirit which once won for him the good-will of liberal men throughout the world. Prior to 1859 his rule was despotic, and as inefficient as that of any of his predecessors: robbery was an everyday matter in the Papal States; murder was common; and the jails, which contained but few assassins and thieves, were crammed with respectable persons accused of political offenses. When the war broke out the sympathies of the Pope were openly manifested on the side of tyranny and foreign domination; Pius was an Austrian to the backbone. Hailing from heaven above, he could not, of course, be expected to share the feelings of the Romans about Italian nationality. It needed more watchfulness than ever, on the part of the French General, to prevent the Pope's subjects sacking the Vatican.

When the war ended, the Emperor of the French proposed an Italian Confederation, with the Pope at its head. To this Pius agreed; but with senile fatuity insisted that, before any new arrangement were made, foreign troops should invade the revolted Romagna, and reduce to submission those of his subjects who, disgusted by the crimes of his government, and especially the massacre of Perugia, had expelled his legates and declared their independence. This was too much even for the Emperor of Austria—far too much for Louis Napoleon. The request of the Pope was civilly declined. Upon which the old man refused to have any thing to do with the Confederation.

POPE PIUS THE NINTH.

On New-Year's Eve Napoleon wrote the Pope a wise, calm, and temperate letter, advising him to submit to fate, and to recognize the independence of the Romagna. On New-Year's Day, Pius, in his speech to the French general, called Napoleon a hypocrite, and all the other hard words he could remember.

The next steps in the drama are fresh in our readers' memory. When Garibaldi invaded Sicily the Pope was furious, and fulminated a manifesto against him, which was laughed at. When Calabria was invaded the Pope began to quake, and implored protection from the neighboring powers. It was too late. As we go to press, we hear that nothing remains to the infatuated old man but the port of Civita Vecchia and the city of Rome—and these he will not probably hold many weeks.

General Lamoricière, the soldier of fortune who took the command of the Pope's army last year, is, as his name indicates, a Frenchman by birth. A few years ago he was one of the galaxy of African generals who were the support of the throne of Louis Philippe. He had risen, without friends or patrons, from the rank of Sous-lieutenant to that of General of Division, and was, with Cavaignac and Changarnier, the idol of the soldiers. He was the bravest of the brave, ever risking his life for a trifle, and performing exploits which caused those who witnessed them to hold their breath with horror and suspense. At the revolution of February, Lamoricière vainly endeavored to stem the popular movement by establishing a Reform ministry: when he discovered that it was too late to throw himself into the republican ranks, and became one of the popular leaders of the party. He was a member of the Assembly, and took a leading part in the debates, declaring himself an ardent republican. In 1851 he was one of those who evinced a desire to rule or ruin, and was accordingly included in the list of the proscribed at the coup d'état of the 2d December. With Changarnier, he subsequently availed himself of the Emperor's permission to seek an exile abroad.

For some years afterward the world heard little of Lamoricière. It was understood that he had become very pious, and spent much of his time in prayer, fasting, and superstitious rites. He did penance for his sins, offered vows to saints, and attended church daily. He was in this holy frame of mind when the war in Italy broke out. The Pope, in the last distress, bethought himself of Lamoricière, and appealed to him to take the command of his army. The saint-soldier consented, and for the last year his been endeavoring, with pretty poor success apparently, to make a respectable army out of the assemblage of miserable ragamuffins who constitutes the Pope's defenders. We have the measure of success he has obtained in the report of the late engagement in Umbria. General Lamoricière himself is reported to be on his way to this country.

GENERAL LAMORICIÈRE.—[FROM A LATE PHOTOGRAPH.]

HAIR-BREADTH ESCAPES.

IF any one ever whom some years of the journey of life have passed will take the trouble to look back along the road he has traveled, and count up the narrow chances he has run of being extinguished like a half-burned candle—the lucky escapes he has made—it will go far toward convincing him of a superintending Providence over individuals, as well as states and worlds. The hairs ef our head are numbered, says the Good Book. "There's a Divinity that shapes our ends," says the great poet; and though we are not always saved—though fatal casualties are constantly occurring, still the cases in which we are unexpectedly rescued from impending dangers, when the chances seemed all against us, often by the interposition of some slight circumstance no weightier than a straw, are enough to give immense point and force to the proposition, and to render the conclusion all but inevitable. Ten regiments march where five, dead, and slaughter are allowed to take their course, we can not judge. Why one is taken and another left—why one man perishes by the prick of a pin or the sting of a gnat, while another is riddled with bullets and lives—belongs to a realm of mystery and motives we can not fathom.

Surrounded on all hands by dense substances, as earth, water, and iron, the human body which must resist them is by their side as the frailest of textures. Our soft parts mar like the rose-leaf; our hard parts fracture like porcelain. Ices, vapors, and streamlets ebb, and flow, and course their way in every part of us; strong contists with gossamer tissue, in which a bullet would open a fatal leak. We sustain within ourselves a complete system of pipes and reservoirs for supply, and another for drainage; with the most sensitive, complex, and perfect system of telegraph wires, delicate as frost-tracery, ever devised. These rivers, reservoirs, and wires are also locomotive. We are constantly in action; liable to break against each other, and to be broken and consumed by the harder, stronger elements about us. Brick and stone war on us at every step. Water threatens us below, the thunderbolt above, and fire on every side. A slight fall, a slip on a stair, be smashed like a egg or the sun of a watch. A needle will part the skull; a straw will put out an eye, and even pierce the brain; a pocket-knife, or box, will open the grand reservoir of blood and let it out on the life. It is difficult to see how we manage to exist at all; and yet not a few pass on to old age, threescore and ten, reach the patriarchal era it were, between rocks and whirlpools on the one side, and bullets and whirlwinds on the other, without serious damage from casualty or disease, to the natural end of life.

A fresh set slow furnishes us with the following rôle of chances—of exposures and escapes—in his own case. Others, whose sphere of action has been wider and more various by field and flood, will be able to exhibit a more startling record; but this is sufficiently in point:

1. Still-born, and restored to animation, not by the thunder of rejoicing cannon, as in the case of his namesake, Napoleon, but by being soused in a tub of cold water.

2. A permanent fracture of the sternum, at the age of a few months—cause unknown—entirely a weakness of the chest for many years.

3. At two years or thereabouts—dates only approximately correct—just escaped being crushed under a falling chimney.

4. At three, left hempen bone hold bare by a fall. Skull escaped fracture.

5. Same year, recovered from a dangerous epidemic fever, of which one or two of the family died.

6. At four, escaped from a surgeon of boiling water, with slight scalds on face and neck.

7. At five, collar-bone fractured by a fall.

8. At six, severe blow in the abdomen from an axe, which flew out of the hand of a woodman, but fortunately struck with its head instead of the sharp bit.

9. At seven, half killed by the breaking of a rope swing. Taken up senseless. Same year, choked by a button in the throat. Escaped, as it were, at the last gasp.

10. At eight, left ankle joint laid open with an axe. Lamed in great danger, but saved. Followed, a year or two later, by a like, but less severe injury to right ankle joint.

11. At nine, blow on the back of the head from a stick of wood, so severe as to separate the sutures of the skull on both sides of the head.

12. At ten, wound in the knee from a knife, which penetrated the joint.

13. At same, blow from a hand-pike on the temple. Taken up for dead. Skull probably fractured.

14. At twelve, the extreme of mortal illness, lasting for months. Was supposed dying—dead. Relieved at the last moment spontaneously, without visible cause. Recovery perfect, and protracted through many years.

15. At fifteen, over Greek and Latin, suffering all the horrors of dyspepsia.

16. At nineteen, threatened with total loss of sight from acute disease of the eyes. Recovery long and tedious.

17. At twenty, life in danger on one of our inland seas from a hurricane, at night. Escaped after some twenty hours of exposure.

18. Same year, attacked by a mad ruffian in the woods. Baffled him off by temporizing and the exhibition of a firm front.

19. At twenty-one, escaped with life by the breadth of a single hair, in a freshet on one of our large Western rivers. Same year, set upon by a company of Canadian voyagers in the North, escaped by flight, after a hot pursuit. Also, same year, stood the flash of a Virginia gentleman's knife; who finally thought better of it, and excused the lie unceremoniously given him, on the score of the deficiencies of a light-marching army. Also, farther, same year, overturned and thrown down a precipice in the night. Escaped with scarce a scratch, though buried under the wheels and timbers of the carriage, which was broken in fragments.

20. At twenty-two, lungs broken down. Mucous suppurations, slight hemorrhages, and an array of bronchial difficulties, extending through a period of a dozen years. Chances frequently, to appearance, not worth a mill.

21. At twenty-five, grown wise and prudent. Doctors and their drugs dismissed long ago. Health tolerable; and at forty pretty well established Lungs sound; stomach ditto; limbs ditto; notwithstanding all accidents, imprudences, and follies.

Our friend closes his valuable paper of chances with a blessing on the via medicatrix naturæ—the curative power of nature—in which, no doubt, he would include the protecting care of Providence.

The accidents that make their mark, that leave their scar on us, we remember; but how many forgotten ones are on us, that we never see—the whisper in our ears, which we never think of a second time; and how many others that hover over us, and fly all about us, that we never see—the pestilence, the tottering wall, the stray bullet, the ricochet, the falling plank, the unseen miasmatic electric charge, the gaping chasm, the unseen wilderness, the treacherous ice? Some somebody suspects we have money, or mistakes us in the night for somebody's enemy, and lets drive at us—never heard, and it is well for us not to know of them. The same is true of moral dangers. Many we fall into—in our weakness, and in them—but how many thousands we escape by the merest chance in the world—by some happy diversion in our favor, some unexpected interruption, a fellow-creature or thought—which starts, and rouses us up, and places us in the scale against the feather on the other side of the balance which we have insured our defeat!

MORBID MEMORY.

THERE are very few thoughtful persons to whom the question has not presented itself, What is the nature of the process of memory? The simplest psychological phenomenon, memory? With a very slight effort of will we are enabled to recall, at a moment's notice, long past events with startling vividness. We fold up and carry in our cerebrum the scenes and incidents of years of travel; we summon at will the faces of thousands of persons who have been seen by us only for a moment; we are enabled to reproduce, with perfect ease the tablet of the brain we see, as vividly as in a camera, the groups and objects that have stood before us for certain periods of our lives. How are all these myriads of images written upon the gray matter of the brain, and by what process is it proposed that we can select exactly those we want from the immense store, without disturbing the remainder? Inscrutable mystery as it seems to be, we may yet gather some light from a study of the same phenomena in a state of disease. A very curious illustration of this fact is furnished from the pen of Dr. Winslow (whose researches in the science of mental and nervous disorders are so well known), some chapters of which on morbid conditions of memory open to the general reader entirely new ground.

Dr. Winslow is a thorough believer in the indestructibility of mental impressions. Ideas once registered in the brain, he contends, can never be effaced; they may be latent for the better part of a lifetime, masked by succeeding ideas, but under certain conditions of the brain they reappear, and appear in all their magical freshness. But how account for the perfection of memory? Is the very tablet of the brain, in common with other portions of the body, is continually undergoing change, and within a certain period entirely renewed and entirely renewed? How remember, if the very remembrancer is annihilated? In order to explain this important difficulty, Dr. Winslow calls to aid the wonderful manner in which family peculiarities are handed down from generation to generation. A certain stamp of feature given by one member of a family will continue through a long descent, as we have all a portrait-gallery in memory; and little peculiarities, such as moles, twists of the fingers, a drooping of the eyelids, seem quite persistent. Some peculiarity, a hereditary taint, leaves its marks on their nails, which, however cut off, will continue to perpetuate themselves to the latest generation of life. Nothing appears to be lost in the process of growth the old and decaying particles of a succeeding generation, and thus corresponding with itself. The newer vesicle of the brain, thus stamped with a certain image, is succeeded by a new generation of vesicles as certainly a copy of that which went before them as a photograph is a duplicate of that which it images. In this manner, in consequence of the wonderful assimilative power of the blood, the brain is always changing, but in a state of health in ever changeless, and the latent impression will remain indefectible. But when disease commences, it is easily understood what vagaries may arise with respect to the memory. Dr. Winslow's work presents us with some most extraordinary examples of the aberrations of this living place, which amount to psychological curiosities of the most interesting kind. We are all familiar with the fact that, in the perfect health of memory in old age, the images of our youth seem revived within us.

The ideas stamped upon the brain in early youth, although long apparently forgotten, come back with the tenacity of actual childhood's reality. Here is reason to believe that in certain affections of the brain the memory retreats from us in a sequential manner. An Italian gentleman residing in New York, and who had acquired the English and then the English language, happening to be attacked with yellow fever, was observed that in the commencement of his illness he spoke the tongue of his native land, but that, in the middle of his disease, he spoke the language at the termination of his life. It is invariably the case, that our last prayers are delivered in our native tongue, notwithstanding that we may have disused it for a long period of time. It is also observable that, in many cases where the memory of recent events had been replaced by those of early life in persons suffering from illness, on the recovery of health the order of things was reversed, recent events recurring to the mind to the utter oblivion of older memories, the one replacing the other with the regularity of a dissolving view. But a still more extraordinary condition of the brain is that which Dr. Winslow points out, in which the loss of memory is total, consequent upon an attack of apoplexy. Many cases of this kind have been recorded, in which the mind on the one has been reduced to that of a young child, and all the elementary knowledge of youth has had to be acquired anew, the more singular fact of a double state of knowledge has been set up in the same person. For instance, a young lady, whose memory was well stored with the classics, suddenly fell asleep; on awaking it was discovered that she had lost all her acquired knowledge, and that her mind was reduced to a perfect blank. With great effort she was gradually mastering, as a child would, the first lessons of reading, when she suddenly fell into a sound sleep, on awaking from which it was discovered that she had recovered her original knowledge. The old and new states alternated with each other; at one moment she was the accomplished woman, at another she possessed the mental calibre of a child; in the old state she wrote a beautiful hand, in the new a stiff and constrained one, like that of a child. In this extraordinary condition she remained for four years; a double mind, as it were, took possession of her, the only consolation only of this case she may have happened to have been in at the time.

In others, again, the loss of memory is confined to particular objects. Dr. Greaves relates in a case of a farmer who, subsequent to a paralytic ill, lost the names of numerous objects and persons. He perfectly recollected, however, the initial letter of any substantive or proper name he wished to talk about. In the case of a word not to be recalled, in order to help himself in this difficulty, he was in the habit of taking with him a manuscript list of the words he had in the habit of speaking about; and these he arranged in an alphabetical order, which he read aloud with ease. He was used as follows: if he wished to ask any thing about a cow, before he commenced the sentence, he looked to the letter C in his list, and read the word Cow, and kept his finger and eye on the word until he had finished the sentence. This partial loss of memory was the consequence of paralysis; sometimes a singular transposition of letters is the only abnormal sign noticed. Dr. Winslow, for instance, mentions the case of a person who invariably reversed their order; for instance, he always said gog for dog and god for dog.

Sudden concussions of the brain arising from external injury sometimes produce a total loss of memory, extending for days or for several years. It is observable, however, that upon recovery the mind immediately recurs to the last action or thought it was engaged upon before the attack were suspended, and endeavors to continue its action. A little girl, engaged in play with some companions, fell and struck her head against a wall while catching a toy that was thrown to her. For three days afterward she was in a state upon opening her eyes, however, she immediately jumped to the side of the bed, and assuming the action of catching a ball, exclaimed, "I've got it, sure did you throw it?" A more singular instance still of the manner in which the brain will catch up and continue the thread of thought, even after a considerable lapse of time, is the following: "A British captain, while lying ashore on the Egyptian coast of this ship at the Battle of the Nile, was struck on the head by a shot, and immediately became senseless. He was taken home, and removed to Greenwich Hospital, where for fifteen months he evinced no sign of intelligence. He was then trephined; and immediately upon the operation being performed, consciousness returned, and he immediately began busying himself to see the orders carried out which he had given during the fifteen months previously. The clock-work of the brain, unaware that it had stopped, began to set going again, pointed to the exact minute at which it had left off.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Burnett's Cocoaine.

WATERVILLE, ME., Sept. 18, 1860.

MESSRS. JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.: DEAR SIRS.—I deem it but just to state to you some of the benefits I have derived from the use of your Cocoaine. Twelve years ago I had a dyspepsia fever; after my recovery I found myself troubled with an irritation of the scalp, which had continued to sweep my very much, and to alleviate it I had failed to find a remedy.

Having seen your Cocoaine advertised, I purchased a bottle only for the purpose of a hair dressing; but to my surprise, it has entirely removed the irritation of so long standing. Deriving so much benefit from its use, I have recommended it to several of my friends, who were afflicted in the same way, and it has wholly eradicated the disease.

To the Ladies!
Andrews' "Excelsior" Yeast Powder

Takes the precedence over all others, for the good reasons that

It is always perfectly pure in its ingredients, and none but the best ever are used, and it is always of the same strength.

It is reliable for any length of time in any climate, and the directions for its use are simple and explicable.

It is the shortening when used for making pastries or puddings, and the raised biscuit or bread MADE with this will be light, digestible, and delicious, and is sweeter and will keep fresher by several days than if made with lard. Saving the article of lard, it increases its weight, and is a great saving in economy to any family using it regularly.

It is ready for use in one minute!

It has been in use 12 years, and has been established over ten years!

We sell on an average 1200 case per day—over 250,000 per annum.

All the First Trade throughout the South, West, and East constantly patronize ANDREWS' EXCELSIOR YEAST POWDER, and the demand for it increases as it will over have any other.

Inquire for it of the Best Trade everywhere, and beware of the common deleterious mixtures, which are sold by unprincipled dealers for mercenary motives.

The Andrews' Excelsior Yeast Powders—the Standard Article for general excellence.

The Grover & Baker Noiseless Family Sewing Machine

is rapidly superseding all others for family use. The Double Lock-Stitch formed by this Machine is found to be the only one which will wear alike both sides of the seam, and, therefore, the only one permanently valuable for Family Sewing.

READ THE FOLLOWING TESTIMONY:

"Mrs. Josephine Davis considers the Instruments to Grover & Baker, and takes pleasure in saying that the machine sold her by their agent, Mr. Bassford, is the best it still in good order, makes a beautiful stitch, and does every variety of sewing."—Brooklyn, D. G.

"I take pleasure in saying, that the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine I bought of you has given entire satisfaction. After trying and returning others, I have three of them in operation in my different places, and, after four years' trial, have no fault to find."—J. H. Hammond, Founder, of South Carolina.

"My wife has had one of Grover & Baker's Family Sewing Machines for some time, and is so satisfied it is one of the best labor-saving machines that has been invented, that she now dispenses with the help of a hired girl in the public."—J. G. Harris, Governor of Tennessee.

"The Grover & Baker Sewing Machine has performed fully equal to representation. My negro clothes were made with it last fall, and again this spring, and the clothes for winter are now being made with it. The common sewers, braids, knitting, etc., were used for the clothes. It has been used on many fine articles, such as linen, cambric, for family wear. I am highly satisfied with it, and would not be deprived of its use for three times its cost, if I could not obtain another."—Jefferson Davis, Ex-Senator, U. S.

"On the recommendation of a friend, I procured, some months since, one of your Family Sewing Machines. My family has been most successful in its use from the start, and pronounce it the most valuable article in the management. My wife says it is a 'family blessing,' and could not be induced to part with it for twice its cost if a better could not be procured."—James Pollock, Ex-Governor of Pennsylvania.

New Hand-Power Cylinder Printing Machine.

The subscribers have recently constructed a NEW SINGLE CYLINDER PRINTING MACHINE, expressly designed for those offices where the business is not great to be done on an ordinary Hand-press, but not sufficient to warrant the purchase of a high-priced, fast Power Machine. In the construction of this press, economy has been studied throughout and substantial manner. attended to in every part, and the utmost reliability appointed. It has the capacity for printing any newspaper work can be done on it. One man at the crank can easily work off 700 to 800 impressions per hour. It is constructed so that steam-power may be applied when required.

Copy of our Illustrated Catalogue, containing particular description of this machine, with sizes and prices, will be furnished on application.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

For October, 1860.

The Stay-at-Home Traveler can, in this Number of the MAGAZINE, by the aid of Writers and Artists, visit some of the least known regions in various parts of the globe.—MR. MARSH will conduct him across the great Northwest plains of America, the present habitat of the buffalo, stretching to the "Red River and Beyond," introducing him to the Red Indians, who are the subject of a dissertation in these vast regions.—MR. ATHERTON will accompany him through the Pacific States and over the pastoral steppes of Northern Asia, making him at home in the camps of the Cossacks, the wild life of English, and the traits of Tartar nations.—CAPTAIN BURTON will lead him halfway across the Asian Continent, through the equatorial region unexplored by LIVINGSTONE and SPEKE.—The Traveler will be assisted by a guide QUICKER PENN, and HOPPER'S graceful illustrations; MR. DUNN'S sketches of Scotland; MR. CHILD'S sketch of a Dinner at the MAYOR'S, memorable on account of the guests convened to meet him; the Memorial Address noted in the Table of Contents, make up a Number of the MAGAZINE which, for Publishers' look, will prove acceptable to their Readers.

LITERARY NOTICES.
THE SUNNY SOUTH.—"We have rarely peeped within the covers of a more appetizing volume. Although not intended as an answer to the foul untruths in the Uncle Tom trash of the last ten years, it nevertheless does unmercifully hurl back to their source all lies of such a nature, and we are glad to believe that the book will be read in thousands of northern homes. The South, also, should take to it benignantly, for, independent of its truthfulness and integrity, it is one of the liveliest and most entertaining books of the year."—Times, Greensboro, N. C.
THE SUNNY SOUTH.—"This volume gives, so far as we can judge, faithful pictures of Southern life, without prejudice. The scenes presented are quite different from an 'Uncle Tom's Cabin,' and we think the portraits painted are in very sanity natural colors."—Boston Daily Bee.

WELCOME TO THE PRINCE OF WALES.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

WELCOME TO THE PRINCE OF WALES.

OUR artist has sketched on the preceding page a very pretty scene in THE RECEPTION OF THE PRINCE OF WALES; we hope the Prince himself will be fortunate enough to see as many lovely faces as light up our picture. The upper designs commemorate two of the most piquant adventures of the Prince since his arrival in this country: HIS FALL IN THE BALLROOM AT QUEBEC, when the loyal dames of that fine old city were thrown into convulsions by the sight of their Prince prone on the floor, and THE GAME AT LOO AT NIAGARA, THE PRINCE PLAYING AT WASHINGTON, AT MRS. SMITH'S BOARDING-SCHOOL, WITH MISS LANE AND MRS. SECRETARY THOMPSON. In the centre hence these scenes will possess a quaint historic interest.

THE EFFECT OF THE PRINCE'S VISIT.

THE moral effect of the visit of the Prince of Wales to this country will be felt long after the incidents of the tour are forgotten. It is not likely that we will ever forget the enthusiastic welcome which has greeted him in every city which he has visited. The only contretemps he has met with since he left home occurred, we are glad to say, not in the United States; or this country, and of our people, he will have none but pleasant recollections. He has been received here as he never was in any country but such as acknowledge his mother's sovereignty; and the progress must have been the more gratifying as it flowed spontaneously from the people of the United States, and was independent of the restraints of etiquette and the obligations of national courtesy. There is no use to confess, no other country in the world in which he could hope for such a reception.

That the event will have its effect, both in England and here, it is not unreasonable to hope. Though, under the Constitution of Great Britain, the power of the sovereign is very much less than it is a la despotic monarchy, all who have read the memoirs of the British statesmen of the past half century are aware that the sovereign has some power, and that ministers always respect any decided opinions he may entertain. If Albert the Good should carry away from this country an abiding regard for our people, and a firm resolution to maintain peace between the two branches of the Anglo-Saxon family, a British statesman, in his reign, would find it hard work to get up a war with us on any pretext.

On the other hand, his visit will help a very large proportion of our people to lose their prejudices against Great Britain. In the West, especially, where one thousands or more who only now England as a Power which has waged unjust wars against us twice, and which employed Hessians and Indians to commit barbarous atrocities upon our forefathers. That these people should feel pleasantly toward England is not to be expected. The visit of the Prince, his kindly manners, the calm and sensible good sentiment of his addresses, his visit to the tomb of Washington, are well calculated to produce a change in these feelings. He has certainly proves that, so far as the royal family is concerned, there has been vast progress in England since the time of George the Third. If they have lost their rancor, why not we also?

We are inclined to think that this visit of the Prince to the United States will prove one of the most beneficial measures of Queen Victoria's reign. If the peace can be preserved between Great Britain and the United States, it matters very little what other powers may do. France, Russia, Germany, Italy, Spain, and the Asiatic Powers may war as they please without troubling us or risking the cause of truth and civilization—so long as we keep out of the conflict. The only war that could really retard civilization, progress, liberty, and sound government would be one between this country and Great Britain—and the possibility of that war, we think, has been diminished by the Prince's visit.

TRANSATLANTIC STEAMERS.

THE loss of the Connaught deprives the Galway line of the only steamer they really owned. Advertisements in the papers, it is true, state that the line consists of five "first-rate sidewheel steamers of 4400 tons burden each"—what, the Connaught, Leinster, Ulster, Munster, and Persian. But this is merely a playful figure of speech. The Leinster, Ulster, and Munster exist only in imagination; one or two of them are said to be on the stocks; but none of the three have ever made a voyage. The Persian exists, but belongs to the West India Navigation Company; and instead of being 4400 tons, she is only about 1700. The Connaught, in like manner, was, we believe, only 2000, not 4400 tons as stated in the advertisement.

We are glad to notice that the splendid ships of the old Collins line, which have been so long laid up at their wharf, are placed on the berth for Europe once more. The Adriatic, as our readers are aware, has been running all summer, and is believed to have done a fine business. The Atlantic and Baltic will, we trust, prove equally fortunate. It is a high time that our ship-owners were bestirring themselves, if they do not wish the control of the ocean to pass entirely out of our hands into those of England.

WHAT WILL BECOME OF THE POPE?

ACCORDING having fallen, the fate of Rome seems no longer doubtful. England warns Sardinia not to molest Venice; the French Emperor declares that he will protect "the Pope" for no one says that Rome is to be withheld from the conquering army of Italy. Under the circumstances, it would not be surprising if, by the time this paper was in our readers' hands, Rome had already followed Naples and Ancona, and Garibaldi were in a position to fulfill his promise of proclaiming the Kingdom of Italy from the height of the Quirinal.

The Pope must leave Rome. No one can object to that more than we. It would be fatal to the Emperor Napoleon to make war at once for the sake of maintaining the Pope, whose temporal power he has so emphatically declared to be inconsistent with the interests of the peninsula. Where will the Pope go?

First, probably, to Gaeta—where he took refuge the last time he was driven out from Rome, and where he will find congenial society and kindred misery with Francis of Naples and his Queen.

But he can not stay at Gaeta. A very few days hence we shall hear that Garibaldi has taken Capua, and that the Neapolitans are in full retreat upon Gaeta. Then the Pope will find a home either at Vienna or Madrid; but where will the Pope go?

A significant item of news by the Africa is the announcement that the Pope has warned the Emperor Napoleon that he will leave Rome if the Emperor does not withdraw his garrisons. Has it never occurred to the Pope, or to the cardinals who are said to have recommended flight, that this may be just what Napoleon wants? His uncle prized so highly the possession of the person of the Pope that he actually brought him to Paris a prisoner, and kept him in confinement against his most urgent prayer, and to the scandal of all good Catholics. In his memoirs he emphatically states that one of the greatest mistakes ever made by the Kings was to have suffered the Popes to leave Avignon; that France is the natural home for the head of the Church. It is perhaps more likely to have forgotten or repudiated this characteristic idée Napoléonienne? And is it not quite possible that he is quietly watching the progress of events which, in all human probability, are going to throw into his hands a prize which his uncle risked revolution and the undying hatred of the Church by seizing by force?

OUR IRISH SOLDIERS.

A NUMBER of Irish militiamen of the First Division New York State Militia held a meeting last week and resolved not to parade before the Prince of Wales, or to take any steps to do honor to the son of the woman who only then termed the oppressor of Ireland. Accordingly, on Thursday last the 69th Regiment, composed mainly of Irishmen, did not appear on parade with the rest of the Division.

The order to the militia of the First Division to parade on 11th October was issued according to military rule, by the General commanding the Division. It was in strict conformity with the militia law; and the rules of the service. The law is that a militiaman shall act as a soldier, and is liable to the same rules and penalties as soldiers in the United States army. If soldiers in the United States army refuse to parade on their superior officer to parade, were to refuse and to hold meetings to express their reasons for refusing, they would be deemed mutineers, and would be liable to be shot. What shall be done with the Irish militiamen who refuse to obey orders, and turn out in honor of the Prince of Wales?

It is argued on behalf of the 69th Regiment that they had performed the parades required by law, and that they were not bound to turn out again. If this were true, the indecency of the action of the Irish in sticking for such a point in defiance of the unanimous sentiment of our people must render them very unpopular.

We should be sorry to seem to pander to the prejudices which, among all classes of Americans against Irishmen. All prejudices are a mistake; and every one knows that there have been and are good and true Irishmen, who have been faithful to their friends, obedient to the law, and loyal to the cause of truth and right. But it does strike us that the 69th Regiment, which has obtruded itself upon public notice by refusing to obey orders, and which tried its best to mar the reception of the nation's guest by creating trouble in the ranks of the militia, has taken a step which can not but exasperate public feeling against the Irish race. It ought not to be necessary to remind them that every American has personally responsible for the reception of the Prince of Wales, and that it is hardly possible to conceive any thing more shocking to the mass of our people than an affront offered to him from any quarter.

If there are any Irishmen among us who have influence among their countrymen, we entreat them, for their own sake, to reflect for a moment on the attitude of the Irish race in this country.

We know for nearly a quarter of a century been receiving several thousand Irishmen annually among us. We have given them land —almost for nothing; employment at far better wages than they could have obtained at home; and political rights equal to those which are enjoyed by the sons of the best and noblest Americans. Many have come to us steeped in ignorance and superstition; we have let them have their priests and their churches, and when fanatic Protestants have tried to disturb them, we have resisted it, and have successfully protected them in what we believe to be a mistaken creed. They have so behaved themselves that nearly seventy-five per cent. of our criminals and paupers are Irish; that fully seventy-five per cent. of the criminal violence committed among us are the work of Irishmen; that the system of universal suffrage in large cities has fallen into discredit through the incapacity of the Irish for self-government; yet we have never countenanced any invidious legislation against them, never thought of depriving them of any political rights they already have never sought to protect ourselves against their misconduct. As militiamen and soldiers they are quiet and generally keen as absolute nuisance. It is not worth while to repeat the story of the two Irish regiments which served under Jackson at New Orleans; in the war of 1812, or of the Irishmen who deserted from our army and constituted the battalion of San Patricio, in the Mexican war; these, and other similar affairs, are too frequently recalled to memory by such outbursts of folly and insubordination as the recent refusal to turn out in honor of the Prince of Wales. Yet no respectable party in this State has ever proposed to deprive the Irishmen of their arms, or to exclude them from the militia.

We entreat our Irish fellow-citizens not to presume too far upon the forbearance of our people. This is not a time for any such experiments of the kind. The spectacle of the ignominious surrender of the Irishmen in Lawrence's army, who had volunteered to assist the Pope in keeping down his Italian subjects, has not yet been forgotten. Before our Irishmen threat themselves anew under the public reprobation, they will allow the effluvia of this transaction to pass away.

THE LOUNGER.

EVENING DRESS.

THE question is, whether the Ball Committee did right in issuing a circular, that the guests were expected to appear in evening dress, and then to define what evening dress is. The answer to the system would be found in the fact that these thousand people who would attend the ball were, many of them, not used to the delicate distinctions of evening and morning dress, and that it was a satisfaction to them to know precisely what they were expected to wear. If private room issues invitations to an ordinary private ball, she makes no allusion to "evening dress," because she knows that all her friends understand the etiquette of such an occasion. The Committee of the Prince's ball knew—better other people did or—that the guests would not be perfectly understood that etiquette. In any case, the suggestion involved no startling novelty, and only went to show that uniform in the attire in which they wait upon the President of the United States at his levees. There is no reason why they should know what constitutes "evening dress," and certainly no reason in such matters of dress why those in a ball wished simply to make sure that there should be no grotesque attire, and they took the simplest means of securing that object.

INTERCEPTED CORRESPONDENCE.

DEAR MR. JENKINS,—I have read all you have written about the dust, precious Prince—who is he? You have told us how he fell down on the prairies and tore his trousers—poor, dear young man! And then you have gratified our curiosity by letting us know that the navigators bit him dreadfully in the leg—navigators, he, naughty, ugly, disgusting, wicked things! And you were so kind, too, in that information about the bathing-rooms in Philadelphia. Dear Albert Edward! then you love to wash yourself in the morning! And do you use coarse towels, and scrubbing-brushes, and hair gloves; and oh! do you, don't you, most august of princes, use yellow soap? Dear Mr. Jenkins, you ought not to forget to mention these things. What is the use of telling us that he loves to wash himself, if you don't tell us how he does himself? Then, should brothers and sisters love to wash themselves, too? And the Prince Consort himself? And the Queen herself? How pleasant it must be for you to be taken round and shown the bath-rooms, and the nest of tubs—the easy-chairs, and the sofas, and the curtains, and the bed! Precious privilege!

Dear Mr. Jenkins, we all want to know one thing. We feel sure you would have mentioned it had it been a place, because you are such a perfect gentleman that you do not fail to mention every thing of the kind. You know the weather is getting very cold. Last year I was seen some really sharp days; and although we may have some really sharp days, still it will generally be frosty at night. Please inform us in your next what you wear in the frosty days, and you know how icily cold Boston is—whether the Prince has put on his winter flannels. And does he wear Cuxon flannel or wool flannel? And have the shirts long sleeves or short? And if they are long, don't they poke out beyond his waistcoats, and is he not obliged to turn them up? which must be so uncomfortable to his arms. And if they are short, how cold are they? And why are they short? And doesn't he wear long arms sometimes? Dearest Sir, please mention whether he has put on winter flannels, and prickly pear coats and readers.

SPEIGLER INSTITUTE.

MUNICIPAL.

JUDGE PIERREPOINT has resigned his office. When the City Hall building was burned his courtroom disappeared. He tried to find it in the lofts of an engineer's office, but in vain. The Tammany Hall. The Superior Court has been, so to say, "squatting" about; now on pillar, now on post. The Judge has been stifled and left to die smothered in the search. The Legislature promised to help him to a room in a new and handsome building; but when the proper persons tried to find the proper spot in the Park for the new building to hold the old Court, some other proper persons said that then that there was no proper spot in the Park for such a purpose, and if there were, that there were no proper means of getting possession of it. The Judge thereupon throws up the whole matter. The Superior Court is evidently not wanted. It seems to think; for if it were the people would find some decent, reputable place to put it in. Lofts of engineers' offices Tammany Hall!

In throwing up his office the learned magistrate also throws up a letter to the Governor, which is as full of point as it is sly-and-dry humor. The point of it is a gimmerow way; but it is as full of truth as an egg of meat. "In short," says Judge Pierrepoint, "it has been discovered, after many years of trial, that no man or body of men in this municipal government have any power to do any substantial thing except to stay the action of every other man or body of men. The machinery of the city government is so cunningly devised that each wheel can stop the motion of every other, and so that the whole shall by no possibility move in harmony together."

Dickens was thought to be a caricaturist, and old Mother Grundy shook and scolded like a most dismal voice when he called the English Government a Circumlocution Office and a science of how not to do it. But what he exhibited in science in England, it is simple ugly truth in New York.

He proceeds to say that the people want good rulers, and would vote for them if they had a chance. First catch your hare, says Mrs. Glass. He continues by declaring that the government will only be successful when it is made harmonious with the principles which the Almighty has inseparably established in man. And here I am sufficiently than to catch the hare, says Judge Pierrepoint. The same amount of time and half the money spent in giving a dozen to the Prince of Wales would give New York city "a strong, a lasting, and a good government." How to persuade people to do, do you ask? Why, by showing the rich men that if they do not take care the following of the poor they will be in the loss of their properties. We are all tumbling head over heels over each other in the mad race to be rich, he says. We are all trying to get the wealthy people in the bad, ignorant, and idle manage the government. "Government will be administered by somebody; that may be certain," he says. If the wise and good will not attend to it, fools and knaves will."

That is the priceless pearl of wisdom for this people; and the most curious sign of showing that we have had for a long time is the fact that such sentiments emanate only in a New York mouth, and not only uttered but evidently believed. The spirit of our society, says Judge Pierrepoint, is "making leaders of the women and young men," he says. "Already the success of a lawyer is determined by the money that he makes; already the success of a minister of Christ is to be more estimated by the salary which he receives; and the time is fast coming when the success of the head of the bench will be measured by the money which he shall there accumulate."

In the vast tumult of a Presidential canvass, and the airy episode of a Prince's visit, and the universal devil-take-the-hindmost which absorbs the mighty mind of the metropolis, it is not in the least degree probable that any body will read or heed the wise and timely letter of the Judge. He knows it. He is ready for martyrdom. But he says all the more truly, "If our wise and good, faithful, intelligent, and honest citizens will, these things of no moment, they will let them alone, as they have heretofore done: but they may rely upon it these things will not let them alone."

"HISTORICAL PICTURES RETOUCHED."

THE recent opening of the Woman's Library in this city was signalized by clever speeches from Editor Raymond, Clergyman Beecher, and Lawyer Brady. The pursuits of the speakers, and their representative characters, show how sincerely any effort of this kind is hailed. In fact, half the objections to new views are really only to the way in which they are presented. The ridicule which attaches to the words "Women's Rights," is mainly excited by the grotesque or ridiculous way in which they are so often presented; and as there is, after all, a very profound belief latent in the human mind that we have not yet reached the end of all things, so unquestionably there is a quiet conviction that the doctrine of the spade to him who can use it, and all the apishes to all who can use them, will be constantly more and more recognized in the advance of society.

The book with the title which heads these paragraphs is a most timely, copious, and brilliant contribution to the history and literature of women. It is, in fact, a fourteen upon this theme, "The Creation of women to their just position in society depends upon themselves." It will present a series of sparkling and striking portraits, crayons, sketches, profiles, and studies of all the most prominent and interesting women in history who have illustrated that idea. But the author, Mrs. Dall, is a scholar and thinker, and her every sketch, therefore, is a biographical dictionary, but a collection of illustrative lives. Her views of many famous women differ, often, from the popular traditional views; but they are the result of her own original observation. Her "study" of Aspasia is fresh and fine. Her defense of Hypatia against Charles Kingsley's representation of her is brave and reasonable. Her simple and historical statement of the position of women in the healing art, and her sketches of the most eminent among them, are as interesting as admirable. There is a glow of tenderness and sympathy in the book which fuses it into unity, and leaves a most unusually impression.

Mrs. Dall's previous thoughtful little work, "Woman's Right to Labor," states, in a good-humored, trenchant, and brilliant manner, the doctrine, which the women who crowd with their vavasious splendor and genius the pages of this one illustrated. It was the work of much experience, of laborious study and collation, of a clear brain and a true heart; and it was entirely free from every blot which offends popular. The same characteristics belong to the "Historical Pictures Retouched," except that it has the elements of a more general popular interest. Like the first, it is one of the best books that could be given to every girl in the land.

FORWARD!

THE great work goes on in Europe. Ancona has surrendered to the Sardinians, and Lamoricière is prisoner. Unhappy man! If he were an old Roman he would kill upon his sword. Yet ten years ago Pius the Ninth the name of Lamoricière was the signal of enthusiasm. He was invested with the same kind of gallant glory that invested the old Marshal Ney, chivalric, heroic, patriotic—the future settled on him if on any man.

His error was told last week when his portrait appeared in the Weekly. It is simply tragical. Its end is mean and miserable. He heads a band of foreign mercenaries to defend the worst despotism in the world; and he is ignominiously beaten in the field and captured in a fortress to which he retires, and which he can not maintain. It is not easy to foresee his future, unless he be permitted quietly to leave the country and seek an asylum in America or England.

As for the great Italian liberator, he moves steadily forward, and he shows a dangerous opposition to disagree with Cavour. Dangerous, because Cavour is evidently the wisest statesman Italy has had for many years, and because to the reason for difference urged by Garibaldi is insufficient. He says that he can have no friendship with a man who has consented to part with a province of Italy. But if that were the best possible measure at the time, if it were honest and true, and by Cavour, however mistakenly, is it noble or generous to assume that Cavour is an enemy of the country? Garibaldi has a right to feel so, but that it was necessarily unpatriotic or dishonest to do what Cavour has done.

Cavour is faithful to King Victor—and so is Garibaldi. Their policy may differ in some details, but they are both bent upon a united Italy. Each may choose his own methods, the difference appears, and Cavour says that he is ready to make it. Garibaldi virtually declares that he must have his way or none. But certainly he will not sacrifice his Italy to any personal pique. He will not prefer the separation of his province to France—just as did the people of the province. If Cavour did it in obedience to the popular will, it could not be unjust to call him to account.

It is hardly to be believed that, with an opportunity such as has not been known in her history, with a patriotic brain and heart and hand such as have never combined for her deliverance, Italy will fail again. It would be the vilest fate, that the union of these two men, at least the union of their power and policies, should be impossible, then we may well fear that the jealousy of that nation of people will forever defeat their aspiration, and that the hope of a regenerated, emancipated, national Italy, is but a foolish dream.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A FRESHLY VENTED.—"Might I tempt you to venture upon vin orange?" "I should be happy to oblige you, Madame," said the young man who was thus kindly invited by a lady, "but I'm afraid I should fail of." The Prince of of Wales' march in the same way at Kingston and other places in Canada, would not venture near the Orange, for fear, not of being led, but of being out. They might have been a falling off of his popularity had he yielded to the influence of the Orange lodges, who acted already more like meddlers than orange. If we were asked to say what were the Prince of Wales' relation, we should not hesitate for a moment to reply:—The Orange in Upper Canada."

THE MOVEMENT OF EVENTS IN ITALY.—"B. Peter's Chair sings the way."

HOW TO TRY IT.—The Prince of Wales promises to be as great a traveler as he is an accomplished dancer. His next intention is to go through all the steppes of Russia.

The young lady who burnt into tears has been put together again, and is now sending loggs to prevent the recurrence of the accident.

BRENNUS AT THE SCALES.

Again the bills of Italy
Echo the din of war,
Again the cannon thunder
To Rome, from land and for,
And in the midst, the mighty
The seven-hilled Garibaldi,
But not, as erst, with conquest's sword
Held in Barbarian hand!

When Rome, an infant giant,
First-gnawed her sword-sided blight,
The stalwart Latin warriors poured forth
To crush the rising might.
There spoke the Roman Quirey,
The red Gaul at his side,
And never yet the world helpless down,
Before the sweeping tide.

But Hercules' high purpose needed
That clang of battle-cry,
And nerved the stately senators
To meet the onward tide
In robes of white, on chairs of state,
They bowed their heads to hear
Gallout Cymric fire and Gaulish ire,
As swept the surge!

Strange, how despite the ill-matched freight
The scales uncertain play,
While still on death, with fitted breath,
We watch them as they sway.
And with no sign of victory yet or woe
That in the up-hot beam
The souls of the two mighty things his sword
Will be the scale to rise!

Were this a man our will could scan,
The chance were then more clear;
Small doubt would there be of the scale would bear
The weight of Rome's high hopes.
With clear and lofty brow, and eye
Where truth and valor hung,
Were he a hand of Roman mould
Long since the sword were flung!

But what is truth and what is truth,
What human hopes and fears,
Whose fortunes ways sheds our gaze,
To match the Eternal's years?
One thing alone to faith is known,
Heaven wills whate'er will be!
And this man's hand, and this man's brand,
Are God's that glitter!

How changed the men, how changed the parts!
The scene alone the same.
Now Hercules the Gaul the invaders,
And works the invaded shame.
For pitiful, hollow, mimic, lingering hands,
The mast-hook for the glaive;
A flutter'd, rippling rag for steel,
For cenote stern and grave!

Still hoboth well the gauntlet—
Like in stature and limb—
On what is done doth still look on,
As Brennus, chief of Gaul,
Not frank and bold like him of old,
That laid his sword in scale,
But a masked brow—a muffled hand,
That grasps a doubtful blade!

Again the shield-god is brought forth,
Again Rome's fortune hangs,
Though other weights are in the plates,
Than lives and arms and fangs.
Old Rome went free—her conscience,
A thousand-fold gold,
Now, Europe's hope against a Pope's
Unequal weight is sold!

THE ART OF CORRESPONDENCE.—With men, the great difficulty is in beginning a letter—with women, the great difficulty is in finishing one. Many a letter is not expressed by the algebraical "x," for it's a letter that always stands an unknown quantity. Every postscript is a problem of itself.

THE LONG VACATION.—The King of Naples has had so many letters addressed to him by the gentlemen of the press, on the business of a most moving and distressing nature, that he has left Naples, and it is to be hoped that the country just to enjoy a little Gaeta.

MRS. GRAY LOVES, at present a star of some magnitude in the literary firmament, is a contributor so, for nothing can be more amiable than her manners, and nothing more delightful than her conversation, but unfortunately she has the faculty of pleasing others by eliciting from them their reservations and opinions. Like all the votaries of the lyre and witchery, she knows so well how to apply. One of the best known Mr. Alfred Bunn's pupils, he was on for precisely that difficult gentleman in private concert, Mr. Simpkins, by the by,

"Well," said the modest tenor at last, "I will sing 'My pretty Jane,' on condition that you don't say me some sort of compliment—as that the company shall decide to be with."

"Surely," said Mrs. Loftus, "you are not so determined to have nothing said to you that you have a previous objection? Surely you will surrender without that article?"

"That is impossible," observed the fair lady, "for we all know Mr. Alfred Bunn's pupil is a very modest man."

A colored, who is fond of telling tough 'uns, especially stories of which he himself is the hero, lately drew the longest bow of the season. "Massa," said he, "you may rely on official testimony. During my stay a hero—one came off from Jamaica, and he was the biggest liar I ever met with. I went to see it. Just as the landing-place was reached, the boat struck on a rock, and the hero rather roughly. Some time after I was in Jamaica when I strike. Now, massa, you know I'm not a fool, but him a blow that sent him right off his head into a field, where he lay with him nose on the ground for weeks and weeks. The fellow lay a short time, then he raised himself up on his elbow and looked chillyvarone him. "Gentlemen," said he, "dat thus shows dem much as dem tell you about Jamaica rum."

LIKE YOURSELF.—In a Scotch parish there was an ancient of the name of Saunders, where was reported to be very rich. He died, and left a will, in which he ordered a drawing a pig to market. "Wast, Saunders," quoth his friend, "you're driving a pig to market." "Ay, Sandie," said he, "Ma sel, laird; he's jist an auld acquaintance, like yourself."

IT DOESN'T MAKE IT SO.

Suppose, for instance, you suppose
That black is white—that two is slow—
That every wind is mild that blows,
That all that's new is old—
It really doesn't make it so.

Suppose, for instance, that you suppose
That bright-eyed love can't say you "No"—
That she delights all your foes,
It really doesn't make it so.

"Mother," said a little boy, the other day, "I know what I would do if I was a man, and the men were drawn ing, and they should draw lots to see who should be killed and eaten, and it should come to me—I'd jump into the sea." "But," said the mother, "you can't swim fish you up." "Ah," said he, "but I wouldn't drink it."

JUVENILE CURIOSITY.—"Won't you cut open a penny for me, father?" said a little girl, when she came home from school one day.

"Cut up a penny! What do you want me to do that for?" asked the father.

"Cause," said the little girl, "our teacher says that in every penny there are four farthings, and I want to see them."

An Irishman was indicted at the assizes, at Tralee, for felony. His innocence was proved, but notwithstanding that the jury found him guilty. The judge was shocked, and said, "Gentlemen of the jury, such a sentence was indeed by perse."

"Yes," said the foreman, "he is innocent of the crime now charged against him, but he stole my gray mare last Christmas."

A romance-reading young man was one day passing a mustard farm, when he was struck with love at sight of a heath, and a fine buck-ground of barren rocks and dark pines. The owner, the farmer, who was grinning his way through the rugged earth. "A magnificent locality, Sir!—one of Nature's finest!" the romantic young man began.

"Oh, yes," said the farmer, wiping the large drops of perspiration from his brow, "pretty of the place to look well, but if you had to plow up the place of the ground, you'd wish the place at Jericho."

A public dinner in Edinburgh had dwindled away to two guests, an Englishman and a Highland gentleman, who were each trying to prove the superiority of their native countries. Of course at an argument of this kind a Scotchman soon becomes a downright nuisance. The Highlander's logic was so good that he beat his opponent upon every point. At last the Englishman put a query. "You will," he said, "at least admit that England is larger in extent than Scotland."

"Certainly not," was the confident reply. "You see, Sir, there is no comparison between the two countries. You see, all our hills were rolled out flat, we should beat you by hundreds of square miles."

Said a convicted young lady:—"You men are a cruel-ue set."

A man has a shrewd suspicion that he says the certain him when he is thinking of something else. He is generally so over, and he doesn't know but—however. Poor fellow! he writhes like a Frenchman, but, alas! no one can hold a recall youth as he calls his pointer—with a whistle.

"Stirring times!" as the Scotch bass said when she was drinking perrilous.

THE FIREMEN'S PARADE.

On the evening of Saturday, 13th, the firemen of New York paraded in honor of the Prince of Wales, who was a spectator of the scene on the following page. Nearly five thousand men, all in uniform, were in the procession; and the effect of the countless torches, Drummond lights, transparencies, and various illuminated devices, as the fiery train swept down Fifth Avenue, under the vast crowd on either side, was striking and impressive. It is not likely that the Prince ever saw such a sight before, and he selected such a scene for a subject of his picture the moment when the procession was passing the Fifth Avenue Hotel: the Prince stands on the balcony with his suite, and bows his thanks.

THE BALL IN HONOR OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.

We publish on pages 664 and 665 a picture of the grandest ball which has been given in the city of New York—we mean, of course, the entertainment offered to the Prince of Wales at the Academy of Music, on the 12th inst. Every one of the persons present—those the crème de la crème of New York society—had received cards from the manager in which the self-constituted managers performed their task—of the greedy monopoly of Dickey's private boxes—and the effect of the decoration from the charmed list of names which should have been there. But it is not necessary to dilate upon those matters. The ball was a great success, and, so far as seeing the Prince went, a success. We proceed to give, from the daily papers, a few memoranda of the ball and supper rooms.

THE BALL AND SUPPER ROOMS.

"The ball-room comprised the parquette of the Academy, and extended to the stage. It was one hundred and thirty-five feet in length by sixty-eight feet in breadth. The end beyond the stage was arranged in a semi-circular form, while toward the other end were placed three superb couches. The centre one of which was a gilt throne, with the Prince of Wales' crest side wise for his sofas. Following out the general idea originally agreed on, the decorations were chiefly of evergreens, flowers, and flags. There were a vast number of chandeliers, fitted up expressly for the occasion; while there were also, near the stage, some of the usual arrangements of lights above brilliantly even among the rest. The parquette and dress circle were also engaged in planning the floor, covering the whole of the space, preparatory to the duties of the ballding. It was a fortunate extremity. This part of the arrangement was particularly liberal—the order being to spare no expense. Some idea of the extent of the additional lights will be derived when it is mentioned that throughout the ballding, up to every flight of stairs, and in the corridors, were laid on for the occasion, and that three hundred additional gas-burners were placed on the gas-fixtures expressly for that special purpose.

"The supper room was especially erected for the occasion. It is situated in the space of ground between the Academy and the Mollusk College. In length it is one hundred and forty-four feet by sixty-six in breadth. Connecting with the ball-room and the supper-room is a passage facing on Fourteenth Street, and which also is fifty feet in length and twenty-five feet in breadth. This passage is floored with wood—and is covered by a roof of the ballding, same as the ball and supper rooms. The cloth furnished for the occasion is five hundred yards and was specially dyed for the occasion, as there was not a sufficient quantity of that colored cloth in the city for the purpose. Twenty tons of evergreens, containing its leaves, were unpacked from the roof, making a brilliant display. The ballding, which, though temporary, was constructed in such a manner as would have baffled the character of a more permanent one, for the arrangements for ventilation were perfect. In the centre was a tower, rising some fifty feet from the level of the street, while two dormer windows were placed at each end. The entire building was draped in alternate stripe of pink and white muslin, with appropriate devices. The stripe were twenty-five in number, and made a splendid show. All along the supper-room were two tables, from top to bottom, at which the seven-tied party took supper at a late period of the evening. They were brilliant in all the appointments of gold, silver, and china-ware. At the upper end was the Prince's table, raised on a dais, semi-circular in form, at which the guest of the evening and his immediate suite were placed."

THE GUESTS.

The Herald reporter says: "The Academy, at ten o'clock, was filled, and those who arrived later sank ungraded into the throng, the rear-door into the room. The private boxes were full; the tiers were occupied by those who preferred to overlook the brilliant assemblage which moved restlessly beneath. The Japanese ball was crowded; but there the crowd was divided into sections by the various rooms; but here in one vast area was collected the élite of New York society. Beneath the thousands—gas-lights the crowd ranged backward and forward, shifting and changing like the figure in a kaleidoscope, or like the vain rippling beneath gentle winds and bright sunshine. There was no join, for 'a join' expresses a fixed, immovable, only of perfect; this was rather a shoving, a crowding, a pushing, versatile, fickle, quick, changing. A sea of heads, but besides a sea of heads, the light flashing back from the gems and richest of dresses, from pearly white shoulders and bosoms. Sometimes, from below, from lower down, a ring in brightness the eye which flashed above them. The fullness black could not control the impression of the whole, set the blaze of the thousand lamps. The rich military uniforms, the sombre dress coats, and epaulets, relieved the uniformity of the gentlemen's toilets. The company seemed to diminish the size of the house, and yet, by a common and singular paradox, added to the appearance of great extent. The ballet, but not loosened; crowded, but with plenty of room for all to move comfortably and without disturbance—for separate entrances were reserved for egress and ingress—the Academy was ready for the arrival of the Prince."

THE PRINCE.

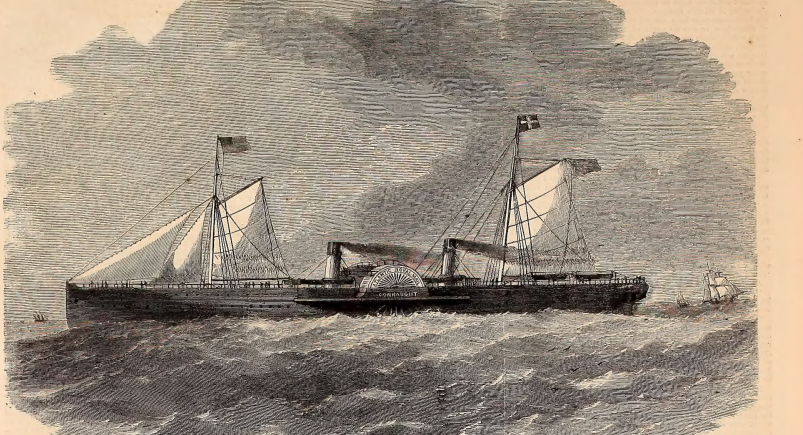
The Herald reporter says: "The ladies of New York are already celebrated for the taste and costliness of their dress, and the toilets at the most recherche ball ever assembled in New York were, therefore, certain to be distinguished by a beauty and splendor only equaled by the glories of fairy-land. The first effect upon the senses was that of dazzling as to render it impossible to separate any distinct or individual effect. Everyone seemed to be in robes of white, here diaphanous and falling in rich flowy folds over, jewels pulsing before the eye of bright and dancing light, looking back, and then veiled back grounds, gold and silver glittering in the transparent gossamer fabrics. Here and there a contrast of color in the vases precious substance that they looked like cloth of gold; silver grounds, fair as the shining, looking back to the gold and stately moire; flowers, ribbons, jewels, fans, feathers, and the odor of a thousand perfumes, all mingling with the light and color, and the graceful motion of the dance. Yet the beauty of ladyhoodness we undeviated to single out some of the toilets, not perhaps those most in the mode of making, but which were distinguished for their good taste, and may serve as a guide in sustaining the ladies of the coming winter."

The Times reporter writes: "One might almost have fancied himself in St. Petersburg, for although a single thousand persons would have driven a man almost downgrav or dame before you quite mad with envy, yet the distribution of diamonds was so wide that, glanced at from a distance, by no means a small effect was obtained in the coup d'œil of the ball. One splendid exception which recently attracted much attention at the court of Russia was thoroughly displayed upon the graceful beauty of Mrs. Belmont, and whose one row of her glittering stones that she had on upon the right of the stage, a quarter, by-the-way, much affected during the evening by numbers of the fair sex, because on fair ladies, partly perhaps from shews and partly from its advantages as a capital setting to such lovely pictures.

"Diamonds were, however, the exception to the rule, of which even the crowd, the crushing and the crash, could not suppress the effect in the end, rich, and beautiful way, was something marvelous. It was as if all the boons of the world had made a vassal repository for such a grand fair in New York. One only embarrassment is in the midst of such a scene, and so, we said before, we will not set. There passes before us, as the masses of the queens of the evening flow up in our memory, such a kaleidoscope of stars—such a galaxy of beauty. We are gazing, friends, that it seems idle to attach mortal names to such a phantasmagoria of loveliness. We will not be guilty-spoken of Mrs. Morgan and her diamonds, and of Mrs. Belmont and her diamonds, and of Mrs. Wright go on the same way, with perfect truth, to speak of half the ladies of New York and their diamonds. We must content ourselves, for they were rather the rule than the exception of the evening. Mrs. Robert H. Morris was conspicuous for her fine taste in dress with a waving band-dress of artificial feathers, altogether courtly and precious, without reference to its implied compliment to the Prince and his plume. Mrs. Morris was also notable in a glory of blue moire antique, powdered with jewels, and Mrs. Grinn-la, in black moire antique, decidedly declined the condition of a 'dowager.' A delicate shade of mauve-color, flowered with diamonds, did very second a sort of frosted amethyst, and added over with glistening diamonds, excited the express of more than one taste. Mrs. Hamilton Fish, and the moue of the drama, in the person of Mrs. Hoey, of Wallack's Theatre, were conspicuous personages in the evening hue."

AN INCIDENT.

"While the royal party were observing the wing and the decorations of the ball-room, a sudden movement of the crowd beckoned announced that some accident was about to happen, and in a moment after one of the flower vases upon the front tier fell with a g eat crash to the floor, scattering the vase to people around below by, but fortunately injuring no one. There was a moment's confusion, and then the crowd began to retire, returning from the neighborhood of the vases, remained silent, while the committee proceeded to the spot with an air of dignity, of which the following is a copy:



1. Quadrille.....Haute Volee.....Strauss.
2. Waltz.....Prince of Wales.....Morin.
3. Lancers.....Delmonico.....Musard.
4. Galop.....Soiree.....Michaelis.
5. Quadrille.....Bouquet.....Strauss.
6. Polka.....Adieu.....Koenig.
7. Waltz.....Rebecca.....Laurent.
8. Lancers.....Royal Prince Gavotte.....Laurent.
9. Galop.....Una Sommora.....Musin.
10. Waltz.....Mont Rosa.....Labitzky.
11. Lancers.....Via-di-Via.....Retzel.
12. Polka.....Delphine.....Strauss.
13. Galop.....Liederkranz.....Noll.
14. Quadrille.....Les Rosiers.....Strauss.

18. Polka.....Sans Souci.....Strauss.
19. Lancers.....Original.....Koenig.
20. Waltz.....Dream of the Crown.....Gung.
21. Galop.....Ernani.....Verdi.

"Scarcely had the Prince taken his card when another flower-vase fell, and the utmost alertness and skill of the dancing-boys gave way with a great crash, fortunately injuring no one, however. At the crowd retired, frightened, to various parts of the floor, it gave way beneath them. This was three times repeated, two persons being precipitated to the stage beneath, but not being injured. The floor rather sank than fell, the prop beneath it being insufficient to sustain the weight of the throng. The gentlemen of the committee generally, of the sub-committee of the house and decorations particularly, must divide the blame of this contretemps with the carpenters, who should have understood and completed their work much better."

The ball was kept up till five o'clock; the Prince left at half past four.

GRAND TORCH-LIGHT PARADE OF THE NEW YORK FIREMEN IN HONOR OF THE PRINCE OF WALES, PASSING THE FIFTH AVENUE HOTEL, OCTOBER 15, 1860.—[SEE PRECEDING PAGE.]

THE STEAMSHIP "CONNAUGHT," BURNED AT SEA, OCTOBER 7, 1860.

THE LOSS OF THE STEAMSHIP "CONNAUGHT."

WE publish above a picture of the steamship Connaught, which was burned at sea on Sunday, 7th inst., 140 miles from Boston. She was on her western voyage, and had left St. Johns, Newfoundland, on 5th. The history of the wreck is thus described by the Captain:

"Saturday, the 6th inst., at eight o'clock P.M., one hundred and forty miles east of Boston, the Connaught sprang a leak in the engine-room. Succeeded in keeping it below the fires until one o'clock on Sunday morning, when it commenced to gain rapidly, and finally extinguished the fires. At half past nine o'clock discovered smoke from the aft smoke-hole. Notwithstanding the utmost exertions to prevent it, the fire gained rapidly, and very soon drove the cabin passengers on deck. As the water and fire both gained so fast, the boats were got ready to save the passengers. There was a heavy sea running, and the first boat that was lowered was stove. Six other boats were then launched successfully, and all of them filled with passengers. About twelve o'clock the brig Miranic Schipfer saw our signals of distress and bore down to us. At seven P.M. commenced the task of embarking the passengers on board the brig, that vessel having attached a hawser to the steamer. At this time the starboard side of the steamer was very hot. By half past nine P.M. all the passengers were placed safely on board of the brig."

A passenger thus feelingly describes the rescue of himself and companions:

"The gallant little Yankee brig sailed alongside and hove to, seeing our deplorable situation, and showing every sign of anxiety for us; but we began to think it would be impossible to stow all our numbers on board, she looked so small. We have since ascertained that she was only 198 tons burden. Captain Leitch made all haste to get us into the boats, which was extremely difficult, being lowered one by one with ropes (Captain Leitch stood by all the time), commencing with the women and children. But with all the exertion that could be made, when the sun went down only about two hundred had been got on board the brig. Captain Wilson, of the brig, said, 'This is a horrible affair to see the sun going down and so many people yet on board the wreck, settling down and burning up. I will do all in my power to save them.' Several of the boats' crews, on reaching the brig, refused to return, when Captain Wilson said, 'I will go almost alongside and take a hawser from on board, and then you will be in little or no danger. I must get every one from the wreck.' This he did, which had the effect of giving confidence, and by great exertion all were got on board the brig by eleven o'clock P.M.

"Captain Leitch and his first officer remained on board until almost surrounded with flames, and until every soul was saved. Captain Wilson then sent alongside to beg him to come away. The flames were shooting up the masts, throwing a strong and melancholy light over the sea. Captain Leitch reached the brig just at midnight."

A recent account of the Connaught thus described her: "The length of the Connaught is 278 feet, and 350 feet between perpendiculars; her beam is 40 feet, over all 71 feet 6 inches; her depth of hold is 30 feet. The Connaught is constructed with a spar deck, straight stem, and elliptic stern. The horse-power of the engines is 800 nominal, and they are on the oscillating principle. The main cylinders, 48 tons complete, are 80 inches diameter each. They are three in number, and placed under the paddle shafts athwart ships, and work direct to the cranks and shafts over them."

She was one of the proposed line of steamers running between this country and Galway, and was, in fact, the only ship really owned by the Company, the Persian being chartered, and the other ships advertised not being built yet.

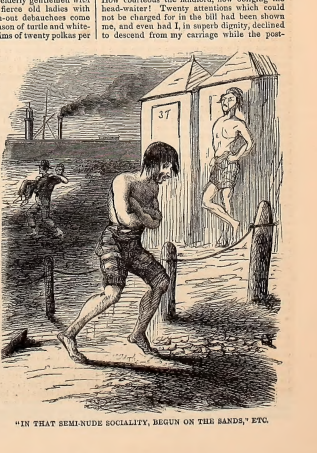
A DAY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER.

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XII.



I GREW impatient to leave Ostend; every association connected with the place was unpleasant. I hope I am not unjust in my estimate of it. I sincerely desire to be neither unjust to men nor cities, but I thought it vulgar and commonplace. I know it is hard for a watering-place to be otherwise; there is something essentially low in the green-baize and bathing-house existence in that semi-nude sociality, begun on the sands and carried out into deep water, which I can not abide. I abhor, besides, a lounging population in fancy toilets, a procession of donkeys in scarlet trappings, elderly gentlemen with pocket-telescopes, and fierce old ladies with camp-stools. The worn-out debauchees come to recruit for another season of turtle and white-bait; the half-faded victims of twenty polkas per night, the tiresome politician, pale from a long session, all fiercely bent on fresh diet and sea-breezes, are perfect antipathies to me, and I would rather seek companionship in a Tyrol village than amidst these wounded and missing of a London season.

With all this, I wanted to get away from the vicinity of the Jopplyns — they were positively odious to me. Is not the man who holds in his keeping one scrap of your handwriting which displays you in a light of absurdity, far more your enemy than the holder of your protested bill? I own I think so. Debt is a very human weakness; like disease, it attacks the best and the noblest among us. You may pity the fellow that can not meet that acceptance, you may be sorry for the anxiety it occasions him, the fruitless running here and there, the protestations, promises, and even lies, he goes through, but no sense of ludicrous scorn mingles with your compassion, none of that contemptuous laughter with which you read a copy of absurd verses or a maudlin love-letter. Imagine the difference of tone in him who says: "That's an old bill of poor Potts's; he'll never pay it now, and I'm sure I'll never ask him." Or, "Just read those lines; would you believe that any creature out of Hanwell could descend to such miserable drivel as that? It was one Potts who wrote it."

I wonder could I obtain my manuscript from Joppiyn before I started? What pretext could I adduce for the request? While I thus pondered, I packed up my few wearables in my knapsack and prepared for the road. They were, indeed, a very scanty supply, and painfully suggested to my mind the estimate waiters and hotel-porters must form of their owner. "Cruel world," muttered I, "whose maxim is, 'By their outsides shall ye judge them.' Had I arrived here with a traveling-carriage and a 'courier,' what respect and deference had awaited me! How courteous the landlord, how obliging the head-waiter! Twenty attentions which could not be charged for in the bill had been shown me, and even had I, in superb dignity, declined to descend from my carriage while the post-

"IT WAS AT NIGHTFALL THAT I DROVE INTO KALBBRATENSTADT," ETC.

"IN THAT SEMI-NUDE SOCIALITY, BEGUN ON THE SANDS," ETC.

horses were being fetched, a levée of respectful flunkies would have awaited my orders. I have no doubt but there must be something very fascinating in all this homage. The smoke of the hecatombs must have affected Jove as a sort of chloroform, or else he would never have sat there sniffing them for centuries. Are you ever destined to experience these sensations, Potts? Is there a time coming when auxious ears will strain to catch your words, and eyes watch eagerly for your slightest gestures? If such an era should ever arise, it will be a great one for the masses of mankind, and an evil day for snobbery. Such a lesson as I will read you and on humility in high places, such an example will I give of one elevated, but uncorrupted, by fortune!

"Let the carriage come to the door," said I, closing my eyes, as I sank into my chair in reverie. "I will myself to prepare for the entire of Hotel de Belle Vue for my arrival, and my own cook to preside in the Kitchen."

"Is this to be a private omnibus?" said the waiter, suddenly, on entering my room in haste. He pointed to my humble knapsack.

"Yes," said I, in deep confusion—"yes, that's my luggage—at least all that I have here at this moment; where is the bill? Very moderate indeed," muttered I, in a tone of approval. "I will take care to recommend your house's attendance specially to all the wines excellent."

"Monsieur is complimentary," said the fellow, with a sigh; "he only experiments upon a 'small Beaune' at one-twenty the bottle."

I scowled at him, and he shrank again.

"And what is also monsieur's name?" said he, taking up a small white canvas bag which was inclosed in my railroad wrapper.

"What is that?" said I, taking it up. I almost fell back as I saw that it was one of the dispatch bags of the French Office, which in my hasty departure from the Dover train I had accidentally carried off with me. There it was, addressed to "Sir Stanley Doubleteig, M.P., Envoy and Minister at Hesse-Kalbratenstadt, by the Hon. Grey Boiler, Attaché," etc.

Here was now a matter that might be construed into a theft, but what it was well possible might comprise one of the gravest offenses against the law I might by such treason itself. Who would ever credit my story, coupled as it was with the fact of my secret escape by the carriage—my precipitate entrance into the first place I could find, not to speak of the privacy I observed in my dress with the peasants in the mail-packet, but keeping myself estranged from all observation in the captain's cabin. Here, too, was the object of the skipper's reference to me: he saw the bag, and believed me to be a Foreign Office messenger, and into my own meaning, as he said, "I can answer for him he can't delay much here." Yes: this was the entire world-conspiracy which I obtained full proof, his politeness, and his protection. What was to be done in this exigency? Had the waiter not seen the bag? or with the instinct of his craft calmly perused the address on it. I believe, nay, I am quite convinced, I should have burned it on the instant, on the spot. The thought of his evidence against me in the event of a disclosure, however, quite prevented the notion, and, after a brief consideration, I resolved to convey the bag to its destination, and trump up the most plausible explanation I could of the way it came into my possession. His excellency, I reasoned, will doubtless be too delighted to receive his dispatches to pause too minutely as to the means by which they were recovered, nor is it quite impossible that he may feel bound to mark my zeal for the public service by some token of recognition. This was a pleasant train to give my thoughts, and I took it with all the avidity of my peculiar temperament. "Yes," thought I; "it is just out of trivial incidents like this a man's fortune is made in life. For one man who mounts to greatness by the great entrance and the state staircase ten thousand slip in by the back postes." It is, in fact, only by these chances that obscure merit obtains acknowledgment. How, for example, should this great diplomat jot know Potts, if some accident should not throw them together? Raleigh flung his cloak into a puddle, and for his reward he got the proud queen's favor. A village apothecary had the good fortune to be visited at the same apartment at the Pavilion when George the Fourth was seized with fits; he lied him, moreover, back to consciousness, and made him laugh by his genial and quaint humor. The king took a fancy to him, and from his physician's hand made his fortune. I have often heard it remarked by men who have seen much of life, that nobody, I mean, goes through life, or indeed without two or three such opportunities presenting themselves. The curious, the industrious, the unobservant, and the idle, either fail to remark, or are too slow to profit by them. The sharp fellows, on the contrary, are on the watch for all that they need to lend them to success. Into which of these categories you are to enter, Potts, let you decide.

Having by a reference to my John Murray ascertained the whereabouts of the capital of Hesse-Kalbratenstadt, I took my place at once on the rail for Cologne, reading myself up on the beauty and the laborious habits of its people, however, such a dreary sameness in these small ducal states, that I am ashamed to say how little I gleaned of any thing distinctive in the case before me. The reigning sovereign was of course married to a grand-duchess of Russia, and he lived at a country seat called Ludwig's Lust, or Carl's Lust, as it might be, "took little interest in politics"—how should he?—and passed much of his time in mechanical pursuits, in which he had attained considerable proficiency; in other words, he was a middle-aged gentleman, fond of his pipe, and with a taste for carpentry. Some sort of connection with our own royal family had been the pretext for having a resident minister at his court, though what he was to do when he was there seemed not so easy to say. Even John, glorious John, was puzzled how to make a respectable half-crown out of his capital, though there was a dome in the Byzantine style, with an altar-piece by Peter Von Grys, the angels in the corner being added afterward by Haus Lüders; and there was a Holy Theatre, and an excellent Bier Halle. Besides which, there were the sausages of home manufacture were highly recommendable, no less than a table-wine of a light, sparkling kind, "full of genslemencer," and which, Murray adds, would doubtless, if known, find many admirers in England; and why, but for from there, then, was a Musik Garten, where popular pieces were performed very finely by an excellent band after a mal to which the manners of the fashion of the capital nightly resorted.

I give you these details, respected reader, just as I got them in my "Northern Germany," and not intending to obtrude any further description of my visit to Hesse-Kalbratenstadt, I ask, could anglipt upon his Hand-book? What remains to be noted after John has taken the inventory? Has he forgotten a nail or a sentry's shin-bone? With him for guide, a man may feel that he has gained a thorough acquaintance with it and thought it hard to treasure up all the hard names of poets, painters, priests, and warriors, it is not worse than botany, and about as profitable.

For this same reason that I have given above, I spare my reader all the circumstances of my journey, my difficulties about carriage, my embarrassments about steamboats, and rash fares which were all of the ordinary kind. Murray Jones have experienced, are experiencing, and will continue to experience to the end of the period of the millennium period when we shall all converse in any tongue we please.

It was at nightfall that I drove into Kalbratenstadt, my postilion announcing my advent at the gates, and all the way to the Plate, where the inn stood, by a variety of discordant peals which might have announced a grand-duke or a prime minister. My entrance into the courtyard opened as we rumbled along, and the guests of a cafe sinued hurriedly into the street to watch my last three minutes' progress round the Schwein without further notice, and descended.

Herr Kraun looked suspiciously at the small amount of luggage, and I saw that he was struck by "extra post," but, like an honest German, he was not one to form rash judgments, and so he proceeded me to a commodious apartment, and took my orders for supper in all respectfulness. He was not a man for much talk, and I did not see opportunity for conversation. While I ate my Carbonade mit Kartoffel Salad, therefore, I learned all that I could from the clock, it was far too late an hour to present myself at the English Embassy—for so he designated our minister's residence—and I must defer that period of the night there were but few citizens out of their beds at that hour, and nearly all extinguished at half past eight, and only roisterers and revelers kept it up much later. My first surprise over, I found that Kalbratenstadt was of that simple patriarchal existence I had so long yearned after. Let the learned explain it, I bet there is, assuredly, nothing in the early hours of a people that guarantees habits of simplicity, thrift, and order. I had met with in the city people who can be as wicked at eight in the evening as at two or three in the morning; that crime does not prefer the hour that the river respect the chronometer; but does experience confirm this, and are not the small hours notorious for the deeds committed? The grand-duke, who is fast asleep at nine, is scarcely disturbed by dreams of cruelties to his people. No police-minister frets him with bodeful candle at the same hour, is seldom harassed by devising new schemes of torture for his victims. A suffocad ye not to talk tragedy of his rest and its people, and probably such a listener merely represents the fact that the day appeared the occasion. He assured me, with a gravity that vouched for the conviction, that capital, though by no means the size of London or Paris, contained much if not all these more pretentious cities could boast. There was a theatre, a public promenade, a Public Museum and a new pile, one of the largest in all Germany. Judges were daily expected to arrive on her way to Vienna; and to prove how they sympathized in every respect with greater centers of population, he added, they had raped at Berlin, they, too, lost about four hundred of their townsfolk. Lastly, he mentioned, and with impressive dignity, the public weekly organ of public opinion, nor men of adequate size which fulfilled the duty. Kalbratenstadt, in fact is, if she ever arrived at the crowning knowledge of the benefit of letting her differences be decided by some superior empire.

More than once, as I heard him, I muttered to myself, "Potts, this is the very spot you have sought for; here is all the quiet and simplicity of the village, with the elevated culture of a great city. Here the sages and philosophers dad in homespun, Beauty herself in linsey-woolsey. Here there are no velour rivalries of riches, no contests in fine clothes, no opposing armies of yellow plush. Men are great by their faculties, not in their finnikes. How elevated must be the tone of their thoughts, the style of their conversation, and what a lucky accident it was that led you to that goal to which all your wishes and hopes have been converging!

"For how much can a man live—a single gentleman like myself—here in our city?" asked I, of my host.

He sat down at this, and filling himself a large goblet of my wine—the last in the bottle —he prepared for a lengthy answer. "First of all," said he, "how would he wish to live? Would he desire to mingle in our best circles, equal to any in Europe, to know Herr von Krugwitz, and the Grandige Frau von Steinbultz?"

"Well," thought I, "these be fair ambitions." And I said, "I, by both of them."

"And to be on the list of the court-dinners? There are two dinners—one 'Essen' at Easter, the other on his Highness's birthday, when many Provincial dignitaries?"

"To this one might I aspire."

"And to have a stall at the Grand Opera, and a carriage to return with—twice in carnival time—and, with the Fürst, a handsome quarter, and dine every day at our table d'hôte here with Graves and Counts, and the Hofrath von Schleifrücker? A life like this is costly, and would scarcely be comprised under two thousand florins a year."

How my heart bounded at the notion of refinement, culture, elevated minds, and polished habits! "twenty pounds," said I, "and a thousand glasses," all for one hundred and sixty pounds per annum.

"It is not improbable that you will see me your guest for many a day to come," said I, as I ordered another bottle, and of a more generous vintage, to honor the occasion. My host offered no opposition to my convivial projects—nay, he smiled blandly at them.

"If you have really an appreciation for something superexcellent in wine, and wish to taste what Prince Metternich, the Deutschen Negus, I'll go and fetch you a bottle.

"Bring it by all means," said I. And away he went on his mission.

"Providence blessed me with two hands," said he, as he returned the room, "and I have brought two flasks of Lieb Herrenthaler."

"There is something very artistic in the way your picture-dealer, having brushed away the dust from a Mieris or a Gerard Dow, places the work in a favorable light before you, and then stands to watch the effect on your countenance. So, with your man of rare manuscripts and illuminated missals offer to your notice some illegible treasure of the fourth century; but there is nothing to the mysterious solemnity of him who, uncorking a bottle of rare wine, waits to note the varying sensations of your palate descend down to your joyful ecstasy.

I tried to perform my part of the piece with credit: I looked long at the amber-colored liquor in the glass—I sniffed it, and smiled approvingly—I sipped it, and said, "Ah! Ah!" Not another syllable did he utter; but how expressive was that "Ah!" "Ah!" meant, "You are right, Potts, in the verdict—'tis of 1704, bottled for the Herzog Ludwig's marriage; every drop of it is priceless. Mark the color, how it performs the legs—observe its: regard the odeur—the golden hair of Venus can alone rival it; see how the air-bell plays in it while you taste!" Ah! meant all this, and more.

As I drank off my glass I was sorely puzzled by the proper expression in which to couch my approval; but he supplied it, and said, "Is it not Gottlich?" and I said it was Gottlich; and while he filled a glass for himself, the entire military phrase suffered for converse between us; Gottlich was the highest praise as he drained his glass, and Gottlich being re-echoed by his compassion.

There is great wisdom in reducing our admiration to a word—giving, as it were, a cognate number to our estimate of any thing. Where were we now, Potts? Where blunder: in enjoy epithets that give our expressions that degree, or in even questionable taste soar into inexpressible? Gottlich is best. Besides, our moods of highest enjoyment are not such as admit of much conversation; the ecstasy that is most enthralling is self-contained. We, or looking at a glorious landscape, does not feel the inexhaustible flow of the descriptive enthusiast beside him? How grateful would he own himself if he would be satisfied with one word for his admiration? And if one needs this calm repose, this unbroken peace, for the enjoyment of nature, how much more for the appreciation of a curious wine. I have no recollection that any further conversation passed between us, that I have never ceased, and most probably never shall cease, to have a perfect memory of the pleasant rumble of my whirling, as I sank into easy sipping, sipping. I pondered long over a plan of settling down in this place for life, by what means I could ask him tactfully the best elevated sphere in the host spoke of. If Potts pre—I mean my friend—was not the man for me? He was an enthusiastic and a worldly man. Would he see in these beginnings of mine the seeds of future greatness? Perhaps, I well knew, are splendidly generous to their successful children, and the "poor but honest" enjoy much. It is a pleasure to see and him who does not need assistance, and such a hopeless task to be always saving him who will not be saved.

My first care, therefore, should be to impress upon my parent the appropriateness of his contributing his share to what already was an accomplished success. "Wishing, as the French say, to make you a part in my triumph, dear father, I write these lines." How I picture him to my mind's eye as he reads this, running frantically about to his neighbors, and saying, "I have got a letter from Algy—strange boy—but as I always foresaw, with great stuff in him, very remarkable abilities. See what he has done! struck out a perfect line of his own in life; just the sort of thing genius alone can do. He went off from this one morning by way of Ostend, and expected never returned a year worth. All my efforts to trace him were in vain. I advertised, and offered rewards, did every thing, without success, and then, after all this long interval, comes a letter; this morning's post to tell me that he is well, happy, and prosperous. He is settled, it appears, in a German capital with a hard name, a charming spot, with every necessary of refinement in it, a court of the highest culture, and women of most graceful and attractive manners; as he himself writes, 'the elegance of a European salon added to the wisdom of the professor's cabinet.' Here is Algy living well all that is highest in rank, and most distinguished in nature; the friend and guest of the prince, the bosom friend of the English minister, his advice sought for, his counsel asked in every difficulty; trusted in the most important state offices, and taken into the most secret councils of the state. Though the circumstances of this station make heavy demands upon his means, very little help from me will enable him to maintain a position which a few years more will have consolidated into a rank recognized throughout Europe. Would the flintiest of fathers, would the most primitive-rock-hearted of parents resist an appeal like this? It is no hand to rescue from the water—no scuffle, a little finger to help to influence." "Of course you'd do it, Potts, and do it liberally; the boy is a credit to you. He will repay your warmest wishes never dreamed to see it. What do you mean to settle on him? Above all things, no stinginess; don't disgust him."

I hear these and such like on every hand; even this modest-faced and retiring part of our acquaintances will be generous of their friend's money; and I think I hear the sage remarks with which the former season advises with trifling allusions to that well-known slip that was lost for want of a small outlay in tar. "Come down handsomely, Potts," says a resolute man, who has sworn never to pay a sixpence of his son's debts. "Don't disgust him," says a second of our headings than to render our young people happy?" I don't like the man who says this, but I like his sentiment; and I am much pleased when he goes on to remark that "there is no such good investment as what establishes a successful son." Be proud of the boy, Potts, and thank your stars that he had a soul above sense, and a spirit above evil volatile!"

As I revel all this play of dialogue for myself, and picture the speakers before me, I come in last to a small parcels that below mound Lynch, a merchant tailor, who lived next door to us, and enjoyed much of my father's confidences. "We will pay you, and well too," said that runaway of yours, Potts. Is it true? What face does he put upon his disgraceful conduct? What lame excuses did lavery-stable keeper? Did he sell him or ride him to death?' A bold business if he should return in a year or two, which, of course, he's too wise for. And where is he now, and what is he at?"

"You've read his letter, Mr. Lynch," replies my father; "it is one who can speak for himself." And Lynch reads and sniggers, and reads again. "I see him as plainly as if he were let a yard from me. "I never heard of this ducal capital before," he begins, "but I suppose by what I read of them—their obscure forms of pretentious poverty, plenty of ceremony and very little to eat. How did he find it out? What brought him there?"

"You have his letter before you, Sir," says my parent, "Algernon Sydney Potts, a Huguenot, quite competent to explain what relates to his own affairs."

"Oh, quite perfectly; only that I can't really make out how he first came to this place, nor what it is that he does there now that he's here."

My father hastily snatches the letter from his hands, and with an eye eagerly seeking to catch the passage which shall confute the objector and cover him with shame and confusion. He can not find it at once. "It is here, Sir, it is on this side. Very strange, very singular, indeed; but as Algernon must have told you"—deed; but as Algernon must have told you, and for the simple reason that he does not know it himself. For myself I mentioned with becoming pride the prominent stations Irishmen now hold in most of the great states of Europe, and pointed to O'Donnell in Spain, Blake in the Azores, and the Field-Marshal Nugent in Austria, I naturally forgot to designate the high post occupied by the late Lord Mayor of Dublin, Alderman Staidt. To determine what this should be was now of imminent importance, and before my mother's opportune interposition, I was prepared to the solution with a degree of intentness and an amount of concentration that set me off sound asleep.

Yes, benevolent reader, I will confess it, questions of a complicated character have always affected me in the highest degree, and seems to have struck Tony Lumpkin—"all hurry." I am not a man to sit down and write a note and start with the most loyal desire to be civil and obliging, but I am myself to my task with an honest a disposition to do my best as ever man did; I am, Now, Potts, no self-indolence, no skulking; here is a knotty problem, here is a one for your best faculties in their sharpest exercise; find out if any one man in your ms about ten minutes after this resolve, he will see a man who could best Sancho Panza in sleeping!

Of course this tendency has often cost me dearly; I have missed appointments, forgotten assignations, lost friends through it. My character, too, has suffered, many deeming me incorrigibly indolent, a sluggard quite unfit for any active employment. Others, more mercifully hinting at some "cerebral cause," have done me equal damage; but there happily is an observe on the medal, and to this somnolency do I ascribe much of the gentleness and all the romance of my nature. It is your sleepy man is ever-benevolent, he loves ease and quiet for others as for himself. When he cultivates it the tranquil mood that leads to slumber, and the calm that sustains it. The very operations of the mind in sleep are broken, incoherent, undelineated—just like the waking occupations of an idle man; they are thoughts that could be title to manufacture that he can afford to be lavish of them. And now—Good-night!

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE OCTOBER ELECTIONS.

ELECTIONS took place, as usual, on 9th October, in the States of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Minnesota, and Iowa. So far as heard from the results are as in every case favorable to the Republicans. In Pennsylvania, Mr. Curtin, the Republican candidate for Governor, is probably elected by a majority of from 25,000 to 30,000; the Senate will probably stand 25 Republicans to 8 Democrats, and the House of Representatives to 59 Democrats to 41 the Republican majority on the State ticket is estimated at about 20,000. In Indiana, the Republican majority is said to be from 5000 to 10,000. We have not yet heard definitely from Iowa or Minnesota; the Republicans, however, have carried those States beyond a doubt.

PROGRESS OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.

On Sunday, 7th, the Prince of Wales attended divine service at St. Paul's Church, Richmond, Virginia; after church he visited Governor Letcher, and had a drive in the new party in the evening. On Monday, at 9 A.M., the party left for Washington by the same road as they came, stopping on their way to Richmond, and without stopping precisely at the places, where they arrived at 12 M. He did not go out in the evening. On Tuesday, 9th, after a drive through Washington with the Mayor, he received at 1 P.M. and sailed for Philadelphia at noon, and arrived at his destination at 5 P.M. He drove at once to the rooms at the Continental, and did not go out during the evening. On Wednesday he drove out to the grounds of Point Breeze Park, and in the evening attended the opera. On Thursday he left at 11 A.M. for New York, where he was received by a grand military and popular display. On Friday, 12th, the Prince of Wales and party visited the New York University, the Women's Library, the Astor Library, and the Crystal Palace, and the five days' visit and tour to the Central Park, where he assisted at the laying of the corner-stone of the English oak and planted an oak himself. Three places addresses were presented to the Prince. At Boston he breakfasted at the house of the Mayor Wood, in Bloomingdale Road; and at 12 o'clock he was received at the City Hall by the Mayor and Aldermen, and others. Leaving them, he rode to the foot of Two Hundred and Fifteenth Street, and took the steamer in the Prince's name through Long Island Sound, under the High Bridge, past the Jacobites' Rock, and up Harlem River, which was sailed in the Clermont in 1807. At 9 P.M. when the Royal party landed at the foot of Thirty-second Street, North River, and entered the Fifth Avenue Hotel. In the evening he attended the ball at the Academy of Music.

THE PRINCE AT THE TOMB OF WASHINGTON.

The Herald correspondent writes: "The Prince made several excursions in the vicinity of the picturesque mansion where death was depicted by his country, and whose deeds and character are immortal. He expressed a desire to plant a tree on the spot in commemoration of his visit, and, when a sapling was having been hastily sought for, stepped down and placed them in the earth. He afterward put a few acorns in his pocket, with the intention of sending or planting them in Windsor Park on his return home or another memorial tree which he should ever regard with feelings of peculiar interest."

HE IS BADLY TREATED AT RICHMOND.

The Herald correspondent says: "During the morning the street in front of the hotel was crowded with a shouting, yelling crowd, awaiting the Prince's appearance. The Prince came out, bowing to the people, and drove off, the crowd raising their old yells. Not a single person bows from church, another crowd awaited the party at the Capitol, where they were received by a guard of honor and reviewed.

"At 12 M. the staircase and halls were filled with curious spectators, among whom were many ladies, shouting. The Prince was anxious to see some of the fair men. There were no police, and no order. It was worse than the Jackson reception at Washington or Philadelphia."

HIS FEMININE CORRESPONDENTS.

He adds: "Before the Prince arrived in Philadelphia the ladies were not in large numbers, and a number of the Continental Hotel to inspect the Prince's splendid apartments, to see how he lived, to sit, and lounge in the settee in the Queen's room. They were escorted in and out of the room by the police, and they were not allowed to stay under after the visit. This, and a number of letters directed to the Prince, have become outrageously vulgar. It only indicates at the hotel that the Prince would arrive. If the ladies only knew the fate of those letters—how they were read by all the rude, laughed at, and destroyed as beneath notice—their delicacy declines and post-offices would not be so largely patronized.

HE IS ARRIVED BY A RAILWAY OFFICIAL.

"When the Prince arrived at the hotel at Philadelphia, he sprang out of his carriage with his usual agility, and he could also observe curiosity in the eyes of many of the gems of the superintendent, who stepped him, and would not allow him to pass. He was the Prince evening, and he kicked. The superintendent kept fast hold until Mayor Henry reached him and showed his Royal Highness with the international embrace. The superintendent bowed low, and bowed pardon, but, with the natural antipathy to nobilesbians, asked, 'Why didn't he speak?' 'Oh,' said the Mayor, 'he's deaf.' Some one added, 'and dumb, too.' The astute Philadelphians did not know the Royal Prince."

THE LADIES TOUCH HIM.

In Philadelphia, says the Herald correspondent, "a few hundred people stood around the hotel all day. Quite a lively bidding for the Prince's hair or behind their way up stairs, being around the door. Some ladies succeeded in getting through and into the room to see the Prince, and he was also to be general enthusiasm. The whole affair being like a Quaker meeting, and not Philadelphia gravity, very orderly but very dull.

HE SEES A CATHOLIC PROCESSION.

"Soon after he reached the hotel at Philadelphia a procession of jubilees wearing Curtin masks passed by an crowds almost endless, for victory always brings curtain and every other person attended the procession. As they passed the Prince was seen at the window, at the end of Newsboys' Row, and every person passing through the house had the procession observed, took his hat off, and made a bow for the Prince of Wales."

HE READS ABOUT HIS BROTHER.

"The public already know that the Prince reads the papers daily. Seeing an account of the inspection of the Prince at Alfred in the Herald, he said in effectively, and seemed deeply interested, and at its conclusion said, 'Alfred has a good travel, and I haven't; but he has no bills given him. He recognizes are just like mine, but he signs his copies to addresses, and I don.'

AN ENGLISHMAN INSULTS THE PRINCE.

"After the Prince of Wales and his suite had left the Fifth Avenue Hotel on Friday morning, his barouche passed but two or three blocks down the Fifth Avenue when a steamboat fellow, wearing a blue shirt or blouse, rushed out of the sidewalk into the street, gesticulating violently with his fists and exclaiming: 'Who are you? I can tell you, say way. You will never be King of England if you live a hundred years.' Some of the spectators who declare that his friendliness used to show the Prince. They, it is understood to within a few feet of the carriage, but his further progress was stopped by a crowd who gathered around him, and at that moment policeman Rhodes of the Twenty-second ward, ran up and arrested the fellow. The Prince and his suite paid no attention to the disturbance, and very promptly did not hear the threatening and insulting language. Officer Rhodes took his prisoner forthwith to the station-house in Jefferson Market, where he was held by a very large and highly indignant crowd. At the station-house the man gave his name as Richard Hudson, said that he was born in England, and is thirty years of age. He appeared to be quite intoxicated, and, from his talk, it was apparently in a disordered state of mind. He said he was employed on a steamboat plying on the North River, and that every time morning to see what sort of a boy the Democratic party was making from the Prince. He was discharged by Justice Connolly with a reprimand.

THE PRINCE EXCITES WRITERS TO A PLEASANT LETTER.

"The following concluding passage of the Duke of Newcastle's letter to Mayor Wood, in reply to the invitation to the Prince to visit Northern, must be very gratifying to us all. It breathes hearty, kindly, and generous sentiments, and is worthy of the writer:

"'I can not say with what kindness the Prince has been received in England, and throughout the whole extent of the United States. If such individual had been instructed that his visit to this country was to be a series of ovations, a delicacy of feeling and consideration for the position he occupies in England, and for the feelings of others could not have been more carefully observed. They have all taken pains to make him as much, but without overstepping the character of host. In the course of events, he will return to his home, and shall continue to be made slaveholders, to gratify the sensible curiosity of a people who are proud of their Queen, whom they love and respect almost as much as we do!'"

MISS GROESBECK AND HER JEWELS.

The editor of the Herald writes: "I have just heard about the ball at the Opera House, Cincinnati, relative the following incident. Miss Groesbeck, one of the belles of the evening, wore a white tulle dress, pulled to the waist, and her hair was dressed in the style of Josephine. She decked with this part may not be out of place. Previous to those arrival at the ball she was informed that the Prince had immediately bound him Groesbeck and her mother. The latter was called upon to introduce her daughter. She did so, and, when Groesbeck, as already mentioned, had just a particle of jewelry on her person, the Prince's attention was drawn to it by the extraordinary exhibition of any kind. When one of the officers of the Prince's band for the second dance, of course there was a rush for partners. The Prince was observed to be engaged with gem jewelry and passed them to her favored daughter; and, when Groesbeck, with determination and great good sense positively refused to accept of the gift, the Prince requested him her simple dress and the wealth of beauty which Nature had bestowed upon her."

HAS THE PRINCE LOST HIS HEART?

The "Miss B. of Natchez," whom the Prince of Wales danced with at Cincinnati, and who was so much admired for and expressed a desire to meet again, is said to be Miss Bowie, daughter of Colonel Bowie, who fell at the side of Governor Morehead's son, of Kentucky. She is represented as very beautiful, and probably created a slight sensation underneath the Prince's ribs.

NEGRO DISTURBANCE IN VIRGINIA.

A telegram dated Petersburg, Virginia, says: "The accounts received here to-day from Norfolk represent that all is quiet there. The negro disturbance is suppressed.

"The Norfolk Herald says that sufficient testimony has been elicited against the negroes to warrant the belief that a conspiracy existed. Several arrests of negroes have been made.

"Nearly all the negroes on two or three plantations, on hearing of the affair, took to the woods, more from blight than any thing else. A few have since come in search of food."

A STRANGE DUEL.

The New Orleans Delta to 6th says: "Yesterday morning, at an early hour, a duel was fought between two gentlemen from Alabama, in the section of the Metairie Ridge. The weapons were double-barrelled shot guns, loaded with buck. The gentlemen met each other in pollant style, and fired at the word. Both discharged their pieces, but only one of the left shoulder of the other, and completely lifted him from the ground. Medical assistance was at once rendered the wounded gentleman being in a somewhat dangerous condition."

PERSONAL.

Mr. Ralph Farnham, a distinguished patriot from Maine, arrived in Boston on Monday, having received a Special invitation to be present at the reception. He was accompanied by his son John, who was all years old. Mr. Farnham has been a resident of Maine for 30 years, and has been for eighteen years a councilor at the American House in Boston. He is a native of Hampton, New Hampshire, and one foremost, changing care from times, he seems not to have forgotten the place of his birth. Although 70 years old he can converse intelligently, and seems quite proud that he can converse intelligently, and seems quite proud of his native State.

The New York correspondent of the Charleston Mercury says that Governor Seward has gone to Cuba, via New Orleans. He has not recovered from a severe attack of bilious fever, but the Mail says he greatly benefited by the Cuba before Mexico. Through the kindness of some of the Cuban gentlemen, he has been offered a residence there, which he will go to him. He is to have the general superintendence of the estate, and will have the entire control of the laborers, and the care of our millionaires, and it is confidently stated that, with a good overseer, the estate will be made to yield a handsome income. Governor Seward will return home very soon, and save his freedman in a very short time.

The Rev. Dr. Cheever has been appointed Chaplain of the White Mountains. While there a very curious incident occurred. Dr. Cheever was called upon to make a "Prince of Rolls." A procession was formed to escort the to Prince, and the Doctor was asked to lead the party in happy reply. The proceedings were very humorous, and the Prince laughed heartily. The Doctor is a very fine story-telling and will be in a ship of the original rail.

The Rev. Father Mathew, who is at the head of a Catholic (New York) Gerome's Jury after an inquest on the body of a man who died from the effects of a blow, drank a gallon and a half of whisky in one day.

The Boston Courier has the following paragraph to a sketch of an interview between Ex-President Fillmore and Mr. Douglas:

"One of the most gratifying incidents of Mr. Douglas's visit to Buffalo was his interview with Mr. Fillmore, at his home. That gentleman has retired from public life, and has no desire to appear in it again; but he felt that the the excitement of the reception and the speaking was over, he could not refrain from giving the distinguished guest a welcome him to the city. The interview was on both sides most cordial and friendly. Mr. Fillmore, in the course of pressed himself deeply gratified at the magnificent reception that had been given to Mr. Douglas by the citizens of Buffalo, and at the triumphant success that had attended his progress through the State, and Mr. Douglas replied:

"'Sir, I am not a Democrat.'

On her recent visit to Edinburgh, the Queen visited the tached to her Majesty, and every member remains the latter is considered a sacrament to be raised.

This visit is only one of several which the Queen has made to Scotland.

A young woman, named Lizzy Donaldson, escaped by walk across one of the streets of Cincinnati, on Saturday week, and had nearly accomplished the feat, when the ladder of one of the gay ropes, in his admiration for the beautiful person above him, looked upward, forgot his footing, and threw the fair performer from her foothold, to the terror and dismay of the witnesses. Fortunately, she had already passed the middle of the street, where a fall might have been fatal, and escaped singularly some but feet upon the one-story store beneath.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE "GREAT EASTERN."

We read in the London Times of September 25: "It does not seem probable that the Great Eastern can call on the 11th of October for New York, as at first intended. It is said she is to take in 15,000 tons of coal, which can not be put on board in a much greater rate than 1000 tons per week. In addition to this owing to her screw shaft being unsupported for the whole length of the stern, and consequently of the bearings which must, even in its present state, have a great deal of vibration, the screw is in motion, and would, if let go further, materially shake the vessel. It is, therefore, proposed to fit her shaft in a manner supported by the stern-post; and the above injury to the bearings of the screw shaft will be made good. A support of in large vessels it is indispensable, although engineers differ very much as to its proper position. This, also, and four landing points of her screw have been injured, it is said, by the ground on the 23d ult. when she grounded at Harlaw, when the ill-fated Royal Charter went down."

THE QUEEN AND HER YOUNGEST DAUGHTER.

A correspondent of the Aberdeen Free Press, near Balmoral, states that several years ago her Majesty, on hearing her Highland servants speak of the women, promised to a dress of the Highland costume in the vicinity, to bring to her next year. During the interval the young princess grew out of her dress, and when the Queen was over in France on a visit to the Emperor and Empress, she had the dress made up in the costume of the Highland girl, not even on the other, for on arriving at Balmoral, the Queen found that the Princess Beatrice had kept her word with the promised toy, remarking, "See, I have not forgotten you!"

FRANCE.

DEATH OF THE EMPRESS'S SISTER.

We read in the Court Journal of September 22: "The Duchess of Alba died at Madrid on the 20th ult. She was the sister of the Empress; much united, and, in spite of their different ages, they were the best friends in the world. Monsieur de Montijo, who survived, was her solicitude. The Duchess of Alba was a widow, and had long been removed from the first all hope of recovery declined, and for the last month she was unconscious of those around her. The crisis, which took place during the stay of the Emperor and Empress at Biarritz, was expected, and the news of her death, and remained prostrate and almost immovable, except when the Empress was present. The Duchess of Alba was the mother of the Marquis of Malaguon, who is the intimate friend of Prince Napoleon, and who was also with the Emperor and Empress at Biarritz

SUB ROSA.

AGATHA walked alone in her garden
Just at the close of a summer day,
Walked, or lingered, or sat for a moment,
All in a happy, dreamy way.

Bending, blushing over the flowers,
Breathing their breath, and whispering low:
"Sweet, are you blown in another summer,
I shall be wedded to one you know."

Ll'aving the wildbirds' joyous vespers,
Then with a glad smile answering:
"Yes, just as the mildest robins
All day long my light heart sings."

Into her golden visions suddenly
Broke a voice that was very low, well,
"Ah, he is seeking me!" she murmured,
Striving to calm her bosom's swell:

Striving to still her happy tremblings
Ere he shall speak, and know
How at his coming her fond heart quickens,
And the full pulses ebb and flow.

There he comes now through the meadow
Not alone—his Cousin May
Hangs on his arm with fond face averted,
Smiling, and looking another way.

Backward Agatha drew in the shadow,
Watching her love with proud bright eyes;
Where was a form so stately as Clarion?
Where was a soul so noble and wise?

But can he be ill?—his cheek is pallid!
Can he be sorry? Ah, what is wrong?
Why does he clasp May's lily fingers?
Why is she turning away her head?

What is he saying in tones so tremulous?
What does he mean by "known too late?"
What are the words that May should say Clarion?
Claims that her "fate has tonight him to hate?"

Near was an arbor of crimson roses—
Down through their clusters a year ago
Agatha thought that Clarion's lips had opened,
Dropping a crown on her brow of snow;

Thought she could hear how the stars were telling
In rhythm of "love" in the realms on sphere;
Thought the lily note of the universe sounded
In that "I love you" he uttered in her ear.

Now another stands with Clarion
Under the gentle's fragrant arch,
Leaning against him, laughing, and saying,
"You're an unmitigated rumber in March!

"Now, a meth wind shathed in snow-flakes,
Then, some tropical folly like this!"
"Under the rose!" he said, and nodding,
Sealed her lips with a welcome kiss.

"I think I am ill," said Agatha, faintly,
When in her chamber she found her lala—
"Something pains me in my head or diary,
My heart is sick with a throbbing pain!"

Did those two gnose what blor had stricken
Her bright young head, that there she lay,
Moaning and blinded in life and death
For many a weary night and day?

When on their meeting the calmly gave him
His ring of "love," that he gave before knew
Seeing his wild-rose blanched to a lily?
Whose false head has given the blow?

Agatha tvined May's dusky tresses
Full of pearls as white as milk;
Round the bride's wrist were her forehead,
Draped her with rustling, emery silk.

"Nay, no flowers for you, my cousin,
Gems are fitter, they suit you for me.
Flowers will fade, and I am failing,
But pearls live on with the waking sea."

Did the bride know why she was failing?
Why the flowers of another spring
Mixed her bridal veil with pearls wilted
In vain for her joyous answering?

If they knew 'twas their own hearts told them,
Never Agatha's lips are rose.
Never has smile been seen in the sunshine
Than under the roses where now she lies!

THE
Uncommercial Traveler.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

BEING IN A HUMOR for complete solitude and unintercepted meditation this autumn, I have taken a lodging for six weeks in the most unfrequented part of England—in a word, in London.

The retreat into which I have withdrawn myself is Band Street. From this lonely road I issue pilgrimages into the surrounding wilderness, and traverse extensive tracts of the Great Desert. The first stirrings of isolation extinguish in me a first oppressive consciousness of profound retirement conquered, I enjoy that sense of freedom, and feel myself within my last latent reminiscence of the original savage, which has been (upon the whole somewhat frequently) noticed by Travelers.

My lodgings are at a butter's—my own butter's. After establishing no articles in his window for some weeks but sea-side watches, shooting-caps, and a choice of rough water-proof headgear for the moors and mountains, he has put upon the window a notice as much at this end as they could carry, and has taken them off to the Isle of Thanet. His young man alone remains —and remains alone—in the shop. The young man has let out the fire at which the irons are heated, and, saving his strong sense of duty, I see no reason why he should take the shutters down.

Happily for himself and for his country, the young man is a Volunteer; most happily for himself, or I think he would become the prey of a settled melancholy. For, to live surrounded by human hats, and alienated from human heads to fit them on, is surely a great endurance. But the young man, sustained by practicing his exercise, and by constantly furbishing up his regulation plume (it is unnecessary to observe that, as a hatter, he is in a cock's-feather corps), is resigned, and uncomplaining. On a Saturday, when he closes early and gets his knickerbockers on, he is even cheerful. I am gratefully particular in this reference to him, because he is my companion through many peaceful hours. My butter has a desk in certain rejected linendraper, landed estate like the clerk's desk at Church. I shut myself into this place of seclusion after breakfast, and meditate. At such times I observe the young man looking out an imaginary rifle with the greatest precision, and maintaining a most grilling and destructive fire upon the informal enemy. I think him publicly for his companionship and his patriotism.

The windows of my room, and all the color nature of the scenes by which I am surrounded, occasion me to rise early. I go forth in my slippers and my dressing-gown. It is by no means to feel the freshness of the air in the unblushted town, and to appreciate the shepherdess character of the perfect repose of the early morning. But that it would be worth nobody's while to advertise it if I ate my bread and butter in the street. On the crowded sea-shore, the great demand for milk, combined with the strong local temptation of chalk, would betray me into the lowest quality of the article. In Arcadian London I derive it from the cow.

The familiar simplicity of the metropolis altogether, and the primitive ways into which it has fallen in this autumnal Golden Age, make it entirely new to me. It is the perfection of quiet if my retreat is the house of a friend who maintains a most unpretending way. For instance, until yesterday, saw that butter cut of sapsfine thick breadcloth. Until yesterday I never saw him of duty, never saw him in the act of loitering with the appearance of having any mind for any thing but the glory of his master and his master's friends. Yesterday morning, walking in my slippers near the house of which he is the prop and ornament—for, although he is a tradesman, I encountered that butter, also in his slippers, and in a shooting-suit of one color, and in a low-crowned straw-hat, another color—I found the fact that we had formerly met in another state of existence, and that we were translated into a new sphere. Wisely—and he proved without recognition. Under his arm he carried the morning paper, and shortly afterward I saw him reading it to the old and pleasant open landscape of Regent Street, pausing it at his ease under the ripening sun.

My landlord's family is in the wine establishment to be salted down, I am waited on by an elderly woman blacking under a chronic stiff, who, at the ordinary hour of breakfast, and each hour of every evening, gives admittance at the street door to a meagre and moodily old man whose I have seen detached from the first flower of love a pewter pot. The meagre and moodily old man is her husband, and I think he has carried on acquiescence that they are not justified in appearing on the surface of the earth. They come out of some hole when London is asleep, and go to it again when it flits. I saw them arrive on the evening when I myself took possession, and they arrived with a full pint of beer, and went to bed in a bundle. The old man is a weak old man, and appeared to have been let down into his kitchen stairs by tumbling down with great violence. They make their bed in the lowest and remotest corner of the basement, and smell of beer. I do not have no possession but bed, unless it be (which I rather infer from an under-current of davor in these) cheese. I know that the cheese is the chance of having called the wife's attention, at half past nine on the second evening of our acquaintance, to the circumstance of there being some rats in the house door; when she apologetically explained, "It's only Tom Cox." What became of Mr. Klem all day, or when he goes out, or why, is a mystery I can not penetrate; but at half past nine he never fails to turn up at the house with the flat pint of beer. And the pint of beer, flat as it is, is so much more important than himself, that it always seems to my fancy as if it had been him driveling in the street and had luxuriously brought him home. I never see him sober. Mr. Klem never goes down the middle of the passage, like another Christian, but shuffles against the wall as if entreating that he may be allowed to be creeping as little space as possible in society. And whenever I come upon him face to face, he looks as if he had been discovered in the basest extraordinary circumstance I have traced in connection with the late aged cousin. The wife of Miss Klem, their daughter, apparently ten years older than either of them, who has also a bad and secret look, and who is always in a hurry and dark and hides it in deserted houses. I come into the place of knowledge through Mrs. Klem's breech-es. The first sixteen times I encountered Mr. Klem she shut roof for a single night, "between-hat tahle-tare of the upper part of a house in Full Mall, and the first sixteen times I encountered him in Serjeaness Street, which the family of leaves during terms-time. I gave my gracious consent (having nothing that I know of to do with it), and in the shadowy hours Miss Klem became precipitate on the door-step, wearing with a bundle. Where she made it up for the night I can not positively state, but, I think, in a sink. Mr. Klem, with the deepest sense of duty on his insect, she stowed it and herself away in deep obscurity. In the Klem family I have noticed another remarkable gift of nature, and that is a power they possess of converting every thing into flue. Such broken victuals as they take by stealth, appear (whatever the nature of the viands) invariably to generate flues' and even the nightly pint of beer, instead of assimilating naturally, strikes me as breaking out in that form, equally on the shabby gown of Mrs. Klem, and the threadbare coat of her husband.

Mrs. Klem has no idea of my name—as to Mr. Klem, he has no idea of any thing—and only knows me as her good gentleman. Thus, if doubtful what I am up to in my room or no, Mrs. Klem taps at the door and says, "Is my good gentleman here?" Or, if a messenger desiring to see me were consistent with my solitude, she would show him in with, "Here is my good gentleman." I had this to do with a customer on the occasion I have observed before now, that in its Arcadian time all my part of London is indistinctly pervaded by the Cow Question. They creep about with beds, and go to bed in miles of deserted houses. They hold no companionship, except that occasioned by the cry of them will emerge from opposite houses, and meet in the middle of the road on a friendly ground, or will pass from adjoining houses over an interposing barrier of area railings, and compare a few reserved mistrustful notes before they gather good ladies or good gentlemen. This I have discovered in the course of various solitary rambles I have taken northward from my residence, during the awful perspectives of Wimpole Street, Harley Street, and similar frowning regions. I have also found it scarcely the metropolitan form that of the primeval forest but for the Klem stragglers; these may be dimly observed, when the evening is still, flitting to and fro, putting up the door-chain, taking in the pint of beer, lowering like phantoms at the dark parlor windows, and disappearing underground with the dust-bin and the water cistern.

In the Darlington Arcade I observe, with peculiar pleasure, the gentle air of manners to have superseded the baneful influences of ultra civilization. Nothing can exceed the politeness of the ladies' shoe-shops, the artificial flower repositories, and the head-dress depôts. They are in strange hands at first, but the hands—bands of unaccustomed persons, who are imperfectly acquainted with the prices of the goods, and contemplate them with unexplained surprise—are kind and tender. The children of these virtuous people exchange familiarities in the Arcade, such as I never could see in the Strand or Holborn. Their youthful prattle blends in an unwonted manner with the harmonious shake of the tenor, and the general effect is, as of the voices of birds in a grove. In this happy restoration of the golden time it has been my privilege even to see the Arcade Bull at his ease. She inspects him his dinner in a basin, and he ate it in his armchair, and afterward fell asleep like a satisfied child. At St. Paul's, the excellent luni-ters's, they are learning French to beguile the time; and even the Police Series lads on guard at Mr. Atkinson's, the perfumer's round the corner (generally the most inexorable gentlemen in London, and the most accustomed to throw out suspects), condescend a little as they drowsily bide or recall their turn for chewing the stirring Neptune on the ribbed pavement. In the Burlington and Rodolfi's, the jewelers, all things are absent but the precious stones, and the only human beings are the lonely passenger at the door with his decorated breast. I might stand night and day for a month to come, in Saville Row, and not see a man in want of and a doctor to look at it for love or money. The dentists' instruments are rusting in their drawers, and their hearth-rugs are worn by people pretend to read the Every-Day Book and not to be afraid, are doing penance for their grimness in white sheets. The lights have a subdued appearance, with one eye always shut up, as if he were eating a slump gooseberry. The tailors, who usually stands at the gate-way of the livery stables on very little legs under a very large waistcoat, has gone to Dorcester. The only melancholy aspect is his gentlemen Yard now, with its grved and scarlet beans, and the yellow Brook housed under a glass roof in a corner. This is the only thing I could not take in there if I tried. In the places of business of the great Cornhill and Poultry houses I am also sorry for lack of being looked into. Ranges of brown paper coat and waistcoat bodies look in Somerset and in Mincing Lane, tenements of the sea tioners with whose names they are inscribed; the measuring tapes hang idle on the wall; the order-ledger, left on the counter in absence of anyone looking in, yawns in the last extremity over the books of patterns, as if he were trying to read that extending history. A wonderful quiet pervades these great houses, and the staffs of servants stare disconsolately next season out of all the windows. The very man who goes about like an erect Turtle, between two boards recommendatory of the Sixteen Shilling Dinner, is aware of himself as a hollow mockery, and eats filberts while he leans his hinder shell against a wall.

Among these unappealing objects it is my delight to walk and meditate. Soothed by the repose around me, I wander about in my easiness, in the distances, and guide myself back by the stars. Thus I enjoy the contrast of a few still partially inhabited streets, between which the lights are not fled, where all the garlands are not dead, whence all but I have not departed. Then does it appear to me that I am the only thing that is not genuine. Thirdly, that he get himself photographed. Then do I speculate, What have these unknown artists been who stand at the photograph doors in Greek caps, sample in hand, and mysteriously solute the public—the hands playful with a pressing tenderness—to come in and be "took?" What did they do with their greasy blackbonnets before the era of the photographic? Were they dead clays were their previous victims, and how victimized? And how did they get the dead clays to pay for, that large collection of likenesses, all purporting to have been taken inside, with the taking of none of which had that establishment any more to do than with the taking of Delhi?

But these are small assets; and I am soon back again in metropolitan Arcadia. It is my impression that much of its serene and peaceful character is attributable to the absence of customary Trade. Every Dr. I know but there may be subtle influences in Talk, to vex the souls of men who don't hear it? How do I know but that Talk, five, ten, twenty miles off, may get into the air and disagree with me? I find it up vaguely troubled and wearied and sick of my life, in the session of Parliament, who shall say that my noble friend, my right reverend friend, my right honorable friend, my honorable friend, my honorable and learned friend, or my honorable and gallant friend, may not be responsible for that effect upon my nervous system? Too much Ozone in the air, I am informed and fully believe (though I have no idea what it is), would affect me in a marvelously disagreeable way; why may not too much Talk? I don't see or hear the Ozone; I don't see or hear the Talk. And there is so much Talk; so much too much; such loud cry, and such scant supply of wool; such a deal of fleecing, and so little done! Hence, in the Arcadian season, I find it a delicious triumph to walk down to Westminster Westminster, and see the Courts shut up; to walk a little further and see the Two Houses shut up; to stand in the Abbey Yard, like the Statue of the Zealander of an English History (concerning which unfortunate man a rookery of nurses' maids is generally being discovered), and see nothing but the ruins of Talk. Returning to my primitive solitude and lying down to sleep, my grateful heart expands with the consciousness that there is no adjourned Debate, no ministerial explanation, nobody to give notice of intention to ask the noble Lord at the head of her Majesty's Government five-and-twenty bootless questions in one, no term time with legal argument, no Nisi Prius with eloquent appeal to British Jury—I feel as if the will to-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow, remain untroubled by the superabundant generation of Talk. In a minor degree it is a delicious triumph to me to go into the club, and see the carpets up, and the chairs down and the room deserted to the four winds. Again, New Zealander-like, I stand on the cold hearth, and say in the solitude, "Where are they all?" Now I will seek always mysteriously low and head always mysteriously drowned, when public political secrets take the aire of Adam's confiding children. Accurred be his memory for ever and a day!"

But I have all this time been coming to the point, that the happy nature of my retirement is most sweetly expressed in its being the abode of Love. It is here, as it were, an insurgence Agamemnon: nobody's speculation; every body's profit. The one great result of the resumption of primitive habits, and the irreversible tyranny that he having much to do, is the abounding of Love.

The Klem people are the invaders of the softer emotions; probably, in that lonmadic race, the softer emotions have all degenerated into flue. But this is not Arcadia, all the sharers of my retreat make love.

I have mentioned Saville Row. We all know the Doctor's residence. We all know what a respectable man he is, what a hard, dry man, what a firm man, what a confidential man: how he sits in the waiting-room, like a man who knows minutely what is the matter with us, but from whom the rash should bring the secret. And yet, from gentle "season" he has distinctly the appearance of a man conscious of money in the savings bank, and taking his comfort on his respectable left arm both feet. At that time it is impossible to associate him with relaxation, or any human weakness, as he stands at his window without feeling guilty of indisposition. In the blessed Arcadian time, how changed! I see him in a flannel boating-coat-and-jacket—jacket—and drab trowsers, with his arm round the waist of a bootmaker's housemaid, smiling in open air. I have seen him at the pump by the Albany, unsolicitedly pumping for two fair young creatures, whose figures, as they bent over the spout of the pump, I may be allowed an original expression—a model for the sculptor. I have seen him tying the guinea in the Doctor's drawing-room with his forefinger, and have heard him humming tunes in praise of lovely woman. I have seen him seated on a low footstool, and gloriously in search of excitement) to fire. I saw him, one moonlight evening when the peace and purity of Arcadia had long been at their height, talk with the lovely daughter of a cleaner of gloves, from the door-steps of his own residence, across the Burlington road by Clifford Street and Old Burlington Street, back to Burlington Gardens. Is this the Golden Age revived, or is it London?

The Dentist's servant. Is that man no mystery to us, no type of invisible power? The tremendous individuality of the man (who also does?) what is done with the extracted teeth; he knows what goes on in the little room where something is always being pulled out of deal; he knows what warm spicy infusion is put into the comfortable tumbler from which he rises our wounded humanity, with a gap in it that feels a foot wide; he knows whether the thing we spit into is a fixture communicating with the Thames, or could be cleaned away for a dance; he sees the horrible parlor when there are no patients in it, and he could reveal, if he would, the last secrets of the Every-Day Book. The conviction of my coward conscience when I see that man in a powerful light, is, that he knows all the statistics of my teeth and gums, my double teeth, my single teeth, my stopped teeth, and my sound. In this Arcadian rest I am fearless of him as of a harmless, powerless creature in a Scotch cap, who adores a young lady in a voluminous cape, who adores a neighboring hillside-road, and whose passion would be manifested if every one of her teeth were false. They may be. He takes them all on trust.

In secluded corners of the place of my seclusion there are little shops withdrawn from public curiosity, and never two together, where servants' perquisites are bought. The cook may dispose of grease at these modest and convenient marts; the butler, of bottles; the valet and lady's maid, of clothes; most servants, indeed, of most things they may happen to lay hold of. I have been told that in sterner times loving correspondence, otherwise interdicted, may be maintained by letter through the agency of some of these useful establishments,

In the Arcadian autumn no such device is necessary. Every body loves, and openly and blamelessly loves. My landlord's young man loves the whole of one side of the way of old Bond Street, and is beloved several doors up new Bond Street besides. I never look out of window but I see kissing of hands going on all around me. It is the morning custom to glide from shop to shop and exchange tender assurances; it is the evening custom for couples to stand hand in hand at house-doors, or roam, linked in that fervent manner, through the unpeopled streets. There is nothing else to do but love; and what there is to do is done.

In unison with this pursuit a chaste simplicity obtains in the domestic habits of Arcadia. Its few scattered wits dine early, live moderately, sup at no socially, and sleep soundly. It is rumored that the Beadles of the Arcade, from being the merital enemies of love, have signed with tears an address to Lord Shaftesbury, and subscribed to a ragged school. No wonder! For they might turn their hoary mace into crook and tend sheep in the Arcade, to the parling of the water-carts as they give the thirsty streets much more to drink than they can carry.

A happy Golden Age, and a serene tranquillity. Charming fellows, but it will fade. The iron age will return, London will come back to town, if I show my tongue then in Saville Row for half a minute I shall be prescribed for, the Doctor and I and the Dentist's man will then pretend that these days of unprofessional innocence never existed. Where Mr. Jones, Mr. Klein and their bed will lay at that time, passes human knowledge; but my hatter believes he will then know many things more, nor will it then know me. The desk at which I have written these meditations will retrievively assist at the settlement of my account, and the wheels of gorgeous carriages and the hoofs of high-stepping horses will crush the silence out of Bond Street—will drive Apollo and the Muses to the elements in granite powder.

THE STEAMER'S MIDNIGHT GUN.

The autumn night is calm and still,
And a mother sits at the window-sill,
While shrills like silver the tree-frog's note,
And the lazy leaves of Ailanthus float
Like shadow-barges that through the dark
Clotch at the fire-fly's lambent spark.

But she does not see the fiery fly,
And she does not hear the Ailanthus sigh;
For her heart is out on the lone wild sea,
Where the long waves roll and the wind is free,
And the viewless arms of her soul surround
The boy of her love that is homeward bound.

This very night is the steamer due,
And ever since twilight to darkness grew
She has watched and sat at that window-sill,
Till the hours have rounded to midnight still;
And peered through the garden silent and dim,
With arms that hungered to twine round him.

Then visions of wreck before her rise:
The billows crawl to the murky skies,
And she hears in fancy the cracking plank,
And sees the corpses livid and dank,
And sees a steamer—when through the room
The signal-guns of the steamer boom!

Her*a* fond heart leaps as she hears the gun.
'Tis an easy thing to read speaks of her son;
And as it roars through the midnight still,
With her head bowed down on the window-sill,
Her heart goes up in a grateful prayer
To Him who is watching every where.

A LOSS 'LONGSHORE.

ONE of the pleasantest occupations of my summer life on the Highlands is lying in supine idleness upon the soft turf under the oak-trees, gazing through their dark green branches at the white clouds drifting slowly athwart the sky; or looking off on the water, watching the fleet of sail ever clustering around the Narrows, like bees at the mouth of a hive; some just entering, laden with riches gathered far and near; others spreading their wings for flight, in quest of further treasures.

One fine afternoon last autumn I had been several hours engaged in the arduous pursuit above mentioned, and therefore rewarded was I by a commanding and most unromantic somnolence, when I was aroused by a heavy splash in the water near by. Then came the clinking rattle of a chain—a sharp creak, followed by a rushing sound, as of a gust of wind—then more creaking, and another rush. Evidently a schooner had come to anchor and dropped her sails. I could not see the vessel from where I lay, and as I would not be at the 'longshoreike to let any craft run in or near without first seeing what she was, I was forced to bestir myself and make proper investigation. Walking to the edge of the bank, I saw a large fore-and-aft or sloop-rigged vessel, with a long chain cable, her crew were putting their water-casks into the boat.

Within a hundred yards of the schooner's berth a rivulet runs down from the hills, and is led through a trough of bark at the foot of the bank, making a little fall of pure soft water, known far and wide as the Spout; a famous watering-place for coaster and other light craft.

I noticed the fine model of the schooner, her taut and tidy rigging, and general neat appearance—very different from the lack-and-slack look of a coaster; and could not make out what she might be. With true 'longshore coolness I determined to pump the boys, when they came for water; and in pursuit of that laudable intention, hastened down the ravine through which the little stream finds its way to the shore. I was taking an incredibly long draught at the Spout when the boats touched the sand, and was startled, not to say shocked, at one of the boys jumping ashore, and cried out,

"Saxon ahoy! Just you mind little for us, will you?"

"Jerry Holmes? Why, where did you come from, Jerry?"

I was a little confused, sure enough.

"From the schooner, of course. Where else? Jerry Holmes is first cousin to Tom and Ben Conover, and mate of the wrecking schooner Fortune Hope. I know the handsome craft then in a moment; and, hiding my favorable impression, inquired if Captain Ben was aboard.

"He is, sir," answered Jerry. "Will you go off with us? The old man 'd be glad to see you."

My oils mood being fairly dissipated, I was blessed to accept the invitation. I could hail Captain Ben hale and hearty as ever; the grip of his great brown hand giving me painful evidence of mollified though still rude vigor.

"Rough service doesn't seem to tell on you a bit, Cap'n Ben," said I, trying to straighten my fingers into shape again.

"No," he answered: "I'm used to a stirring life, and consider it the most natural one possible. I couldn't stand loafing about and quilldriving the way you do though, not a single week. I've live here-away, don't you?"

"Yes; that's our wharf, just up there; the house is back in the hills. I'm all alone there this week; will you go up and take dinner with me?"

"No, boy; you stay here to supper. We've got some big sea-clams from Patchogue, and Jerry 'll make you a chowder. He knows how to make a chowder, Jerry does."

So tempted, I staid; and after a supper which gave ample proof of Jerry's culinary accomplishments, we were enjoying a quiet smoke, when it occurred to me I should like to hear one of Captain Ben's stories. His stories are graphic and graphed descriptions make it a pleasure to hear him relate any of the adventures of which his life has been full.

"A story, eh, Saxon? What sort of yarn will you have?"

"Oh, any little incident, with a dash of sentiment in it."

"Love-making, I suppose you mean?"

"Yes, something in that way. A bit of romance in the spice which gives flavor. A prime necessity, indeed."

"It may be in stories; but 'tis better left out in reality sometimes. I'll tell you a case in point, if you like—a case which came under my notice off Cathart, right on this spot, long ago as when I was a boy. Taun't much of a story though; maybe I better tack up something else."

"No, Cap'n Ben; let's hear about Jimmy Cat-hart—'Little Jim,' they used to call him, didn't they?"

"Yes; he was a little bit of a feller—not bigger than a minute. Kinky curls and eyes twinkling as smart as a whip. He was 'prenticed to a boatbuilder up Keyport way somewhere, when he was a boy, and made a little time we was in there on a coaster. He wasn't more'n twenty-two or three when he had enough saved up to buy an old schooner for himself. She was called the Spout, a pretty, clean-looking old craft, sure enough; soft as a pear, and if there was any stirring about her, you'd have to pumps going twenty-four hours round. He did pretty well in her though for a good while, carrying country store freights down to Keyport, and bringing back pine wood. He'd load-up in York, run down inside the Hook here, wait till a fair breeze came, and away he'd go."

"We was living over on Clay-Pit Creek in them days, near where Hookerville is now—though there was hardly another house there till long after we moved away—and Jimmy he took a great notion of coming over to our place whenever the Tempest was lying in the bay. Mother had a kind of second-cousin from way out in Kentucky living with us then, and Jimmy's long legged ways took to her mother Little Jim. She was a great big girl—not as much older than Jimmy as you'd look down very heavy; but was mighty long geared—just about as much too tall as Jim was too short, and that's the reason I call her a girl, for she didn't look like a woman, only more bright and rosy-cheek or other, that he had given to her. So things went on, till one morning, after Jim had been there, I happened to look down at the foot of the bank. Mary asking mother's advice about him. Mother said Jim was a little better off than some, and likewise, I'll say, and he seemed a careful, freehanded sort of body, likely to get on in the world, and if Mary set store by him, maybe she couldn't do better than to have him.

"In about three weeks Jim was at the house again, and I noticed he had a very handsome ring on his finger. Well, we left a big fire for 'em in the kitchen that night, and the next morning, when Mary came down, long after we'd all done breakfast, the first thing I saw was the handsome ring on her left hand. It seemed to fit pretty well too, for her fingers were full as big as his any day. After that we all knew they was engaged, though she wouldn't admit a word of it. Jim told me they was, and allowed the wedding would be that next spring.

"I don't know as I ever ought to have spoken against the girl; but she was a proud, hard-mouthed piece: I never did like her at all, and she couldn't bear the sight of me. I asked her one day when the and Jim was going to be married. I spoke kind enough too, wasn't teasing her at all; but she looked up real ugly like, and snapped out, 'Never! I wouldn't marry such a little varlet to save his life.'

"I was a young shaver then, and might better have minded my business; but next time I saw little Jim I told him he'd better keep a sharp eyes on Mary. 'You look out now, Jim,' says I, 'for that girl will do you a bad turn yet.' Jim, like a goose, went and told her all I said, and of course that didn't improve matters 'twixt her and me.

"Jimmy didn't come into the bay next trip he made, but sailed straight from New York, and we saw nothing more of him till winter was most over. He wrote two or three letters to Mary, and I believe she answered 'em, though she was so close about it I never fairly knew whether she did or not. I asked no more questions, for I didn't want to make trouble, and Mary kept her lips pretty tight with her. 'Twas no use though; I couldn't suit on her course at all, and she did fare me that winter. Like as not I was to blame.

"Along in February I went up to town to see the celebration of Washington's birthday, and while there I met little Jimmy on Broadway. He said the Tempest was most loaded, and he'd be off in a day or two; so I waited, and he came down with him. How he ever contrived to keep afloat in that old tub so long is more than I can imagine; but there he was every seam, and you could stand in the hold and see daylight through the deck most any where; the mainmast played about loose in the step, and the crazy old rigging was so rotten that Little Jim was the only man aboard who dared go aloft. Jim told me he had put in an assorted cargo on his own account, and was in hopes he'd make money enough out of it to buy a new vessel. And then, you know, says the poor little feller, 'the next thing will be a nice little house for Mary and me.'

"Time enough for the house after you get the girl, says I.

"Jim was in high feather though, and wouldn't shorten sail for any little breeze that I could raise. So we had a jolly run down the bay, singing songs and drinking toasts in which there was half a dozen casks in the hold. 'Twas about four o'clock in the afternoon when we come to anchor off the Spout here, pretty much where the Hope is lying now. Jim sat the boys to work getting in water, and when he and I trapsed over home. We found supper on the table, the house all in order, and mistress Mary dressed up for the occasion, as I had spoken what day Jim was going to be married. She seemed real glad to see Jimmy, and all that evening her gentle, kindly ways toward him made me feel right down sure that she'd had a hard thought about her. Little Jim was just as happy as he could be; and when we left them together mother and she were just about as glum as fond of each other.

"Our house being on the south side of the hills, and pretty well down toward the creek, we hardly ever felt the northerly winds there at all. That night I woke up about two o'clock, and heard a heavy, roaring sound, that said 'Storm!' just as plain as speech. I lay and listened a while, but couldn't make out whether 'twas a treemendous surf outside or a northerly gale howling through the tree-tops on the heights. Finally, I got up and went outdoors. Mother was fussing in her kitchen yet, and when Jim heard me he came out and said, 'What's the matter, Cap'n?' says he, pleasant as Sunday morning in April.

"'I don't know,' says I; 'but I'm afraid, from the looks, there's a gale of wind from no'theast.'

"Jim was frightened right away. 'The boys 'll have sense enough to run over to the cove if it comes on to blow very hard,' says he, right off.

"I should; but I'd want to be in the neighborhood of the schooner myself, if I was you.'

"Of course. I'll go right over: I ought to have gone before.'

"'I'll go too,' says I; and with that we went in the house to put on oil-skins, for it began to rain right sharp.

"Well, Saxon, we had a hard journey that night, I tell you. 'Twasn't so very bad at first, but when we got out among the trees the hills it did seem as though all the furies were let loose. The rain poured right down like a thunder-shower; oil-skin wasn't any protection at all, we were soaked through in five minutes. A storm always seems a good deal worse to me in the woods than on the water; and I'll own to you, I was frightened, and wished a good many times we hadn't started. 'Twas so dark that we couldn't see one bit more than our eyes right before us, and couldn't tell what; we had to take to the boots and stockings, and felt our way along the path with our feet; dead branches, torn from the trees, came crashing down, scratching us all to pieces and stripping our clothes to rags; and the terrific roar of the wind was so deafening that we could hardly make each other hear at all. Once Jimmy lost the path, and, though he shouted that down at the top of his lungs, I didn't know just what he was close behind me until I stumbled over and fallen over him. Then I got up and waited a long while, and just started back to try and find him when he came bang against me. Finally, we got out of the path entirely, and couldn't find it again; so Jimmy took off his handkerchief, and I took one end and he the other so as not to lose each other; and keeping the wind full in our faces, we made a push for the bank. We had to move very slow for fear of striking the trees, and must have been more than two hours crawling through patches of brier and laurel, and blundering over stumps and stones and fallen trees. I began to think the wind had shifted, and was leading us round, so we wouldn't get any where until morning; but we did though, for next minute we both pitched headlong over-head off the bank, striking in the sand, about twenty feet down, and raising a stiffing scramble the rest of the way to the bottom.

"We picked ourselves up, beat way we could, and started up shore. We hadn't gone far before I concluded, from the make of the land, that we must have come down below the Steams: and sure enough we fetched up directly, all standing: grin the rocks. There was nothing for us then but to climb up the bank again, and a mean one it was of it. After half an hour of hard scratching we managed to reach the top; and Jimmy lay right down on the ground, pretty nigh tuckered out. Pretty soon daylight began to show a little, and we started on, coming down to the shore here, at the Spout.

"The schooner was gone; and Jimmy felt pleased enough, thinking she was safe in the cove.

"'Maybe she is,' says I; 'but look up yonder. There's a craft of some sort ashore there.'

"'Sure enough,' answered Jim, all much again. 'Let's go up.'

"The rain was pretty much over; and though the wind held no'theast, 'twas running down a good deal as the sun rose.

"When we came abreast of where your wharf is now, there lay the old Tempest broadside on, her mainmast-foot sticking through her bottom; starn of her all clear by, and her crew transferring longshore clear up to Brown's Point. The boys must have taken too much ale that night, for they were all asleep when the rotten old craft broke away, and didn't know there was any thing wrong till the schooner struck.

"Little Jim stood looking at the wreck a long time. Finally turning to me, he says, 'Ben, let's go and tell Mary.' So we got to the front door of the ladder again: I'm afraid 'twill be a disappointment to her.'

"Jim's short had come ashore near by, and I told him to make a change 'fore going any further, for it looked too cold. His clothes was torn to rags, and most—he was covered with blood from head to foot. I wasn't any better; but Jim's togs were too much for me, so I waited to the bay and washed up well as I could, and we started for home.

"Mother got breakfast ready while I was putting on dry; and Mary came down to the table just as Jimmy was telling about the wreck. She did not seem to like Jimmy's account of it much; but on ugly look came to her face, and her thin lips kept drawing together tighter and tighter, and looking crueler toward her, said he supposed he'd lost pretty much every thing, then she got up and left the kitchen. Jim soon followed her, and they had a long talk together on the back stoop. I told mother Mary seemed to take it rather hard.

"'Naturally,' mother said. 'They are both young though, and can afford to wait a few years till Jimmy gets up again.'

"'I hope she'll think so,' says I; 'but we'll soon see.'

"I went out front of the house to see how the weather was, and pretty soon little Jim came out looking just as white as could be. I stood by the gate, and as he was going past I spoke a word to stop him. He shook my hand mighty hard without saying a word, turned down the road, and that is the last we ever saw or heard of Jimmy Cathart from that day to this.

"I walked straight through the house and found Mary sitting on the back door-step. 'Mary,' said I, 'what's between you and Jimmy?'

"'Nothing that he won't,' says Miss Mary, holding up her bare finger where she had worn his ring.

"'What did you say to him, Mary Patterson?'

"'I told him I'd never marry a laggery,' said she, just as quiet and cool as I am now.

"I didn't say any thing more, but started over to the wreck, thinking I'd find Jim there. He never went near the old schooner though; and after waiting all the morning for him, I set to work to save what was left of the cargo. That was the first bit of wrecking ever I did; I got over twelve hundred dollars out of it, all told. There was a lot of slate aboard belonging to some one in Virginny, and after paying for that, and some little costs, there was about a thousand dollars left, which I put in the savings bank for Jim.

"I did never pick up bits of slate, Saxon, 'longshore above the Spout?"

"Many a time; I often used to skip little pieces of slate over the water, and always wondered where they came from."

"I expect they come out of the old Tempest, and that's all there is left of her. I declare, Saxon, 'tis most nine o'clock. My story was longer than I thought for."

"Why, Cap'n Ben, you haven't finished yet?"

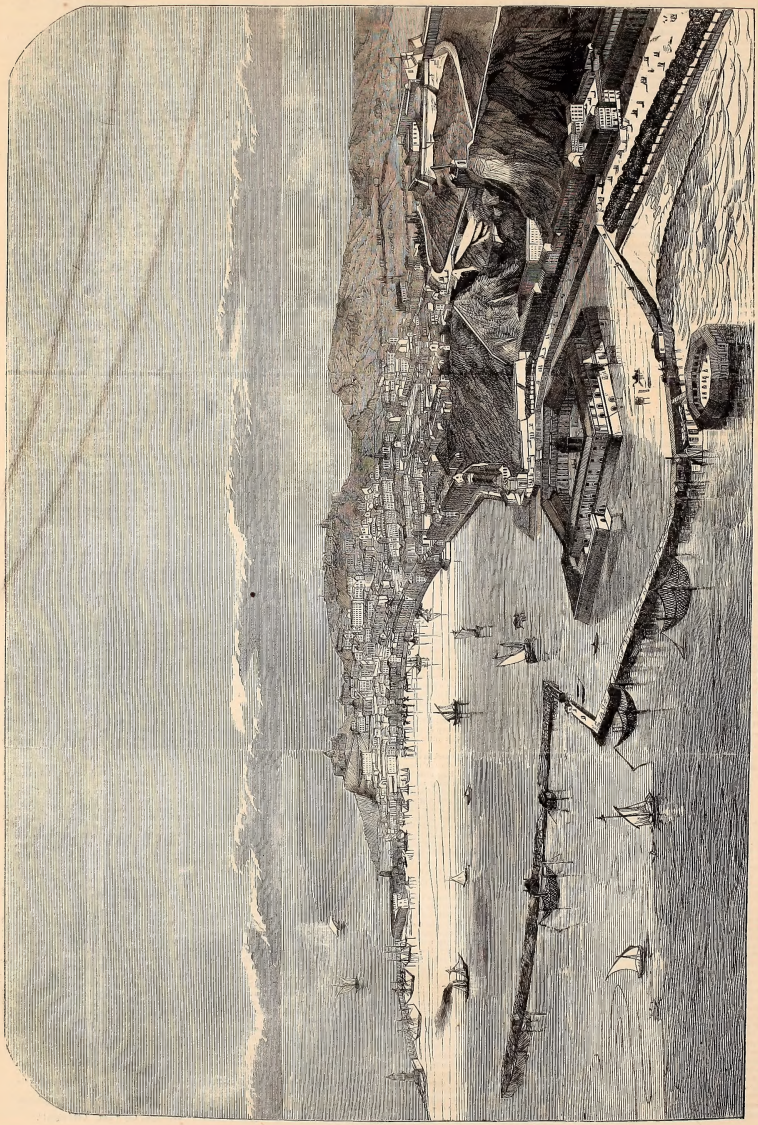
"Yes, pretty much, I reckon. Haven't I?"

"No, indeed. You didn't tell me what ever became of Mary Patterson."

"Oh, Mary lived 'long with our folks till mother died, then, as Little Jim never came back, I made over the money in the savings bank to her. She bought a little house over in Shewsbury-town, and lives there yet. She's an old woman now, and growing feeble, they say. Poor old soul! I must go see her next time I'm down that way."

"She never was married, then?"

"No; never was married. No one ever seemed to take a notion for her after Jim went away; and before I left home she got to be about the crossest old maid you ever see in your life. There's the yawl 'long side; any time you want to go home, Saxon, any of the boys 'll run ashore. I'd ask you to stay overnight, only we'll be under way in the morning long 'fore you want to be astir."



"To-morrow late; I'll be off now, I guess, Cap'n Ben."

"Well, good-by, then. Come down to Squan and see the folks."

"I will so, sure enough. Much obliged for the story."

"You'd be more welcome to a better one, Saxon. Good-night!"

"Good-night, Cap'n Ben. Good-night!"

THE CITY OF ANCONA, STATES OF THE CHURCH, ITALY.

THE TRIUMPHAL ENTRY OF GARIBALDI INTO NAPLES.

THE WAR IN ITALY.

We publish, as illustrations of the pending conflict in Italy, a fine view of Ancona, which was the last refuge of Lamoricière and his mercenaries—a picture of the arrival of Garibaldi at Naples, fully described in the last number of the Weekly—and a fine cartoon illustrating the departure of superstition on the arrival of the popular leader.

Ancona is one of the strongest places in Italy. It is a sea-port town on the Adriatic, with a population of about 40,000, one-eighth of whom are Jews, and live in a quarter of their own. It is, as we said, strongly fortified. On the summit of one of the two hills on whose slope the town rests stands a frowning citadel; other forts, built with no mean skill, protect the harbor. As shown in our picture, the port is inclosed by two moles, on one of which stands an arch erected to Trajan 1650 years ago.

In ancient history Ancona occupies no prominent place. We read of it occasionally in the ancient literature of Rome, but its record is not as interesting as that of many smaller Italian towns. In recent times it figures more prominently. In 1798 it was taken by the French; in the following year occurred the memorable siege with which every reader of history is familiar. In 1802 it was restored to the Pope, and has ever since formed part of his dominion. With the fall of Ancona he has lost the whole of his realm—except Rome, and a strip on the sea-board adjacent.

The departure of the monk, with the blood of Saint Januarius and the winning picture, fitly illustrates the awakening of Italy from the gloom in which she has been kept by priest and prince. Every one has heard of the famous phial of holy blood which on certain days of the year, by especial miracle, becomes liquid at the command of a priest, who holds the phial high in air before a delighted audience. Murat rather shook the credit of the miracle, when, in order to excite the populace against him, the priests gave out that the blood would not liquefy, in consequence of the anger of the Saint at the domination of the French, he sent them word that if the usual miracle were not performed in twenty minutes he would open fire on the monastery, and long before the allday expired the desired result was obtained. Still, such is the ignorance in which the Roman Catholic priests have kept the people, that to this day Saint Januarius has hosts of adherents in Naples; and only a few weeks since, before the flight of the King, he was trotted out by a sanguine monk to perform a miracle on behalf of the fossils and their monarch. Now, thank Heaven! all this rubbish has disappeared before the potent finger of Garibaldi, the liberator and the avenger. In reference to this picture we subjoin the following poem:

THE SAINT AND THE HERO.—GARIBALDI DRIVING ST. JANUARIUS AND THE WINKING PICTURE OUT OF NAPLES.

THE SAINT AND THE HERO.

Ye holy knaves, to whom the crowd
In stupid adoration knelt,
To see, while abject heads they bowed,
The blood of Januarius melt:
A greater miracle behold
Than that of simulated gore,
Which melts when hot, congeals when cold,
But which your silly dupes adore.

Ye know how Italy has been,
Thank most yourselves, for weary years,
Of slavery a mournful scene—
A wretched land of blood and tears.
Her best blood ne'er had ceased to drip,
Her tears continued still to flow,
Beneath the rule of sword and whip,
Since Freedom perished long ago.

But now, as Garibaldi speeds,
To Italy, from hills to shore,
Restoring Liberty, she bleeds
And weeps, except for joy, no more.
False jugglers, he outdoes your art;
His honest truth excels your lie;
His hand has healed her wounded heart;
Her blood is stanched; her tears are dry.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE CENSUS OF NEW ENGLAND.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

BOSTON, October 4, 1860.

It is important that a paper having so great a circulation through the land as yours, and so deservedly relied upon for information upon matters of fact, should state its census estimates correctly. In the article entitled "The Census of 1860," a doubt is expressed whether "New England will show any increase at all," and that its "sea-board cities will probably show a falling-off."

From returns published in the papers there is reason to believe that "no sea-board city," or any other city, in New England has fallen off in population. On the contrary, many of them have largely increased. Boston has, by returns, about 40,000 more inhabitants than in 1850, the number now being over 177,000; and thecouniguous cities, Roxbury, Cambridge, Charlestown, and Chelsea, have increased in the like ratio. Excepting in very few small agricultural towns in the western part of the State, it is believed that there has been no falling off. On the contrary, there is sufficient evidence already public that the census of the State will exceed 1,200,000—a gain of more than 200,000 in the ten years. Maine has increased at least 80,000, and Connecticut 60,000; Rhode Island, 20,000. The census of New Hampshire has been made up, and shows a small gain. Vermont has probably done no worse that New Hampshire.

Upon the whole, it may be safely stated that New England has not gained less than 400,000 since the census of 1850, of which official evidence will shortly be forthcoming.

As the value of this statement, published in your most excellent paper, would give pleasure to many of your subscribers in this region, who do not like to have New England represented as being in a state of decadence. TRI-MOUNTAIN.

GRIEF IS NOT TOLD BY WORDS.

BY C. H. WEBB.

GRIEF is not told by words,
By willows, nor by weeds;
The vase which wrecks a life
No tell-tale trapping needs.

I hate the dripping soul
That must its tears disclose;
The man who asks his friends
To feast upon his woes;

When Arminius dies,
Who spins a word-pall fine,
Which haply brings his purse
A penny to the line.

Few heed the urn that brims
With hopes, and doubts, and fears—
The emotions all besprunt
With deftly chiseled tears.

Few pause above the grave
Where word with willow vies;
The marble gravely puns—
Hic jacet hints of lies!

But mark the plain white stone
Where love records its loss;
The stone that only bears
Initials and a cross;

And you have found a woe
Where tears brought no relief—
A heart too strong to break,
Too proud to tell its grief.

And in the crowd you'll meet
One lonely and apart;
He utters no complaint,
But this grave lies in his heart.

He joins you in the dance—
You pledge him in the bowl;
But of this plain white stone you see
The shadow on his soul.

GREENER'S GUNS.

CAUTION TO SPORTSMEN.

WM. GREENER,

Inventor of the premium system of improved Rifles, the first-class modules in all the exhibitions of 1851, 1853, and 1854, and the recognized model gunmaker for the English Government, having found it necessary to take immediate steps to arrest the spurious manufacture of gun purporting to be of his make, and having forged marks and labels and other close imitations of his style, which are now being introduced into the United States, a fraud on the consumer and depreciating to my reputation, I have hereby appointed MESSRS. SHAUGHN, HASTIE, and GRAHAM, 12 Maiden Lane, New York, my sole agents, from whom the genuine manufacture may be obtained. Each gun will be accompanied with a certificate of identity and quality, signed by myself and agents. Having recently erected one of the largest gun manufactories in England, I am now able to ensure, not only an improvement but an increase of the quality, and assure a long continuance of the favor of the sportsmen of America. Burnett's Cocoaine.

WATERVILLE, ME., Sept. 15, 1860.

MESSRS. JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.: DEAR SIRS—I deem it but just to state to you some of the benefits I have derived from the use of your Cocoaine. Twelve years ago I had the typhus fever; after my recovery I found myself troubled with an irritation of the scalp, which had continued to annoy me very much, and to alleviate it I had failed to find a remedy.

Having seen your Cocoaine advertised, I purchased a bottle only for the purpose of a hair dressing; but to my surprise, it has entirely removed the irritation of so long standing. Deriving so much benefit from its use, I have recommended it to several of my friends, who were afflicted in the same way, and it has wholly eradicated the disease.

CALLENDER'S CARBO-AIR GAS LAMP,

For Burning Coal-Oils without Wick or Chimney.

The amazing increase in the supply of mineral oils for illuminating purposes, both by the extensive distillation of coal, and by the discovery of natural oil springs in the various parts of the country, increases in like ratio the demand for lamps in which those materials can be burned to the best satisfaction.

Callender's Carbo-Air Lamp

is the result of years of toil and thought on the part of the inventor, and now more than at it proves, it is the only lamp in the market which will burn successfully the various products, without chimney or wick, of the distillation of coal gas-formed fluids. So great is our confidence in the superiority of this lamp that we have made extensive and expensive preparations to manufacture them on a larger scale, and we are now prepared to fill all orders, however large, promptly.

All the oils that can be burned satisfactorily in the ordinary coal-oil lamp with a wick and chimney, can be burned in Callender's Carbo-Air Lamp without a wick and chimney.

Callender's Carbo-Air Lamp

will afford pure mineral oils far richer in illuminating power than the oils usually burned in the common coal-oil lamp. The oils burn so

The Cheapest and Best Family and General Newspaper in the United States.

THE NEW YORK WEEKLY TIMES is a large and elegantly printed quarto sheet, of eight pages, or forty-eight columns—devoted to Politics, Literature, and General News, and intended to be the BEST as well as the CHEAPEST FAMILY NEWSPAPER in the United States.

The first aim of the TIMES is, and will always be, to keep its readers thoroughly and reliably posted up, as to everything which may happen, of general interest, in any part of the world. It contents fully and freely upon all topics of importance in every department of public action, and always in the interest of Freedom, Order, and Public Good. While its influence will be uniformly conservative, it advocates every measure of just and beneficent Progress, and resists the increase, extension, or perpetuation of Slavery, as of every thing else incompatible with the highest welfare of the whole community. While it reports promptly and accurately all intelligence of general interest in every department of human activity, it never panders to vicious tastes, and excludes from its columns every thing that might render it unsafe or improper for general FAMILY perusal. It seeks to promote the general welfare by urging the claims of

EDUCATION, MORALITY, AND RELIGION

upon the masses of the people; and in all its discussions, it endeavors constantly to be guided and controlled by the spirit of

MODERATION, PATRIOTISM, AND COMMON SENSE.

In its Commercial section, both Foreign and Domestic, the TIMES is confessed to be superior to any other American Journal. Its REPORTS of Congressional and Legislative proceedings, of Financial, Commercial, and of important Legal and Criminal Trials, and of whatever may have special interest for the great body of the community, are full, prompt, and reliable.

GENERAL INTELLIGENCE,

Especial attention is devoted to full, accurate, and trustworthy reports of the

To the Ladies!
Andrews' "Excelsior" Yeast
Powder
Takes the precedence over all others, for the good reasons:
It is always perfectly pure in its ingredients, and none but THE BEST are used, and it is always of the same strength.
It is reliable for any length of time in any climate, and the directions for its use are simple and easily followed.
It bears the highest recommendation for cooking purposes OF TRA-CARIB, that they are fast losing "Aunt Dinah's" RECIPE BOOK with this Powder in use! Economical, and is sweeter and will keep longer than by any other method. Makes the finest pastry the flour is being, but increases its weight, and is a great saving in economy to any family using it regularly.
It is ready for use in one minute!
It is the only Powder that has been established over ten years!
We sell on an average 1200 cans per day—over 250,000 per annum.
The Trade Trade throughout the South, West, and East constantly patronize ANDREWS' EXCELSIOR BAKING POWDER, and the family ones would, if they never have any other.
Remember, it is the BEST TRADE everywhere, and beware of the common deleterious mixtures, which are sold cheap, and which are injurious to health.
Try ANDREWS' EXCELSIOR YEAST POWDER — the Standard of Excellence, and has been established.

THE DIAPHRAGM FILTER, manufactured by MESSRS. MCKENZIE & O'HARA, is the kind of Porous Filter to which I alluded in my recent report to the Croton Board. I consider the artificial sandstone, which constitutes the filtering medium, to be an excellent article for the purpose. The instrument is quite durable, and only requires to be restored occasionally, to insure its action.

The Grover & Baker
Reissue
Family Sewing Machine
is rapidly superseding all others for family use. The DOUBLE LOCK-STITCH formed by this Machine is found to be the most perfect that will survive the washing of seams, and, therefore, the only one permanently valuable for Family Sewing.
READ THE FOLLOWING TESTIMONY.
"Mrs. Lincoln, wife of the President, presents her compliments to Grover & Baker, and takes pleasure in saying that she has used one of their Machines for a year, and finds that it still in good order, makes a beautiful stitch, and does easily what is claimed for it by the inventors."
"I take pleasure in saying, that the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine I purchased of them stands unrivalled in action. After trying and returning others, I have three of them in operation in my family at different places, and for four years' trial, have no fault to find."—T. H. Hammond, Governor of Maryland.
"My wife has had one of Grover & Baker's Family Sewing Machines in constant use, and I can unhesitatingly say one of the best labor-saving machines that has been invented. I have also had occasion to recommend it to the public."—J. G. Harris, Governor of Tennessee.
The Grover & Baker Sewing Machine has performed fully equal to representation. My negro clothes were made with it for $1 50, and appear to have said the clothes for winter are now being made with it. The seamed kersey, inserts, bosoms, &c., were used for the clothes. It has been used on many fine articles, such as flannel, cloth, silk, and velvet. I am perfectly satisfied with it, and would not be deprived of its use for three times its cost.—Jefferson Davis, late Secretary of War.
"On the recommendation of a friend, I procured, some months since, one of your Family Sewing Machines. My family has been most successful in its use from the start, without any of the difficulties usually attending its management. My wife says it is a 'family blessing,' and could not be induced to part with it for twice its cost, if unable I must beastly concur."—James Pollock, Ex-Governor of Pennsylvania.

Thorley's Food for Horses, Cows, Sheep, and Hogs, understood, it will become an article of universal consumption for all who have an interest in domestic animals.

The fact of England being a great cattle-rearing country, has doubtless given an impetus to the study of animal forage, and led to that research after the materials best adapted for the purpose of fattening and improving stock, which has resulted in the production of the above food and other valuable discoveries regarding animal development.

Thorley's Food for Cattle may be used for all animals; its effect is to invigorate their health and increase their physical power. It is found particularly beneficial in restoring to good condition horses which have been overworked or become thin and worn through disease, or those of a naturally feeble constitution. Its use for cows increases the quantity and enriches the quality of their milk. It is extremely nourishing for calves and lambs, rendering them hardy and producing rapid growth. In fattening qualities are perhaps the most remarkable of any, and are well and convincingly displayed in feeding up pigs, &c. The flesh of animals fed with it is greatly superior in consistency and flavor to that of others.

In addition to its extensive use throughout Great Britain, Thorley's Food for Cattle is largely exported to the United States, Canada, South America, France, Germany, Russia, Denmark, Sweden, Cuba, and has at various times been shipped to most other parts of the world, including the Atlantic Islands and Australia. The extent of the appreciation felt for the Food will be seen from testimonials selected from a large number voluntarily given by the writers, many of whom occupy high positions in society, and are distinguished for their attainments in various branches of sci.nce, art, and commerce.

Casks containing 448 feeds, with measure inclosed, $14. Half casks, containing 224 feeds, with measure inclosed, $7. A pamphlet mailed free.

This artificially-prepared Food for Animals was invented and introduced to the British people by the proprietor about four years since, and it has now become established as a legitimate article of commerce. Its useful character and beneficial effects being generally recognized and admitted. The sale has been constantly and rapidly increasing, not only among agriculturists and breeders of stock, but with the public in general; and there can be no doubt that, as its merits are better known, it will become an article of universal consumption for all who have an interest in domestic animals.

TO SOUTHERNERS, DRINKERS OF
Congress Water.

MUCH spurious Mineral Water is sold as "CONGRESS WATER" by unprincipled persons or counterfeiters, who, when they dare not use that name, call it "Saratoga" Water, "Saratoga," being only the name of the town where the Spring is situated.

To protect the public from such impositions, we have all our Corks branded thus:

CONGRESS WATER.

Any one finding these words and letters on the Corks, are Counterfeit; and the Purchaser should prosecute the Seller for swindling.

Orders will receive prompt attention if addressed to us at our Southern Depot of Congress Water, 98 CEDAR STREET, New York City.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. IV.—No. 200.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1860. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

"ALL DAY LONG IN THE CORNER SHE SITS."

PUSS IN THE CORNER.

All day long in the corner she sits;
All day long in the corner she knits;
But while her dexterous needles play
Her eyes, so liquid and large and gray,
Mark me and watch me around the house,
For she's "Puss in the Corner," and I'm the mouse.

My puss hasn't got any taloned claws,
And white as milk are her pretty paws;
And none of the feline cruelty lies
Lurking within her deep gray eyes;
Yet she holds me and keeps me about the house,
For she's "Puss in the Corner," and I'm the mouse.

I have heard that a very long time ago,
When the world was young, and the world was slow,
A lusty lion in a net was caught,
And the Monarch of Beasts was like to rot,
Till the woven threads of his prison-house
Were gnawed away by a little mouse.

This antique tale is reversed for me.
I'm a mouse in a net, and I can't get free;
For crosswise around my poor heart twines
The net of Love in a thousand lines;
And "Puss in the Corner" sits and smiles,
And fastens the knots with a thousand wiles.

But I know the way to break the chains—
A single course to me remains:
When once the marriage vows are said,
When "Puss in the Corner" and I are wed,
We'll see who rules all over the house,
And which is the cat and which the mouse!

WAITING UNDER THE WALNUT-TREE.

Twilight floats from over the hills,
A mystic presence the landscape fills,
The cloudy courtiers have just begun
To usher to rest the setting sun;
And the edge of the woods is dark and clear,
Cleaving the luminous atmosphere,
While Hannah, as still as still can be,
Is waiting under the walnut-tree.

But now and then a walnut drops
From off the old tree's ripening tops,
And Hannah starts, for she thinks her ear
Has caught the steps of her lover near:
So she hides and listens, and listens and thinks,
While her little heart rises and swells and sinks,
For the sounds of the falling walnuts die,
And no hastening lover meets her eye.

He had sworn to come. He told her so.
Can he be false? Oh no! oh no!
His heart is as true as his eyes are clear—
And yet she faints with a nameless fear!
She listens anew, but there is no sound
Save the walnuts dropping upon the ground;
And the hills are blackening one by one,
And her poor hopes sink with the setting sun.

Ah! in the corn-field down below,
Where the maize is stacked and the poppies grow,
Something is lying all stiff and cold,
Close by a hillock of ears of gold;
And the yellowing wrecks of the maize-leaves wave
Like mourners over a loved one's grave,
And the sleepy poppies their brown seeds shed,
In slumberous tribute above the dead.

Hannah may wait till the moon is up,
And the dews overflow in the poppy's cup,
But the longed-for lover will never stir
From the furrow he lies in to fondle her;
For a rival's knife his young heart has cleft,
And the poppies are pale by the stain it left—
The stain of the red blood flowing free,
While Hannah waits by the walnut-tree!

"WHILE HANNAH WAITS BY THE WALNUT-TREE."

A NIGHT ADVENTURE IN IRELAND.

BY A SOLDIER.

When our regiment was quartered in Ireland, some of my company were ordered to a town within five hours' march of where we lay. My duty was to escort them there, and return by the evening train from a station a few miles from where my comrades were to be left.

We reached our destination in due time, and arrangements were made for my departure; but as the evening set in very inclement, I halted as long as possible, in hops that the storm would abate. This, however, was not the result: the storm grew more severe, and my orders being nearly imperative, I had to set forth in the midst of the blast. Making headway against the weather took up more time than I had calculated on, and I reached the station only to learn that the last train had passed. I spent little time in hesitation, as I had only one course before me if my quarters were to be reached that night; so, drenched and weary, I retraced my steps.

"THE FIGURE IN THE DEAD DRESS, WHICH LAY ON A CHEST," ETC.

When night began to close in, and the weather grew dense and thick, I for the first time thought that if darkness were once on, and an inn should invite shelter, I would, under the circumstances, avail myself of it and remain till daybreak. I had not a very accurate knowledge of the district, yet I did not doubt that I was on the right road the length I had gone; still a slight hesitation arose, and I resolved to make inquiry the first opportunity. I continued to go on a considerable distance without sight or sound of human existence, but I was at length fortunate enough to fall in with an old woman driving a cow. When she recovered from her surprise at seeing me, I was fully convinced by her that I had gone astray, and was farther from an inn than it would be agreeable to travel. It appeared there were no houses near but her own—where there was no accommodation—and another one where I might have been put up, but a man having died there that morning, and the widow being in the house alone, it was thought she might object to the presence of a stranger. I resolved to try, at any rate, and got such directions for reaching the place as were seemingly intelligible, when my informant and I parted company.

The house was not so easily found as I had hoped, but I stumbled upon it after nearly losing temper, and advanced considerably elevated in spirits when its outline attracted my bewildered sight. At first I knocked somewhat gently, not to startle the inmate; but no notice being taken, I repeated it much louder. A stir within followed this, and a voice gruffly inquired the purpose of the disturber.

I began to explain my situation; but before I had spoken a dozen en words I was told I could not get admittance, as there was a dead man in the house. I remonstrated, and urged the necessity of my case, offering to sit in any corner, and give no trouble nor annoyance. Still I was only told, in notes a key or two louder, that I might as well depart at once. This frittated me greatly, and I angrily shouted, that unless she let me in quietly I would force the door and enter in spite of her.

There must have been a tone of determined resolution in my speech, for the door was partly opened and immediately after the threat; some parley and grumbling followed, when the door was opened and a candle lit. The woman who let me in very suspiciously, and appeared either alarmed or annoyed; but I urged her to be composed, and give herself no uneasiness on my account.

The house was miserably furnished, the chief objects which arrested my attention were the bedsteads lining the figure in the dead dress, which lay on a chest before the bed, and a table by the fireside had out with provisions. The latter were, to me, rather tempting; but my newly-made friend seemed anxious that I should not be allowed too narrow a survey of her premises, as she requested me to follow her to an inner apartment. I would have preferred staying where I was, but I did not consider it reasonable that she should have the choice of where I was to be located, so I followed when she led the way.

In this place there was nothing but a low erection covered with straw, and an old-fashioned stool lying upon the floor. I was told I could take the stool or the "bed," and left alone; but she handed in a piece of bread a few minutes afterward, with a subtle remark that we are "all brothers."

Tired as I was, I felt more disposed to watch the woman's motions than court repose, and this I eventually grew tedious, and I began to get drowsy. I therefore quietly lay down, and, to prevent me being taken by surprise, I placed my face opposite the door, so that it could not be opened without awakening me. In this position I fell into a slight sleep, but a movement in the other apartment made me start and listen. Through the crevices in the old door I could only see indistinctly, but I could hear the woman I had been listening behind it; and when I saw this, I dare say I helped to convince her that I was fast asleep by certain nasal sounds I introduced at intervals.

She soon desisted, and slipped cautiously back, and, my suspicions being quite set at rest, I peered sagely through the seams. She wrapped a shawl around her, set a lighted candle on the table, and left the house, locking the door carefully behind her. I confess to getting uneasy at this, and a feeling of awe at the loneliness of my position crept through my frame. Not knowing what might follow, I loaded my musket, as I thought it better to be able to defend myself if that should be necessitated.

I waited anxiously a long time, but heard no sign of her return, nor any sound save the dull clicks of an old clock and the splashing of the rain outside. At length I was seized with a desire to inspect the premises, and after a slight hesitation I ventured into the other end. It was the most miserable position in which I ever found myself, the solemn stillness imparting a feeling of much akin to terror as the greatest fear of real danger could ever instill within me; but my nervousness was almost immediately interrupted by a rustling movement in the direction where the dead man lay.

I started at this, and moved my piece into a better position, and I think I could have saved the top dull clicks of an old clock and the splashing of the rain outside. At length I was seized with a desire to inspect the premises, and after a slight hesitation I ventured into the other end. It was the most miserable position in which I ever found myself, the solemn stillness imparting a feeling of much akin to terror as the greatest fear of real danger could ever instill within me; but my nervousness was almost immediately interrupted by a rustling movement in the direction where the dead man lay.

I started at this, and moved my piece into a better position, and I think I could have saved the top of my shoulder, when I saw the sheets moving on the lifeless body, as I had thought it. My hair, which was naturally so short as to be always on end, can not exactly be said to have stood erect at this; but I perspired at every pore, and felt somewhat unnerved, although I am no stranger to superstitious fears. At this stage a voice from the sheets addressed me in a low tone, saying, slowly and distinctly, "Soldier, soldier, won't you watch shoot me."

This partly convinced me that he was still an animated being; but I was not by any means at ease, and could only respond by a searching yet bewildered stare.

"Sowl! an' I'm living as ye see," he said, turning round; "but if ye'll plaise to take the pins out of them shutters and cut the cord round me, before that woman returns, I'll til ye the howl about it, an' shrink my own health wid ye to the bargain."

There was now no reason for being concerned so much, although my curiosity was great, and many conjecture followed hard to overtake it. I complied with his wish, and he civilly asked me to remove to the other end, after I had put things as nearly as he was before, and handed him a "spring," as he termed a pocket-knife stuff into my hand by dangling it even when standing quietly in the corner.

I was somewhat excited when I returned and sat down again within. In an hour or so silence was broken by the grating of the lock, and my heroine entered, accompanied by a man in the dress of a gay character as I had ever beheld. She pointed to the door I was looking through, and muttered something to her companion, who made a response, and brandished a stick he had brought with him. Both then listened attentively, and I seemed a long time, but I was soon convinced that I was not the object of much care on their part. They set down, and began to drink and converse, the woman had taken from a recess. By-and-by the new-comer put his arm round her neck and began to whisper words I could not hear; but their proceedings were speedily interrupted by the man in the sheets springing to his feet with sundry execrations, and dealing most unmerciful blows with the "spring" upon the head of each. At the first sign of life in the prostrate figure the woman began to shriek, but this soon ceased as she and her companion were knocked down.

I felt it was not my business to interfere, so I looked on in silence. The next proceeding of our hero was to open the door, and throw them both outside with the greatest unconcern. After this he carefully locked the door, came forward to where I was, and asked me to sit with him by the fire which had now kindled up.

I gladly complied, and he related the reason that had led to the scene I had just witnessed. The woman, it appeared, was his wife, and he had found occasion to suspect that she intended to rob him, and run off with the stranger. He likewise discovered that she had poison in her possession, which he managed to replace by a harmless ingredient, and he subsequently had the gratification to see it mix well up her husband. This led him to feign death, with a view to ascertaining her exact intentions, but he evinced his regret that he had been deceived so thoroughly. Her anxiety to get rid of him, however, had aided the deception, and she had not investigated too closely whether her drug had done its work thoroughly.

He very unreservedly stated his future purpose, turned over some old gear in a corner, and produced a sum of money with which he meant to pay his passage to America, and leave the country at break of day. We sat talking all night, and grew so friendly that he offered to share his funds with me, which I, of course, declined.

In the morning he looked out in front of the house, but the two outcasts were nowhere to be seen. What they had done with him in the face of the old clock, which terminated its asthmatic ticking, and threw it on the fire; and every other thing in the house, that appeared worth destroying, he broke. Tying up some of his own apparel in a napkin, he authorized a curse or two upon his late helpmate, locked the door, and threw the key on the dunghill with a "bad luck to it," and after that, he showed no further concern about what had occurred.

At the station I allowed him to pay part of my fare, which gratified him greatly, and when I left him, he was so sorry to part that I believe a word would have taken him into the ranks with me. But, in the end, he shook me by the hand, my hand, and I returned his grasp of kindness, and in one minute more the last bond was unclasped, and since that time I have seen nor heard nothing of my somewhat singularly-formed acquaintance.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1860.

THE IRISH STEAMERS.

WE have been favored with the following communication:

"GENTLEMEN,—Our attention has been drawn to the inclosed editorial in your pictorial journal, and, with the exception of the last paragraph, the article is having been written with either a desire to injure the Galway line or through inexcusable ignorance of the subject-matter. We are, gentlemen, etc.,

"HOWLAND & ASPINWALL,
"Agts A. R. M. S. N. Co."

[INCLOSURE.]

[From Harper's Weekly, October, 20.]

The loss of the Connaught deprives the Galway line of the only steamer they really owned. Advertisements to the contrary, it is true, that the line consists of five "new iron side-wheel steamers of 4400 tons burden each" and with the Connaught, Victoria, Leinster, and Persia. But this is merely a playful figure of speech. The Leinster, Ulster, and Munster are still in the imagination; one or two of them are said to be on the stocks; but none of the three have ever been launched. The Persia exists, but belongs to the New India Navigation Company; and instead of being 4400 tons, she is only about 3500. The Connaught, in like manner, was, we believe, only 3300, not 4400 tons as stated in the advertisement.

The following is the advertisement referred to in the above paragraph:

NEW YORK AND GALWAY LINE.

"The steamers comprising this line have been approved by the Admiralty, and are the

FIVE NEW IRON SIDE-WHEEL STEAMERS

CONNAUGHT . . . . . 4400 tons burden.
LEINSTER . . . . . 4400 "
MUNSTER . . . . . 4400 "
ULSTER . . . . . 4400 "
VICTORIA . . . . . 4400 "

The steamers of this Company have been constructed with the greatest care as regards strength and workmanship, combine every modern improvement, and are built with water-tight compartments. They are well found, and intended to accomplish the passage between the two termini with safety, and are replete with elegance and convenience.

For freight or passage, apply to

HOWLAND & ASPINWALL, Agents,
No. 5 Bowling Green, New York.

We beg to assure Messrs. Howland & Aspinwall that we have not the least desire to injure the Galway line. The more lines of steamers there are between the two continents, the better we shall be pleased; though we confess we should like to see vessels which carry to sea five and six hundred human beings a little more substantially built than the ill-fated Connaught seems to have been.

Nor can we admit that we have laid ourselves open to the charge of either inexcusable ignorance, which Messrs. Howland & Aspinwall so courteously bring against us. The denial which those gentlemen oppose to our paragraph would have been more easily met had it been more specific and less general; but it probably refers to and evidently includes our statements that the Leinster, Ulster, and Munster have never made a voyage, and that the Persia and Connaught are not really of the tonnage ascribed to their advertisements. Yet both statements are unquestionably true. There was at one time some talk of the Leinster being got ready to make her first voyage this fall; but like a good many other promises of this Galway Company, its fulfillment has been deferred. She and her consorts may perhaps, if all goes right and the Company has better luck hereafter than it has had hitherto, make their maiden voyage next year; but to advertise them as forming part of an actual line of steamers on a specified route, approved by the Admiralty, and surpassing any other vessels afloat, strikes us as rather steep.

With regard to tonnage of the two ships whose actual tonnage is, or was, undoubtedly the Connaught and the Persia—both of which are said by Messrs. Howland & Aspinwall to be ships of 4400 tons—there is very little to be said. The Persia belongs to the West India R. M. S. T. Company. They, who ought to know her size, state in their published schedule of their fleet that she is a ship of 2720 tons. The surveyor of the port who measured her, according to law, when she came here, certifies as follows respecting her tonnage:

CUSTOM HOUSE, NEW YORK,
SURVEYOR'S OFFICE, October 13, 1860.

I CERTIFY that the British steamer Persia, Horace Hunter, measures twenty-five hundred and sixty-nine $\frac{69}{95}$ tons.

$\frac{2569}{95}$ tons.

J. S. BENEDICT, Surveyor.

The Connaught never came to this port, and was consequently never surveyed here; but we have been able to find her in Lloyd's list. We are informed, however, by persons who knew her well, that she probably measured from 2600 to 2700 tons; she had no feet less than the Persia, which measures 3586 tons. This weakness of the Galway Company for exaggerating the tonnage of their ships seems incorrigible. When Mr. Lever was asked by the Committee of the House of Commons how he came to estimate the old United States of about 2000 tons as "the new and splendid steamer Indian Empire of 5000 tons burden," he tried to explain that he counted the ship's engines, coal, and machinery as part of her tonnage, and was not abashed when a member inquired why he hadn't counted in as well the wharf where she lay and the dock where she had been built?

For this, as we wish well to the Galway line, and shall be glad to welcome their ships to our waters. The more the better, provided they are safe. But the New York agents, if they will take our advice, will avoid overstating respecting them. They will not bear it.

NO PUNISHMENT FOR MURDER.

THE Legislature of this State, following out a humanitarian policy which has already been productive of mischief in other cases, passed an Act last winter for the abolition of the death-penalty, in the case of persons convicted of crimes other than murder in the first degree and high treason. But in doing this it went further, and repealed the section of the code which prescribed hanging as the method by which culprits sentenced to death are to be executed; thus leaving it in doubt whether there is at the present time any penalty of death which can be inflicted by the courts upon criminals convicted of murder in the first degree. The Governor, therefore, in the case of persons so doubtful that it has quashed the sentence of the murderers Mrs. Hartung, and ordered a new trial. How trials are to be had, in consequence of this law, in the cases of the convicted murderers Sanchez and Shea; and the public prosecutor has wisely determined to defer the trial of Charles Jeffords, under indictment for the murder of Walton and Matthews, until the Legislature shall have had time to amend the blundering Act.

Thus, what with the Legislature and what with the police, life, in this State, enjoys a degree of protection which is not very reassuring to the timid. The number of crimes of violence committed in New York is considerably greater, in proportion to the population, than in any of the large cities of Europe; the convictions much fewer. In Paris or London murderers hardly ever escape; here, at least, one half the murders and manslaughters escape unpunished. We need not quote instances; every New Yorker can with a little effort remember more than one murderer who has gone quite likely that the escape of the murderer of Dr. Burdell will be followed a few months hence by that of another, and still more atrocious homicide—that of Matthews.

The world moves, and we must hope that we are destined to improve in course of time. Just now, however, we are bound to say that our progress partakes of the nature of the crab's movement: we seem to be going backward in every thing. Even our elections seldom escaped the due penalty of their offenses. Mayors were men of the highest character, and the title of Alderman was itself a certificate of respectability. Judges, in the city, were jurists whose opinions were quoted abroad; to be a member of the New York bar was proof of honesty, learning, and gentlemanly instincts. We have been changing all this a good deal lately; let us hope that the change will soon change again for the better, and that we shall not always present an illustration of the failure of democracy.

COMPENSATION.

THE PRINCE OF WALES AT THE TOMB OF WASHINGTON.

THEN his eyes reverently rested. The homliest wretch
Who walks amid the shadows of the earth
May wait in patient bondage, sure that God
Will right him of his wrong, in his good time.
E'en though a monarch riveted his chain.
The world advances on its course, and time
Must crowd within the smallest space the hopes,
The fears, the joys of human life; the man
May see within the hour the sharp events
That once took years to culminate.

The day
Has come when grasping kings must bow to commons,
The clash of battle-swords, the roar of cannon
Of art must fall. Man, round from step, has learned
His right to freedom, and the ancient king
Is he who gracefully accords the boon
He asked.

The glorious day has come
When startled History lays aside her pen,
And looks with puzzled eyes upon the scroll
Where Time has written down the wondrous acts
Of His ministers.

A few short years
Have passed away since at the funeral feast
Of France's self-made King stood England's Queen—
Stood with head bent before the marble shrine,
Built high and stately, by a people's love,
Over the dust they had revolted with voice
Of strength from the dark, sterile rock whereon
He lingered to his death—by England's act.
Bent with head bent before the tomb of him
Whom veins the same blood flowed as that dead King's,
Bent to do public homage to the law.
Born upheld; him who built his throne upon
The rock of prince lashed that proud spirit
Of power—a nation's love. Stood England's Queen
Without murmur against, at the self-same blood,
And did him homage for the self-same deeds
For which his kinsman died.

Once more.—Beside
A grave stood England's future King. A tomb
Of simple build, towering no marble form
Into the sky; claiming no awe-struck gaze
For gaudy sculpture, but for prayer. Yet
By long-drawn tales of brilliant battle won,
Through blood and shame, asking for his
Eternal in a nation's heart.

Beside
That tomb, where slept the sometime rebel chief,
The soldier patriot, and pure-hearted man
The maker of a nation; there stood the head
Uncovered, and in silent awe, stood one
Whose blood had marked the rebel chief for death—
Death on the scaffold—death by means as vile
As ever death to humankind.

The
Wild dingo rolled through the forest shade, and wiles
Of subtone sang their music in the boughs.
The birds went twittering over leafy ground,
Heeding not place nor pace. No sign was seen
Upon the heavens, as of old, when God
Made visible by shadows through the still
One high recording power entered this work
Of Time, and with a soft, sweeping motion,
Wrote on the record these fair words:

"What done,
Thou faithful servitor of God! Thou balm-
Bestower for a nation's woes; thou great
And gracious healer of a people's wounds—
These are thy triumphs, this thy sweet revenge!"

THE LOUNGER.

A PRINCE in a prize white-hardy ruffs to the Loungers. We must be allowed to make the most of him. His rule gone now. He is at sea; but the Loungers are females. The days when the rules will hang round it still. Besides, we weekly Loungers have only one chance in seven days to talk about him. The daily Loungers have six in the seven. And they make the most of them.

Now to-day is the first chance this Lounger has had since Friday. The noise of the guns of that famous week will, of course, have died out of the morning papers, and there is a suggestion of Old Saturday in alluding this week to those long-passed days. They are already mossed over. Let us devote a little of them to a chat or talk of ourselves, and the Prince of Wales, and of the crowning sensation of a summer.

A SUMMER OF SENSATIONS.

NEW YORK has seen many splendid sights this summer. The Great Eastern—the Japanese—the Coan-ven—the Atlantic Telegraph—the Pageant of the Prince's reception—the Firemen's fête—and the Agricultural Exhibition. All these assembled thousands and thousands of people, and the general good-humor and good conduct were not only admirable, but positively surprising.

Looking down upon that solid crowd—and so solid a crowd was never witnessed in Broadway—from the balcony when a half-police platoon, when the procession was expected, begging the people to stand back and make way. Of course nobody stirred. As soon as begin, as you see the policemen take hold of shoulders and push the owner back against other owners, and, if there were any serious resistance, tapping the recusants—first gently, then stoutly, and even almost throwing them down in the struggle. At any moment the crowd might have annihilated all the policemen within sight. Sometimes a sharp fight seemed imminent, but it was avoided by very positive arrests were made.

When the few officers had fairly pushed the mass back to the sidewalk, it was astonishing to see how resolutely the people held the line. They braced back against the pressure from behind. They cheered or hissed those who pushed along the cleared street; and when the officers ran to stop some intruder from crossing, there was a general good-humored clapping and shouting. And they stood in those lines for nearly an hour—long after the announced time of the Prince's coming.

In no other city of the world could that spectacle have been seen. Great pageants you may see in every where, and human change passes than ours, and great multitudes of people. But a foreign fête, however pretty, is like the walk of a litle girl to the Parade-ground or to Union Square. An adequate nurse accompanies her to supervise her behavior. So in all the fine crowds of the festal foreigners there is always an adequate armed force to repress too great exuberance of spirits or demonstration. Now it is profoundly true of us—although we can't give a ball—that the sentiment of loyalty to law is universal and supreme. Our crowds are unattended—we, with the assistance of an occasional officer, who serves merely as a symbol of law. The scene of Thursday week was popular government in action. The salutatory of New York to the Prince was this:

"Young Sir, look around you. Here we are, a million people. The soldiers who surround you are only a portion of those same people in uniforms. The few policemen are emblems of their obedience to law. This is what we have done. We can't offer you a banquet so splendid as every European city will give you. We can't have a ball without the most absurd episodes. We have no old buildings, and no rare ones, that are of any particular interest. In historic tradition, in the fine arts, and the rest of it, we are pretty poor. But this reviewless, tame way is so individually satisfied that there is no temptation to violent changes, and we honor law so truly that we can govern ourselves. We keep the peace without an army and with a ludicrously small police—that is what we have done in this country, Lord Renfrew, and that is what we show you to-day. We welcome you to the spectacle of a people that can, and do govern themselves, without a lurking fear of sudden trouble."

Baron Renfrew may not have heard this welcome, but the Duke of Newcastle probably did.

TRAVELING INCOG.

The eldest son of Queen Victoria, and "the heir of England," is now in this country, and, it is traveling in the country with his tutor and a small party. The Prince travels incog., and passes by the name of Baron Renfrew. He arrived in New York, the other day, strictly incog. It happened that a fine thousand troops were parading upon the Battery, and in order to preserve his incognito, Lord Renfrew put on the uniform of an English Colonel, mounted a horse, rode up and down the lines; so that his presence was not in the least suspected.

With the same delicacy he proceeded to a carriage in which, oddly enough, the Mayor of the city happened to be and himself immediately afterward, and the traveler, who does not allow it to leak out that he is really Prince of Wales, but the pleasure of whose company we did not unexpectedly, the habits of the people. As usual, the street was solid with human beings, and the fair ladies of the metropolis were also out in very goodly places, at every visible window. The people were also engaged in that occasional recreation of sitting in chairs upon extremely narrow ledges over deep ways; boys were curling over the stone scrollwork; and others were perched upon the roofs in the usual way, to stare straight down into the street.

Stopping at the City Hall—but still entirely unsuspected—he ajdly saw the soldiers march by; and then stepping into his carriage, he slipped up Broadway toward the military lines—no one having the least idea that the incognito traveler was the next sovereign of England. From the moment of gaining his hotel he went about the city, unmolested, and with the same privacy. On Sunday morning he went to church, and nobody knew it. Had the incognito been lifted in the least, it is possible that there may have been a crowd, and the future Head of the Church might have been treated in old Trinity like a "What is it." It is the good-nature of such things have been known—that the preacher would have called the visit of a young man to a church, for the purpose of worshipping God, "a most edifying sight." But happily decency and gravity, the incognito under which the Prince travels prevented all these things; and he left the city without his presence having been suspected.

KEEPING THE BALL IN MOTION.

Of course all the Loungers have but one topic now; and some of them may have a particular curiosity. Some of them are perhaps wondering "what does that party of English gentlemen think of New York and its doings for the Prince?" In public nothing could surpass their politeness. They bowed and smiled in the right places. They were politely taken about the streets. They kept their eyes open, and their minds, too, doubtless; and while the Prince was amused, his companions doubtless studied hastily of the whole matter.

Of course, as free and independent Americans, we don't care what they thought. We never care what English people think of us. We didn't care for Mr. Fechter, Mrs. Trollope, nor Captain Hall, nor Marryatt, nor Dickens; not a bit of it. If they chose to make fools of themselves, blast their eyes! we didn't care a rap. And if any lofty else chooses to come and have his opinions and his absurd prejudices, and make himself or themselves fools also, we don't care what it is to us? We know what we are. We know that all other nations are blasted estimators and paling shams, and that we are the only really intelligent, prosperous, great, and permanent people.

Of course we do. Then why do we always wonder what these effete people think of us? Suppose now, we could have invisibly sat down at table with the company of gentlemen who accompanied the Prince—the morning after the ball, say —and what should we have probably heard? Perhaps the least little bit of a laugh. Why not? The metropolis of the New World had been all the wealth and fashion to give a ball, and it couldn't make a floor strong enough to support the people. It couldn't hold itself from crowding its guest so that he had to be roped in. Don't you think those gentlemen had a right to laugh?

The truth is, that we have done as young people are very apt to do. We have utterly mistaken ourselves. We don't know what to do with a Prince when we get him. It certainly is no fault of ours; but when we try to be courteous we are a little ridiculous. Why was there but a ball at all? The people of New York received him by a pageant whose moral magnificence was incomparable. Except for the foolish delay it would have been unsurpassed as a spectacle, not by reason of the decorations and military display, but of the million of human beings regulating themselves. It was a spectacle of incalculable significance to each of those English gentlemen and nobleman. It was simple, unique and impressive. When that was over, he might have readily devoted his time to striking the square foot of the pavement, as if any person had given him a ball, and he had gone and danced, like other young men, and have had that amusement of which he is so fond.

But why should four hundred people give him a ball? Why not a dance at General Scott's in the evening as well as call upon him in the morning to lunch? If the Academy fete had been given by the city of New York, it would have been different. But it was a private ball given by private citizens in which the Prince was treated half as a Prince and half as a boy. And in such a case hundred people may do ungratefully as individuals what they can not do well as a city. It was kind to ask him. It was kind in him to accept. There was no reason that it should not have been a very pretty festivity, and that he should not have come to it. We fully meant that it should be memorable and beautiful, but it has turned out a little ludicrous and wearisome. We try to blame except the builder and the computer of the number of persons that could conveniently dance upon a given floor. The gentlemen concerned in the affair have worked most zealously. They have had a terrible responsibility upon them, and they could have more curses than compliments. It is a very hard case. It is a great pity that the ball was undertaken. It was all bravely call it a failure, and resolve not to do so again.

CHAMPIONSHIP.

"DEAR LOUNGER.—Don't you think Wright ought to have played with Mr. Paulen?"

Certainly not, if he did not with to: why should he? Mr. Paulen is a good player, but he is a genius for the game of chess. His play excites the admiration and envy of all who witness it. Wright goes to Europe, and meets the famous chess champions and vanquishes them. His success makes his merit famous. But he is a modest man in life, and behaves finely under it, and settles into private life like any other gentleman. Of course he retains his interest in the game, he frequents its clubs, and tries his power with opponents. He is confessedly the chess champion of the world. But the challenge is not his affair. He does not hold himself ready to do battle against all comers. If that be the condition of championship, you may have the belt. I will play, he says, upon such conditions and under such circumstances as I choose. Mr. Paulen's challenge is not a genius for the game of chess. His play excites the admiration and envy of all who witness it. Wright goes to Europe, and meets the famous chess champions and vanquishes them. His success makes his merit famous. But he is a modest man in life, and behaves finely under it, and settles into private life like any other gentleman. Of course he retains his interest in the game, he frequents its clubs, and tries his power with opponents. He is confessedly the chess champion of the world. But the challenge is not his affair. He does not hold himself ready to do battle against all comers. If that be the condition of championship, you may have the belt. I will play, he says, upon such conditions and under such circumstances as I choose. Mr. Paulen's challenge is not accepted. Mr. Morphy's reply was not less so. If Mr. Paulen will not meet his friend except upon equal terms it is a proof of his confidence in his skill. If Mr. Morphy declines to play with any one except against odds, who will complain?

CIVIC FEUDS.

The jealousies and battles of the old Italian cities, of Florence and Venice and Genoa and Pisa, make an exhaustive and brilliant chapter in history. The jealousies and battles of the new American cities make a ludicrous chapter. The Orange disturbances were the only ones engendered by the Prince's visit. Other old quarrels, always latent, have been reworked nearer home. Philadelphia sneers at New York. Accordingly, the Ledger of Philadelphia printed in a Boston paper says that the Prince was black and blue after pinching by the police in the hands of the ladies of New York! Philadelphia points proudly to her successful opera evening, when the Prince didn't dance, she sat upon the song, and the rampant plumes of the prime chantelaine of the Academy (how clearly he does chant!) were smoothed. New York laughs at this as supremely, back again. Mr. Moncane said that the Prince never was at the Opera. Mr. Moncane is a confessed Queen. She may be a wretched one, but she can not be depraved. She is enthroned, and although Philadelphia may call the Princess, who was regal, and Boston that she is more courtly—here, meanwhile, site New York in the seat of power, and the world and the Prince acknowledge her supremacy.

There is a childish bitterness in this municipal warfare which is extremely droll, because the general perception has awarded to each of these cities its peculiar prominence, and does no good. Boston flourishing. They have all essentially the same structure of society; and each has in some degree the characteristics of the whole. Philadelphia is, by intellectual, New York commercial, and Philadelphia and Boston fashionable. New York is the most amusing, Boston the most instructive, Philadelphia the most commonplace. Boston is satisfied to be the Athens of the Republic. New York shows her schedule of property, and Philadelphia points to the republican court of the Revolution.

What can be done? The papers fire away at each other. The New Yorker asks, with a toss of the head, whether all Boston girls read Greek before breakfast; the Philadelphian looks askance at the equipages of beef, breadcloth, and molasses; and the Bostonian curls the lip a little as she surveys the two.

New York pats the little province of Boston upon the shoulder in a condescending, motherly style of a Greek state. New York sees Philadelphia whether she is seated at the very sources of the Delaware, and Philadelphia remembers London, Paris, and Rome, and deigns no answer. Then Boston and Philadelphia contemptuously demand why New York should pinch a poor Prince black and blue.

Alas! it is a foul without an end. It is perennial. In the happy absence of a great enmity we cultivate our little jealousies. And if the cities take comfort in it, in the name of peace and mutual enjoyment let them continue. It is an easy wit that scolds Boston a village, and Philadelphia provincial, and New York parvenu. A Princess, Dear that, Europe, Washington! New Orleans! New York parvenu! Do you believe H.R.H. thought so? Do you think Newcastle thought so? Or Cowley? Or any of the guests, who didn't go through the floor, thought so? Do you suppose the immortal Four Hundred thought so? And chose distinctly answers, of course not.

THE BLESSING OF ST. MARTIN.

LAST year the great question of the exact season of the Indian summer was settled by the note of the Lounger's friend at Nightingale House. It is the summer of Saint Martin, and is gathered about his day. It is a kind of bouquet of days of St. Martin's, exquisitely fragrant, and splendid. Only let us agree also that Saint Martin's day is a long dawning. These golden mists; the yellow atmosphere, which inexpressibly soft touch of the air at noon; the ripe hill-sides; the gorgeous vine; the rich russet, sweetly-rank odor in the smoky air—all these prelude the pageant of that last look of summer.

St. Martin fully appears in the early days of November. The landscape has already clothed itself in its festal garments. By that time the gold is very nearly all gone, and sombre strikes through the thin yellow leaf—the maples are in crimson court dress—the oaks are in red, and trees are yellow—the woods strew leafy gems and bright asters, and Saint Martin passes through the year more revivid than ever from the Prince. Patient he comes and goes. The pomp fades; the leaves shrivel—at last the trees stand bare. But the reverence of the year is complete. Although the despairing poet, pining for the south, sang,

"In a drear-nighted December,
Too happy, happy tree!
Thy branches ne'er remember
Their green felicity," they do remember. They sing of it when the struggle with the winter winds is relaxed. And, by-and-by, when the crocuses and the early violets brave the snow, and the robin comes in April, the trees, still warm at their hearts with the blessing of Saint Martin, begin to smile again with leaves and blossoms.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

FRANCIS HOSKELF AGAIN.—Though the King of Naples is at present without a kingdom, still he can not refrain, in a strong fun he displays a part of his nature, from condemning his subjects, even at the very moment that he is left without any subjects to condemn. The following is the sentence he has passed upon them: "The conduct of the Neapolitans is perfectly outrageous."

THE CUP OF MISERY

We read in the Italian correspondence the following distressing fact:

"There has been an insurrection in Toll."

We suppose such an insurrection was stirred up with a pencil. We should recommend that an Irishman or a Scotchman be sent over to quell this insurrection, for they're the best fighters in Europe. Toll, forsooth!

PRETTY, IF NOT TRUE.—A poetical Young Lady, who has just come out, calls "Dreams the best outlets in the world, for do they not lead to—to—to—to the blind?"

EXTREMELY SHELL-FISH.

We beg to present the reader with the two following latest novelties in the way of conundrum remembrance:

1. Why have lobsters no feeders?—Because they have salmon (heaven) over them.

2. Why is a supplementary plate of crabs like the Alien Act.—Because it secures a condition clause (an extra dish and clause).

If the intelligent reader were to try for a thousand years, he would never be able to beat the above in badness.

HOW TO KEEP ONE'S MEMORY GREEN.—Surround it with dying eyes.

An Irish poet-boy having driven a gentleman a long stage during torrents of rain, the gentleman civilly said to him, "Pat, you're all wet."

"Arrah! I don't care about being very wet; but, plase your honor, I'm dry enough."

A Yarmouth mariner had a son in Irishman, "a green hand," to assist in loading his shop with malt. Just as they were going to dinner, he said the Irishman, who was jingling the price of his dog's work in his pocket, cried out from the cellar, "Cogsbil! I ha' your shovel covered board; but I can a big notch on the rail fence round the barn, right over the place where it went down; so you'll find it when you come back."

It is no use whatever, so often supposed says Burke-land, to be a "Universal History"—to spin the longues of margins in order to give them facility of speech. It is only a waste of time and paper. Children can talk sometimes even better than men. I was told of extensive young politicians, who naturally stammered, going up to a working man who owned a waggon, and after visiting the horse's tail, began with his gradual cease, he said,

"Yo, woa, yo-o-o mag-nag-nag-pie t-t-t-talk?"

"Yes," said the man, "a precious deal better than you can, or I would not be at the trouble to buy it."

A gentleman residing in a village not many miles from Exeter, finding that the diminution of his wood-pile continued after his return from church, one night left his order to obtain, if possible, some clew to the mystery. At an hour when the honest fellow should be in bed, hearing an operator at work in the yard, he cautiously raised his chamber window, and saw a large neighbor endeavoring to get a large log into his wheel-barrow.

"Ho, ho, my friend!" he cried, "and the owner," to come here and steal my wood while I sleep."

"Why, sir," replied the thief, "I suppose you would be sleeping more sound if you had my back with filling before you'd offer to come and help me."

A footman, proud of his grammar, inherited into the drawing-room, Mr. Peace and his two daughters, with the introduction: "Mr. Peace and the two Misses Peace."

TIT FOR TAT.—A young lady lately asked a gentleman the meaning of the word surrogate, and the gentleman explained it to her as "a gate through which parties have to get married." "Then I imagine," said the lady, "that it is a corruption of surrogate?" "You are right, Miss," replied her informer, "as woman is an abbreviation of was to man."

Why are editors apt to be tired in the month of April? —Because they have just gone through a march.

If the speculator misses his aim, every body cries out, "He's a fool," and sometimes, "He's a rogue," if he succeeds, they besiege his door, and demand his daughter in marriage.

The man who minds his own business was in Littleton the other day, but left immediately, he felt so lonesome.

Many persons admire the lightning. It is very grand and very beautiful indeed, but we were never personally struck by it.

CONTEMPT OF ARS SUX. "What did you say was the principle of the entourage?"

A QUERY.—Why is it taken two people into one?

HINT AND DISCARTER (crossword).—"What a delightful invention!"

Lord Townsend's butler, in preparing the cloth for a choice festival, was unlucky enough to break a dozen of plates plates, a rare and beautiful pattern. "You blockhead," cries his lordship meeting him presently after, with another dozen in his hands, "how did you do it?"—"Upon my soul, my lord, they happened to fall just so," replied the fellow, and instantly dashed them also upon the marble hearth into a thousand pieces.

TITLES FOR "SHAM BOOKS."—When the Comic Annual was announced, the author forwarded a copy to the Duke of Devonshire; and in his letter of thanks the Duke asked Hood if he could furnish him with some titles for a few of sham books. Hood seemed to enjoy the task, and sent off by return of post the following among many of the like sort: "Boyle on Steam;" "Rules for Punctuation, by a Borough-School Pupil;" "Annual Parliaments, a Plea for Short Commons;" "Lamb's Recollections of Suet;" "The Logic of the Clouds, by Nimbus Nicoll;" "Rules for Bell's System;" "Cursory Remarks on Sneezing;" "Barrow on the Common Cold;" "Lucifer—Lucifer—Lucifer!" and "Recollections of Bannister, by Lord Stair."

"Ellen," said Charles, "did poor little Carlo have pink ribbon round his neck when you lost him?" "Yes, sir," replied Ellen. "Have you seen him?"—"No, but when I find him I shall have a piece of pink ribbon in the stomach."

What kind of a pencil did Britannia use when she ruled the waves?

A lover may imagine himself discarded when he sees another man waiting on the wedding-cards. His natural exclamation will be, "What's amiss?"

If a young lady has a pain in her side, can she relieve it by wearing a shawl?

WHAT IS A MOTHER-IN-LAW?—The mother-in-law is the person in the household who attends to the preserves and the pickles, and sees that the instruments of fun are put carefully away, to be opened as they are wanted.

THE PROGRESS OF CIVILIZATION.—"In my time, Mis," said a fire engineer, as he was looked at the women from instead of their antlers!"—"Ah! but my dear aunt," replied the young lady, "you are not in Belgravia now, and is now civilized than it used to be. It looks more to the understanding."

DUTCHMEN CURES.—A young man sitting on a gate, whom I complimented on his happy looks and proof that he'd agreed with his sweetheart, laughingly "Pshaw! she's besides work. I cuts a few hutchins' chips every week! thinks the fellow's looking fancy up."

A man, on being upbraided for his cowardice, said he had as bold a heart as any one, but his cowardly legs ran away with him all.

We don't know exactly what the "height of ambition" is, but we have seen many fussy little specimens of it not more than five feet high.

A lady, in reply to some guests who praised the muslem on her table, said, "Oh yes, my husband always buys the best; he is a great epicure."

"Dawkter," said an exquisite the other day, "I want you to tell me what I can put into my bond to make it light?" "It wants nothing but brains," said the physician.

ANARCHY, an African prince, visiting England, received as much attention as a child's rattle-box. He was so good, that, in a moment of tenderness, he could not refrain from saying that he loved me, in his heart, and exclaimed: "Oh! Madam, if Heaven had only made you a negress, you would have been Lucretia Borgia!"

At a public "tea-party," recently held in one of our country towns, where "sentiment" were in order, a timid young lady was called upon to remind the chair that inquiry was upon them by offering the following:

"Three lines, mister, you have I would like to hear."

Now, if you'll put the question, I'll surely say yes."

To which a shy young gentleman replied as follows:

"The man without courage to do his own wooing,
May do all his own washing, and baking, and sewing."

Some person whom Quin had offended met him one day in the street, and stopped him.

"Sir," said he, "I—I—I understand that you have been telling away my name."

"What you will, sir," said Quin.

"You—you—you called me a scoundrel, Sir."

"Very true, keep your name, Sir," replied Quin, and walked on.

Why is a tooth drawn like a thing forgotten?—It is out of the head.

A good way to light some cities with gas would be to set fire to their publishers.

To get up the "Conflict of Ages," ask two rival beauties how old they are.

The two constellations are many. Salt-water grass is fresh fish, and hot verde produce a coolness.

Some malicious persons assert that the letters M.D., may often stand after physicians' names, signify "Money Down."

In a committee of ladies we have no doubt but whatever is voted on is always carried by a majority.

A singular warning to our fashionable excluders—a large a number of whom consider a defective pronunciation of the letter "r" the best "proof of aristocratic breeding"—has recently been afforded by an action brought against one of the species for libeling a highly respectable medical practitioner residing in a country town. The defendant, it appears, had called the question, and employing the elegant slang so much in vogue among the "upper ten," termed Mr. Brown—a very good doctor of the place." Unfortunately, however, his peculiarities of utterance rendered the "r" made the word as sound so very like "the queer doctor of the place," that Brown was the subject of much ridicule, and gave rise to the doctor by which to vindicate his professional reputation.

FIRST LOVE.

SHE was the first, the only star
That shone upon my life,
The summer of my days had set
Before I called her wife:
The leaves have fallen twenty times
Beneath our trysting tree,
Since the ringers shook the rafters
In the belfry by the sea.

The pulses of my heart beat slow,
With calm, unflutter'd stroke,
Till with a party from the Grange
I picnick'd at the Oak;
A stranger to our Forest ways,
She came with Alan's bride,
One glance—I knew my love was come—
The old indifference died.

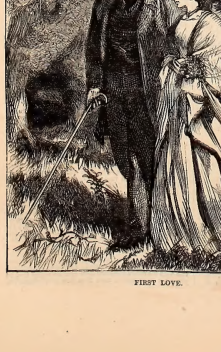
The park, a summer's walk across,
Was famous in the shire;
The porter at the crested gates
Grew rich and blessed the Squire;
I show'd the glade where ballads say
The King met Robin Hood,
I took her where, as boys, we cropp'd
Wild strawberries in the wood.

The gardens and the orange-trees,
The swans upon the lake,
The gazing stags among the fern,
The pheasants in the brake:
These sumptuous signs of wealthy state
She saw with sweet surprise,
And I—new light was on them all,
Seen with a lover's eyes.

When Alan blew his warning horn,
My chestnut join'd her bay:
Down the long grassy "rides" we rode,
And watch'd the rabbits play.
The dead sun in his crimson shroud
Lay buried in the west,
And Love was nestling in my heart,
An inmate, not a guest.

A gipsy party gayly plann'd,
A smile, a soft "good-night,"
And then I left the low white house,
Just as the stars were bright:
Lost in some far, forgotten sea,
The sailor on the shore
Sights, to his joy, the ship that comes
To bear him home once more.

The bride moon with her dower of stars
Twice grew to matron age
Before my birdie flew away
Back to her northern cage;
She knew the abbey pictures well,
She dared the haunted room,
We laughed around the Oak again,
And saw the aloe bloom.



A promise in the oriel won
To crown my growing bliss,
A drooping head, a circled waist,
And such a binding kiss!
Oh, happy time! Oh, happy time!
It never has its fellow—
The one green leaf that hangs among
So many sere and yellow.

Before the Autumn spent his wrath
Upon the Rectory vine,
I claim'd the promise that she made,
I went and whisper'd, "Mine:"

May's father trembled as he said,
"Take her, a trusting wife,
And cherish one whose love has thrown
A glory round my life."

Some days beside a lonely mere (Lured by the waterfall),
And then we settled at the Grange,
For Alan took the Hall:
How swift the lustres pass'd along,
Sweet heart, with love and you,
For if the sky was sometimes dark,
There came a break of blue.

And ever, as the year winds round,
And brings the longest day,
We gather at the forest Oak,
Where first I met my May;
Look, Alan's boy and our May-bud
Are coming down the Vale,
Perhaps before another June
There 'll be another bride.

FIRST LOVE.

A DAY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER.

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XIII.

BREAKFAST over, I took a walk through the town. There was a museum prepared for a scene of unbustling quietude and tranquillity, I must own that the air of repose around far surpassed all I had imagined. The streets through which I sauntered were grass-grown and untrodden; the shops were half open; not an equipage, nor even a horseman was to be seen. In the Platz, where a sort of fruit-market was held, a few vendors of grapes, peaches, and melons sat under large crimson umbrellas, but there seemed few purchasers, except a passing school-boy, carefully scanning the temptations in which he was about to invest his kreutzer.

The most remarkable feature of the place, however—and it is one which through a certain significance has always held a place in my memory—was that, go where one would, the palace of the grand-duke was sure to finish the view at one extremity of the street. In fact, every alley converged to this one centre, and the royal residence stood like the governor's chamber in a panopticon jail. There did my mind for many a day picture him sitting like a huge spider watching the incautious insects that permeated his web. Wearied him fat, indolent, and apathetic, but yet with a jailer's instincts, ever mindful of every stir and movement of the prisoners below. With a single ordinary telescope he must be master of every thing that went on, and the humblest incident could not escape his notice. What a terrible consciousness of this surveillance that made every one keep the house? Was it the feeling that the "Gross Herzogliche" eye never left a moment, prevented men being abroad in the streets and about their affairs as in other places? I half suspected this, and set to work imagining a state of society thus scanned and scrutinized. But that the general aspect of the town so palpably betokened the absence of all trade and industry, I might have compared the whole to a glass hive; but they were all dumb as that exhibits, there was not one "busy bee" in the whole of them.

While I rambled thus carelessly along, I came in front of a sort of garden fenced from the street by an iron railing. The laurel, and arbutus, and even the oleander, were there, gracefully blending a varied foliage, and contrasting in their luxuriant liberty so pleasantly with the dull uniformity around. Finding a gate wide open, I strolled in and gave myself up to the delicious enjoyment of the spot. As I was deliberating whether this was a public garden or not, I found myself before a long, low, villa-like building, with a colonnade in front. Over the entrance was a large shield, which on nearer approach I recognized to contain the arms of England. This, therefore, was the legation, the residence of our minister, Sir Shalley Doubleton. I felt a very British pride and satisfaction to see our representative lodged so splendidly. With all the tax-payer's sentiment in my heart, I rejoiced to think that he who personated the nation should, in all his belongings, typify the wealth, the style, and the grandeur of England, and in the ardor of this enthusiasm I hastened back to the inn for the dispatch-bag.

Armed with this, and a card, I soon presented myself at the door. On the card I had written, "Mr. Pottinger presents his respectful compliments, and requests his excellency will favor him with an audience of a few minutes for an explanation."

I had made up my mind to state that my servant, in removing my smaller luggage from the train, had accidentally carried off this Foreign Office bag, which, though at considerable inconvenience, I had traveled much out of my way to restore in person. I had practiced this explanation as I dressed in the morning, I had twice rehearsed it to an orange-tree in the garden, before which I had bowed till my back ached, and I fancied myself perfect in my part. It would, I confess, have been a great relief to me to have had only the slightest knowledge of the true gross personage before whom I was about to present myself, to have known was he short or tall, young or old, stern or easy-mannered, had he a loud voice and an imperious tone, or was he of the soft and silky order of his craft. If I have willingly entertained his "gentleman" at a moderate repast for some information on these points; but there was no time for the inquiry, and it rang boldly at the bell. The door opened of itself at the summons, and I found myself in a large hall with a plaster cast of the Locusts from the Lansdowne. I tried several of the doors on either side, but they were all locked. A very handsome and spacious stair of white marble led up from the middle of the hall; but I hesitated about venturing to ascend this, and once more repaired to the bell outside, and repeated my summons. The loud clang re-echoed through the arched hall, the open door gave a responsive shake, and that was all. No one came; every thing was still as before. I was rather chagrined at this. The personal inconvenience was less offensive than the feeling how foreigners would comment on such want of propriety, what censures they would pass on such an ill-arranged household. I rang again, this time with an energy that made the door strike some of the plaster from the wall, and, with a noise like cannon, "What the hangman"—I am translating—"is all this?" cried a voice in thick wrath, and on looking up I saw a rather elderly man, with a quantity of curly yellow hair, frowning savagely on me from the balcony over the stair. He made no sign of coming down, but gazed sternly at me from his eminence.

"Can I see his excellency the minister?" said I, with dignity.

"Not if you stop down there; not if you continue to ring the bell like an alarm for fire; not if you won't take the trouble to come up stairs."

I slowly began the ascent at these words, pondering what sort of a master such a man must be who here, at the very top I found myself in front of a very short, very fat man, dressed in a suit of striped gingham, like an over plethoric zebra, and whose gasps painfully, in part from asthma, in part from agitation. He began again:

"What the hangman do you mean by such a row? Have you no manners, no education? Where were you brought up that you enter a dwelling-house like a city in storm?"

"Who is this insolent creature that dares to address me in this way? What ignorant animal can have so far forgotten my rank and his insignificance?"

"I'll tell you all that presently," said he; "there's his excellency's bell." And he bustled away, as fast as his unwieldy size would permit, to his master's room.

I was outraged and indignant. There was I, Potts—no, Pottinger—Algernon Sydney Pottinger—on my way to Italy and Greece, turning from my direct road to consign with safety a dispatch-bag which many a less conscientious man would have chucked out of his carriage window and forgotten—there I stood to be insulted by a miserable stone-polishing, floor-scrubbing, carpet-twigging Hausknecht! Was this to be borne? was it to be endured? Was a man of station, family, and attainments to be the object of such indignity?"

Just as I had uttered this speech aloud a very gentle voice addressed me, saying:

"Perhaps I can assist you? Will you be good enough to say what you want?"

I started suddenly, looked up, and whom should I see before me but that Miss Herbert, the beautiful girl in deep mourning that I had met at Milford, and who now, in the same pale loveliness, turned on me a look of kind and gentle meaning.

"Do you remember me?" said I, eagerly.

"Do you remember the traveler—a pale young man, with a Glengary cap and a plaid overcoat—who met you at Milford?"

"Perfectly," said she, with a slight twitch about the mouth like a struggle against a smile.

"Will you allow me to repay you now for your politeness then? Do you wish to see his excellency?"

I'm not very sure what it was I replied, but I know well what was passing through my head. If my thoughts could have spoken it would have been in this wise:

"Angel of loveliness, I don't care a brass farthing for his excellency. It is not a matter of the slightest moment to me if I ever set eyes on him. Let me but speak to you—tell you the deep impression you have made upon my heart; how, in my ardor to serve you, I have already been involved in an altercation that might have cost me my life; how I still treasure up the few minutes I passed beside you as the Elysian dream of all my life—"

"I am certain, Sir," broke she in, while I spoke—I repeat, I know not what—"I am certain, Sir, that you never came here to mention all this to his excellency."

There was a severe gravity in the way that she said these words that recalled me to myself, but not to any consciousness of what I had been saying; and so, in my utter discomfiture, I blundered out something about the lost dispatches and the cause of my coming.

"If you'll wait a moment here," said she, opening a door into a neatly furnished room, "his excellency shall hear of your wish to see him." And before I could answer she was gone.

I was now alone, but in what wild perplexity and anxiety! How came she here? What could be the meaning of her presence in this place? The minister was unmarried man, so much my host had told me. How then reconcile this fact with the presence of one who had left England but a few days ago, as some said, to be a governess or a companion? Oh, the agony of my doubts, the terrible agony of my dire misgivings! What a world of iniquity do we live in—what vice and corruption are ever around us! It was but a year or two ago, I remember, that the Times newspaper had exposed the nefarious schemes of a wretch who had deliberately invented a plan to entrap those most unprotected of all females. The adventures of this villain had become part of the police literature of Europe. Young and attractive creatures, induced to come abroad by promises of the most seductive kind, had been robbed by this man of all they possessed, and deserted here and there throughout the Continent. I was so horror-stricken by the horrors my mind had so suddenly conjured up, that I could not acquire the calm and coolness requisite for a decisive reasoning. My over-active imagination, as usual, went off with me, clearing obstacles with a sweeping stride, and steeple-chasing through fact as though it were only a gallow over grass land.

Those girl, well might you look confused and overwhelmed at meeting me! Well might the flush of shame have spread over your neck and shoulders, and well might you have hurried away from the presence of one who had known you in the days of your happy innocence!" I'm not sure that I didn't imagine I had been her play-fellow in childhood, and that we had been brought up from infancy together. My mind then addressed itself to the practical question, What was to be done? Was I to turn my head away while this iniquity was being enacted? Was I to go on my way, forgetting the seeds of that misery whose terrible fruits must one day be a shame and sin and ignominy? Or was I to arraign this man, great and exalted as he was, and say to him, "It is thus you represent before the eyes of the foreigner the virtues of that England we boast to be the model of all morality? Is it thus you illustrate the habits of your order? Do you dare to profane what, by the fiction of diplomacy, is sacred the soil of your country by a life that you dare not pursue at home? The Parliament shall hear of it; the House shall ring with it; that magnificent institution, the common-sense of England, long sick of what is called secret diplomacy, shall learn at last by what uses are applied the wiles and snares of this deceitful craft, its extraordinary and its private minions, its hurried missions with their bags of corruption—"

"I HAD PREVENTED THIS EXPLANATION AS I DRESSED IN THE MORNING."

I was well "into my work," and going along happily, when a very trim footman, in a nankeen jacket, said:

"If you will come this way, Sir, his excellency will see you."

He led me through three or four salons handsomely furnished and ornamented in themselves, the most conspicuous of which, in each room, was a life-sized portrait of the same gentleman, though in a different costume—now in the Windsor uniform, now as a Guardsman, and, lastly, in the full dress of the diplomatic corps. I had but time to guess that this must be his excellency, when the servant announced me and retired.

It is in deep shame that I own that the aspect of the princely apartments, the silence, the implied awe of the footman's subdued voice as he spoke, had so routed all my intentions about calling his excellency to account, that I stood in his presence timid and abashed. It is an ignoble confession wrung out of the very heart of my audacity, that no sooner did I feel myself before that thin, pale, gray-headed man, who, in a light silk dressing-gown and slippers, sat writing with it than I gave up my brief and inwardly resigned my place as a counsel for injured innocence.

He never raised his head as I entered, but continued his occupation without noticing me, muttering below his breath the words as they fell from his pen. "Take a seat," said he curtly, at last. Perceiving now that he was fully aware of my presence, I sat down without reply. "This bag is late, Mr. Paynter," said he, blandly, as he laid down his pen and looked me in the face.

"Your excellency will permit me, in limine, to observe that my name is not Paynter."

"Possibly," said he haughtily; "but you are evidently before me for the first time, or you would know that, like my great ancestor and friend, Prince Metternich, I have made it a rule through life never to burden my memory with whatever can be spared it, and all the more on the patronymics of all subordinate people; for this reason, Sir, and to this end, every cook in my establishment answers to the name of Jeames, my valet is always Pierre, my coachman Jacob, my groom is Charles, and all foreign messengers I call Frederick. The original of that appellation is, I fancy, supernaturalized or dead, but he lives in some mysterious recesses who carry canvas reticules as well as he."

"The method may be convenient, Sir, but it is scarcely complimentary," said I, warmly.

"Very convenient," said he, complacently. "All counsels I address as Mr. Sloper. You can't fail to perceive how it saves time, and, rather think that in the end they like it themselves. Where did you leave yours?"

"I left on Saturday last. I arrived at Dover by the express train, and it was there that the luckless leaden bag by which I have now the honor to stand before your excellency."

Instead of bestowing the slightest attention on this evasion of mine, he had resumed his pen and was writing away glibly as before. "Nothing new stirring when you left?" said he, carelessly.

"Nothing, Sir. But to resume my narrative of explanation—"

"Come to dinner, Paynter; we dine at six," said he, rising hastily; and, opening a glass door into a conservatory, walked out, leaving me in a mingled state of shame, anger, humiliation, and, I will state, of ludicrous embarrassment which I have no words to express.

"Dinner! No," exclaimed I, "if the alternative were a hard crust and a glass of muddy water! not if I were to fast till this time tomorrow! Dine with a man who will not condescend to acknowledge even my identity, who will not deign to call me by my name, but only consents to regard me as a pebble on the seashore, a blade of grass in a wide meadow! Dine with him, to be addressed as Mr. Paynter, and to see Pierre, and Jacob, and the rest of them looking on me as one of themselves! By such prescriptive right does this man dare to insult those who, for aught he can tell, are more than his equals in ability? Does the accident—and what other can it be than accident?—of his station confer this privilege? How would he look if one were to retort with his own impertinence? What, for instance, if I were to say, 'I always call small diplomatists Bluebottle, you'll not be offended if, just for memory's sake, I address you as Bluebottle—Mr. Bluebottle, of course?'"

I was in ecstasies at this thought. It seemed to vindicate all my insulted personality, all my outraged and injured identity. "Yes," said I, "I will dine with him; six o'clock shall see me punctual to the minute, and determined to avenge the whole insulted family of the Paynters. I defy him to assert that the provocation came not from his side. I dare him to show cause why I should be the butt of his humor, my more than he of mine. I will be prepared to make use of the even exact words of his repelling impertinence, and say, 'Sir, you have exactly embodied my meaning; you have to the letter expressed what this morning I felt on being called Mr. Paynter; you have, besides this, had the opportunity of experiencing the sort of pain such an impertinence inflicts, and you are now in a position to guide you as to how far you will persist in it for the future.'"

I actually smiled in the thought of this reprisal, and longed for the moment to come in which, indeed, I might make use of it. Only, I should say, "Bluebottle, pass the Madeira," with some comment on the advantage all the Bluebottles have in getting their wine duty free. Then, with what sarcastic irony I should condole with him over his overcustomed, dull ear, generally employing home platitudes for blue-books, making Grotius into bad grammar, and tramping an old Puffendorf into a dead regularity. "Ain't you sick of it all, B.-B.?" I should say, familiarly; "is not the unreality of the whole thing offensive? Don't you feel that a despatch is a sort of formula in which Madrid might be inserted for Moscow, and what was said of Naples might be predicated of Pekin?" I dilated a long time with myself at what precise period of the entertainment I should assume my battery and open fire. Should it be in the drawing-room, before dinner? Should it be immediately after dinner? Or in a Socrates of sherry? Ought I to wait till the dessert, and that time when a sort of easy intimacy had been established which might be supposed to prompt candor and frankness? Would it not be in better taste to defer it till the servants had left the room? I was resolved that to his household seemed scarcely fair.

These were all knotty points, and I revolved them long and carefully, as I came back to my hotel through the same silent street.

CHAPTER XIV.

"Don't keep a place for me at the table d'hôte to-day, Kramm," said I, in an easy carelessness; "I dine with a friend, and perhaps couldn't well get off the first day, but to-morrow I promise you to pronounce upon your good dinner."

I suppose I am not the first man who has derived consequence from the invitation it has cost him misery to accept. How many in this world of snobbery have felt that the one sole recompense for long nights of ennui was the fact that their names figured among the most guilded guests in the next day's Post!

"It is not a grand dinner, to-day, is it?" asked Kramm.

"No, no, a merely family party; we are very old chums, and quite at home with each other."

"You will then go in plain black, and with nothing but your decorations."

"I will wear nothing," said I, "none; not even a ribbon." And I turned away to hide the humane and mortification his suggestion had provoked.

Punctually at six o'clock I arrived at the legation; four powdered footmen in the hall, and a decent-looking personage in black preceded me up the stairs, and opened the double doors into the drawing-room without hearing or announcing me, or paying the slightest attention to my mention of "Mr. Pottinger."

Leaving me to find my way as I entered, his excellency came forward with his hand out, and though it was the least ceremonious thing in his how was grandly ceremonious, his smile was courteous and his manner bland.

"Charmed to have you over the merit of punctuality," said he. "To the untraveled English, six means seven, or even later. You may have dined, Sir, before you have thought of leaving," continued he, turning to me; "cold, raw, and uncongenial."

We talked of the weather" till, the door opening, the maitre d'hôtel announced, "His excellency is served;" a rather needless piece of formality of ignoring his company, and which was even more strongly impressed by the fact that he walked in first, leaving me to follow.

At the table a third "cover" was just being specially removed as we entered, a fact that created at first a little awe in me, but which began, and went on with little said; a faint question from his minister as to what the dish contained and a whispered reply constituted most of the talk, and an occasional cold recommendation to me to help myself to wine. It was admirable in all its details, the cookery exquisite, the wines delicious, but there was an oppression in the solemnity of it all that made me sigh repeatedly. And the butler been serving a high mass his motions at the side-board could scarcely have been more impressive.

"If you don't object to the open air, we'll take our coffee on the terrace," said his excellency; and we soon found ourselves on a most charming elevation, surrounded on three sides with orange-trees, the fourth opening on a magnificent view over a fine landscape with the Taunus mountains in the distance.

"I can offer you at least a good cigar," said the minister, as he selected with great care two from the number on a silver plateau that stood by. "These, I think, you will find recommendable; they are grown for myself at Cuba, and prepared after a recipe only known to one family."

In all this there was a dignified civility, not at all like the impertinent freedom of his manner in the morning. He never, besides, addressed me as Mr. Paynter; in fact, he did not advert to a name at all, not giving me the slightest pretext for that reproof I had come so charged with; and as to opening the campaign myself, I'd as soon have commenced acquaintance with a tiger by a pull at his tail. We were now alone; the servants had retired, and there we sat, silently smoking our cigars in apparent ease, but one of us at least in a frame of mind the very opposite to tranquillity. What a rash and conflict of thoughts was in my head! Why had not she dined with us? Was her position such as that the presence of a stranger became an embarrassment? Good Heaven! was I to suppose this, then, and the other? What was there in this man that so imposed on me that when I wanted to speak I only could sigh, and that I felt his presence like some overpowering spell? It was that calm, self-contained, quiet manner—could rather than naturally, conscious without cordiality—that chilled me to the very marrow of my bones. Lecture him on the private sentiments of his life! ask him to render me an account of his actions! address him as Bluebottle!—

"With such tobacco as that one can drink Bordeaux," said he. "Help yourself."

And I did help myself—freely, undoubtedly. I drank for courage, as a man might drink from thirst or fever, or for strength in a moment of fainting death. The wine was exquisite, and my heart beat more forcibly, and I felt it.

I can not follow very connectedly the course of my reflections, neither know how the conversation glided into politics, nor what I said on that subject. As it was, I began by wholly succeeded in obtaining his excellency's confidence, I know as little as a man does of the precise moment in which he is drowning in a Scotch mist. I have a dim memory of talking in a very dictatorial voice, and continually referring to my "extreme youth and simple life," with reference to what Peel "said," and what the Duke "told me."

"What's the use of writing home?" said his excellency, in a desponding voice. "For the last five years, with unwearied attention to what is going on here; nobody minds, nobody heeds it. Open any blue-book you like, and will you find one solitary dispatch from Hesse-Kalbberstadt?"

"I can not call one to mind."

"Of course you can't. Would you believe it, when the Zeringer party went out, and the Schildhoffers came in, a certain personage—I will rebuke—I will withhold—sending off a special messenger with the news? And then came out a dispatch in cipher, which being interpreted contained this stupid doggerel:

"'Strange that such difference should be
Twixt Tweedledum and Tweedledee.'

I ask, Sir, is it thus the affairs of a great country can be carried on? The efforts of Russia have an immense, a certain purpose—I will mention no names—loves caviar, he likes it fresh, there is a special estafette established to bring it! I have, Sir, the most unimpeachable researches, his fondness for English cheese; I lost no time in putting the fact before the cabinet. I represented, and while I could have rambled tremblingly toward France, the thoughtful politician knew the path of duty, and immediately I was left to lose no time: 'The grand-duchess has immense influence—countermine her,' said I, 'countermine her with a Stilton!' I was not to lose no time: 'The grand-duchess has immense influence—countermine her,' said I, 'countermine her with a Stilton!' I was not even consulted, Sir, as to the kind; they have not so much as sent out a Cheddier! What will the people of England say in a few days when they shall come to learn they shall, that at this mission here I am alone—that I have neither secretary nor attache, poor or unpaid, and since the Circassian war the whole weight of the legation has been thrown upon me! I will, but that is a systematic course of treachery—I can't call it lies—has been adopted to entrap me, if such were possible! I have been unequipped to, my questions all unanswered. I stand here with the peace of Europe in my hands, and none to counsel me! Where will it all end? I ask you, Sir, to the very last dispatch I have received from Downing Street? It runs thus:

"'I am interested by his lordship to inform you that he views with indifference your statement of the internal condition of the grand-duchy, but is much struck by your charge for sealing-wax.'

"'I have, Sir, etc.'

"This is no longer to be endured. A public servant who has filled some of the most responsible of official stations—I was eleven years at Dregnitz, and seven in the Republic; I was a charge at Odoulouloo for eight months—the only European who ever survived an autumn there; they then sent me round to Colonioo to negociate the Salt-sprat treaty; after that—"

Here my senses grew muddy: the gray, dim light, the soft influences of a good dinner and a sufficiency of wine, the drowsy tenor of the minister's voice, all conspired, and I slept as soundly as if in my bed. My next conscious moment was as his excellency moved his chair back, and said,

"I think a cup of tea would be pleasant; let us come into the drawing-room."

THE FIREMEN'S PARADE.

The night is very still and dark,
The trees look slumberous through the Park,
The gloomy gas-lamps, here and there,
Like steadfast fire-flies, dot the air;
An autumn calm is over the town,
Unfelt the autumn dews come down,
The waiting crowd is calm and dumb
Till breaks the outburst of "They come—
The firemen of New York!"

A thread of flame around the square,
A rosy light that flits the air,
A hum of voices—then a sound
Of marching feet that shakes the ground,
And phalanx after phalanx comes
To whistling fifes and beating drums,
While clattering cheers, like wave on wave,
Surge upward, welcoming the brave—
The firemen of New York!

Bathed in a yellow foam of light
The red shirts gleam athwart the night,
And down the long illumined line
A thousand burnished helmets shine,
While like a fiery smile around,
With truck and engine trailed behind,
And the black sky is split with cheers
Of welcome to the volunteers—
The firemen of New York!

Soaring to heaven, from torch on torch,
As the bands pass the royal porch
A thousand fiery fountains play,
The night is almost turned to day,
A sea of light flows every where,
A golden powder fills the air;
The crowded fire of cheers is gone,
For, Kings of Fire, they play with flame—
The firemen of New York!

Another glory than that of light
Decked with its splendor that autumn night;
A glory reaching wider and higher
Than all the fountains of yellow fire—
A lesson that should have burned its truth
Into the heart of the royal youth,
Of the magical change by Freedom wrought,
How men may be brave and yet unbought,
Like the firemen of New York!

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

PROGRESS OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.

On Sunday, October 14, the Prince attended service at Trinity Church, and breakfast at the Bostan authorities. On Monday he took his departure from New York in the Harvest Lone for Albany. Poughkeepsie he arrived at high Tarrytown. His reception there, and his review of the cadets are mentioned in another column. On Tuesday he left West Point in the Daniel Drew, and steamed up to Albany where he was received by Governor Morgan and the State authorities. After spending an hour or two at the Capitol he repaired to the Governor's mansion, and dined there, Governor Seward and others being guests. On Wednesday he left Albany by special train for Springfield, and thence to Boston, where he arrived late in the afternoon. He was conducted to his quarters at the Boston authorities. On entrance crowd following. On Thursday the Prince witnessed a great Ball and Firework procession, and received Ralph Farnham, the survivor of Bunker Hill; reviewed the troops on Boston Common, and visited the manufactory of arms at the Music Hall; and went to the hall in the evening. On Friday he visited the Navy Yard, and subsequently Harvard College, and examined all the objects of interest at that venerable seat of learning. On Saturday he visited the tomb of Auburn Cemetery, Bunker Hill, and the Charlestown Navy Yard. The latter place was received by immense crowds of citizens and with great enthusiasm wherever he appeared. The people were desirous to see the Prince, but not to hear him.

PRAYER-BOOKS FOR THE PRINCE.

"AT TOMPKINS'S BOOK-STORE, in the Herald reporter, "three front pews in the centre aisle were reserved for the accommodation of the royal party. In one of them, and immediately in front of the Prince's seat, two magnificent prayer-books were deposited. One was a small octavo size, the other a half quarto. They were both got up in the most perfect style of typographical art, and the skill of the binder had exhausted itself on the exterior decoration. The large prayer-book was of purple brilliant morocco, and was fastened by a golden clasp, chastely embellished with the Prince's arms. The price of this was the sum of $250. On the outer cover is bore this inscription:

TO HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS
ALBERT EDWARD, PRINCE OF WALES,
FROM
THE CORPORATION OF
TRINITY CHURCH, NEW YORK,
IN MEMORY OF THE ARRANGEMENTS OF THE CROWN OF ENGLAND.

"The clasp of this book was finely worked with the Prince of Wales' plume and the motto 'Ich Dien.' It was altogether a beautiful gift, worthy of Trinity Church and the royal Prince.

"The smaller prayer-book was bound in something like brown morocco, and clasped by two ornamented silver clasps. The following was the inscription. On the inner front cover was a beautifully inlaid representation of the crown and garter, and on the outer side the following inscription:

TO HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS
THE PRINCE OF WALES,
FROM FRANCIS VINTON, D.D.,
RECTOR OF TRINITY, D.D.,
THE CHURCHYARD IN CHARGE OF TRINITY CHURCH,
NEW YORK,
AS A MEMORIAL OF THE LAYING DOWN AND RAISING AFTER TRINITY, OCTOBER 14, 1860.

"The frontispiece is a very fine engraving of our blessed Saviour."

AN IRISHMAN INSULTS HIM.

On the Prince's departure from New York, shortly after the vessel had reached the centre of the harbor, a very happy Hibernian said, with a sigh of relief, "Ah sure an' he's gone, and we never once broke his head!" The unfortunate speech he received a bullet on the side of the head like nearly sent him into the water. The police, however, prevented any further disturbance.

HE FINDS IT COLD.

On the way to West Point, the Prince walked about upon the upper deck and found it cold; went into the pilot-house, and found that still colder; and finally went down upon the main deck, under the awning, and remained there most of the time with the Mayor, associating with Mr. Collector Schell, and other gentlemen of the party. He seemed more lively and talkative than he has appeared before since the hunt upon the Illinois prairies, and expressed very freely his gratification at the reception in New York, and especially with the firemen's parade. He said that he had seen a great many soldiers before, but never such firemen. "Fine-looking fellows!" he added.

HE WILL RETURN TO THIS COUNTRY.

During the conversation the Prince, as well as General Bruce and the Duke of Newcastle, expressed his satisfaction with the entire reception he has met with. They could not have passed more time here and visited the

A TESTIMONIAL TO CAPTAIN WILSON.

The sum of £3300 has already been subscribed in this city for a testimonial to Captain Wilson and the crew of the late Minerva Schooner, who so gallantly rescued the passengers and crew of the steamship Connaught, recently destroyed by fire at sea.

A MAN MURDERS HIS DAUGHTERS.

We read in the New Haven Journal of October 12:—"A horrible double murder was perpetrated on Monday evening, in Birmingham, Litchfield county, by a man in a fit of jealousy of his wife. The man's name is Hine, by trade, while in a fit of jealousy of his wife, he murdered his daughters, Mary Ann Hine, aged eleven and fifteen years respectively, and then committed suicide by cutting his throat, completing the cutting his throat. Hine is about forty years of age, has always been considered a kind husband and father, conducted himself steadily, temperate man.

"The circumstances connected with this heart-sickening affair are about as follows: Villets occupied, with his family, a small dwelling house in Lee Town, and has two daughters, by his first wife, lived with them. Mr. Hine was formerly a boarder in the family of Mr. Villets, living, when says the Bridgeport Standard he raped on Mrs. Villets and succeeded in getting her with child, and was passing. Of course there was a great gathering at the place, and a general search for Hine, who, it is said, was armed up, and he was able to tell what he had done, but was not found. Mrs. Villets was confined to bed, and pleased no doubt be examined, etc. His manner was perfectly natural. It means at the time of committing the murders, he had apparently recovered. It is stated that several of the neighbors considered him insane, and partly deranged.

"A few months since he was in the employment of Messrs. Sanford, at Bridgewater, but left town, or was discharged. He has been living in Birmingham for some time, but had not been able to obtain a permanent situation. Last week he returned to Bridgewater, and it is supposed to give up housekeeping—his wife to go home to her connections in Birmingham, and he to board around. Such, he would place with the Shelters.

"His wife left for home on the girls left on Monday, and he, it is said, attended her to the cars. Nothing unusual occurred in the way of conversation, and when the girls left, his daughters went some distance to meet him on his return. It is supposed that he met them, and conversed with his wife, but this seems to be mere conjecture. His wife left on the cars at 4 P.M., and at 5 P.M. the bodies of the two girls were found. It is supposed that, owing to many circumstances, he had become deranged, and that after committing the murders he went to the house of Mrs. Villets, and they probably did without a struggle; the first blow—which was apparently the fatal one—appeared to have caused all consciousness.

"It is thought that Villets will recover. He is now confined in Litchfield County Jail."

AN ECCENTRIC WILL.

An aged gentleman, a planter in the State of the Southern States, has just died, leaving a fortune of $100,000, which he is to keep for seventeen years, and then to divide it—and that document is as follows:

"I bequeath all my property to the children of my brother, on the following conditions: Desirous of marking my sense of the value which my faithful housekeeper has paid me in saving my life one day when I was drowning, and wishing also to provide for my housekeeper, I appoint my said housekeeper nurse, tutor, and mentor to my dog. She shall receive $100 per year, payable to her, out of my entire fortune, a duly sum in the following manner: For the first seventeen years after my death the dog shall live, not one second longer. During the first five minutes after the decease of the dog, if the dog shall live, my housekeeper shall receive $5 a day; the second year after the decease of the dog, $4 each year; $15; and so on, until the death of the dog. In the course of the months of the seventeen years the dog shall be paid to my housekeeper for every day of the dog's existence $365. On the day of the dog's death, and for every hour of the dog's life $250. In the last hour of his life she shall receive for every minute of that hour $15, and for every second of the last minute $900. My money is charged with superintending the carrying out of my will.

This eccentric gentleman appears to have ascertained the dog's expectation of life, and the sum he paid to his housekeeper would be:

30 days,	$9,750
11 hours, at $250	2,750
59 minutes, at $15	885
59 seconds, at $900	7,500
Total	$30,135

PERSONAL.

Jacob Cullaway was on 16th ult. re-elected United States Senator for a term of six years, from 4th March next. In the Senate the vote stood 27 to 1, and in the House 108 to 24. The Democratic majority is overwhelming.

Senator Douglas has been stumping Michigan, and has met with success.

Senator Seward continues to redress the Republicans of the State.

Senator Houlin was in Boston when the Prince arrived, and assisted to receive him.

Mr. Yancey, of Alabama, has been making speeches in Connecticut. He is a fine, able, and eloquent speaker.

In the arrangements for the ball to be given to the Prince of Wales at Boston, the committee, at their request, the name of Josiah Quincy was asked to be used in the Committee of Management. The old gentleman, who is now well advanced, has, in itself, it presents a remarkable illustration of the continued strength of his mind and of his affections, if he lives, his ninetieth birthday in February next. He is the last of the Presidents of the United States who was born in the days when the United States Government was formed the Republic. He was subject to the Crown at his birth, and lived to see the accession of the twenty-five empire crowned on the empire. He is to-day the most interesting man in the United States, considering his age, his character, and by the possession of a vigorous intellect in that day of life when the intellect usually begins to fail. Boston has not yet.

The Prince of Wales had a dangerous rival at Boston in the person of Prince Leo T. Lloyd, a "gentleman from Africa," in whose veins mingled the blood of the royal family of Nubia. Prince Leo is now a citizen and merchant of Cincinnati, Ohio, and a visiting guest. His friends and admirers gave him a ball and supper at the Prospect House, Waltham, on Monday evening. Twenty-five couples were assembled, including guests from Washington, New York, Philadelphia, and Boston. Prince Leo's Royal visit was the fortunate partner of the Prince in the first dance. The entertainment was both successful, and Prince Leo expressed his royal satisfaction.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE ROYAL FAMILY.

The Queen remains on the Continent, at Coburg and was not expected to return home till 10th October. The Prince Consort has had an accident, which is thus described by the London Court Journal: "On the return of the Prince Consort to Coburg on Monday, the 1st inst., for the purpose of meeting the Queen and the Prince, the royal highness jumped out, but has not been buried a scratch on his face. We are happy to say that a telegram has been received from Lord John Russell, dated from Coburg, on Tuesday afternoon, to the effect that H.R.H. the Prince Consort is going on quite satisfactorily. The injuries he received were not of a serious character."

BETROTHAL OF THE SISTER OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.

The Allgemeine Zeitung, which stated a few days since that on the return of her Majesty from Coburg the betrothal of the Princess Alice with Prince Louis of Hesse-Darmstadt would be officially made known at Darmstadt, now states that this intelligence is only incorrect as to the place named, and that the betrothal has celebrated at Skyerno instead. Prince Louis is the son of Prince Charles (brother to the reigning Grand Duke) and the Princess Elizabeth of Prussia (daughter of Prince William, uncle to the King), and was born on September 25, 1837. The same journal further states that her Majesty will reside two entire days at Meppen, and that the Bishop of Hildesheim has been selected for the royal sojourn. The English Minister at Frankfort, Sir Alexander Malet, has received the congratulations for a grant himself to be held at his hotel on the 25th, in honour of the betrothal.

A BOY BAKED IN AN OVEN.

On Tuesday last, at the residence of Frederick Drake, son of a baker, of 97 Princes Street, Lambeth, met with a fearful and fatal accident in the bakery of the firm. At the inquest held on his body on Wednesday evening by Mr. Lankester, the Westminster Coroner, it was proved that his father had continued dressed from going on to the night previous to the accident, and that he had fallen in, Robert Lawrence, in Drake's employment, said he was with the deceased on the morning of the fatal accident, a little after six o'clock. The deceased, as usual, went on the oven on the arch for the purpose of getting his clothes dry. He then was out at the time. He (witness) took up a board of bread into the shop, and on leaving the shop heard the shop on the shelves he heard frightful screams proceeding from the bakehouse. He was followed by his fellow-servants they ran down stairs, and found that the poor boy was in the oven, face down to the shelf. They were barely able to extricate him for a space of about three minutes. The jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death." Deceased died from the effects of burns, consequent on falling into an oven in which the fire was considerable neglect in not having had the oven repaired."

FRANCE.

REINFORCEMENT OF THE FRENCH GARRISON AT ROME.

The Monitore contains the following: "The Emperor has decided upon augmenting the corps of the army of occupation at Rome, by sending a division of infantry, two regiments of cavalry, and a battery of artillery. The Papal States Government has been informed that General Goyon has received instructions to march his troops into that province to act in concert with the French troops. It only appears to be necessary to add that the measure has been adopted by the great Powers accredited to Congress to pronounce once more on the necessity of the maintenance of the rule of the crowned head and the government of the Holy See. The Emperor, in sending his troops to Rome, has not placed on their shoulders the task of discharging the duties of settling from its sympathies with the Holy Father and from his presence at the head of the Catholic world. The reply given to the Duke de Cadore continued his assurance that the Government more than the Emperor the cause taken by Sardinia. Under actual circumstances, the display of force, instead of exciting hostility, would but aggravate the evil, by plunging Italy into a struggle for which the time has not yet arrived. The reply also stated that, in order to afford an effectuous protection to the Holy See, the effective force of the Papal States would be increased to 24,000 men, whose mission it will be to maintain order in the States of St. Peter respectively. This 'gutturnoy' properly so called, comprising a population of 670,000 souls, is divided into the districts of Viterbo, Civita Vecchia, Velletri, and Viterbo. Marshal Vaillant, the defender of Rome in 1849, will be appointed to command in chief of the corps of the army of occupation, should the gutturnoy of St. Peter's Patrimony be menaced by any danger."

PARIS GOSSIP.

The Paris correspondent of the New York Albion furnishes the following gossip, operatic and other: "Each fresh day brings with it its budget of theatrical gossipettes. At the Café Cardinal, at the corner of the Rue Drouot, and the Boulevard Montmartre, the principal artists and many of the artist singers dismount or enjoying their mezzetta. A few days, since, Mr. Lumley, manager of Her Majesty's, is soon to appear on the Italian stage of Paris; Gen. Bentinck, who arrived in Paris expressly to see Mlle. Adelina Patti; Mr. Lumley and Carrion; and Gaudina Alajon, with the Spanish tenor Tamberlick, were seated at a table in the garden for Lisbon. I think, too, I recognized M. Ullman. He who sings [or used to sing] well celebrated artists, and perhaps with the most remarkable among those of whom I have been speaking, is Mlle. Patti, who has attracted much attention chiefly in act the luxury and magnificence of the house of the Duke de Grammont-Caderousse. His hotel is the windows of the dealers in photographs. What a collection of portraits! Mlle. Patti is there in every variety of pose. Among them I see a prodigious number of feminine names of the demi-monde, and of the events, the military, that commence! And these at the side, costing a franc apiece, are likenesses of the Emperor, the Empress, or at least what these are. You may see them pass every afternoon. There is the widow in an open carriage; the face bemeared with white and red; her eyes fixed, and ready to burst from their sockets; the hair false, the blackened gin, and her hair frizzled over her brow in the fashion made famous by Mademoiselle Rachel. Then the crowd looks at these pitiful dresses as they drive by [I do not mention], but this is the exception. Handsome and bronzed-faced creatures should be taken as models for the study of the fashionable women of France—and does surprise me greatly. In other days, the women of the Empire were the most beautiful in the world; from the women envious if en fait. To-day I scarcely perceive one extended beauty among the best and the worst of Parisian society. It is pretended that this sad change is due to the abuse of strength of the cosmetic and of cosmetic notions. I believe rather that we must attribute it to the abuse of the bath. Formerly, the bath was a luxury of the rich, and a remarkable woman of the day, a lady of fashion, on the Champs Elysées and in the Bois de Boulogne, or at the Opera, or in the Tuileries Gardens, and adopt a four-and-any department, in the worst possible taste. Now, the bath is for everyone from the Rue Richelieu or Kensington Gardens at the hours of fashionable promenade."

SHOCKING ACCIDENT AT A CIRCUS.

The Paris correspondent of the Herald says:

"A shocking accident occurred last night at the Hippodrome. Yesterday, when performing what is termed the voltige horse, the Cuban equestrian threw a sort of pyramid somersaulting, and fell down upon the back of the ground, the three principal performers, Mlle. Caroline, Mlle. Sisney Hippolyte and Francois—were, by the breaking of the cord, precipitated to the ground, and now lay, it is to actually dead, without hope of recovery. They were conveyed to one of the dressing rooms, and treated with fearful heroisms. The performance was instantly brought to a close. Mlle. Caroline has been still breathing, but apparently beyond all hope of life. An agonizing shriek broke from the unfortunate girl when recovering from the many fainted. The manager of the performance is in this view: two more than their position on two ropes; and thus poised on the tight ropes, the girl stands above them, partly resting on their shoulders, one while balancing the feet on the balance pole of the other. In this manner the three performers, in the voltige circus, the minister of the hundred feet above the level, and it was just there that the fatal accident occurred. The girl never was violently precipitated to the earth."

RUMORED VICTORIES OF GARIBALDI.

It is stated, via Genoa, that Garibaldi had sent a dispatch to Naples, dated the 1st inst., announcing a victory along the whole line, and that the royal troops were being pursued. The Diritto, of Turin, published dispatches, dated Naples the 2d inst., stating that the royal troops were repulsed from Caserta, and were surrounded. The Garibaldians made two thousand prisoners. The above victories look confirmation.

WHAT NAPOLEON WANTS.

It is reported that Napoleon, in reply to the Pope, maintained the non-intervention principle, and while promising to maintain order in the Holy See, he desire was to compel Rome to the protection of a genuine Italian Power.

THE POPE BEGS FOR HELP.

A summary of the Pope's allocution at the Consistory, of the 25th ult., is published. He reproves and condemned in the strongest terms the detestable and sacrilegious attack of the King and Government of Piedmont. He protested, and would not cease to protest, against their acts, which he declared null and of no effect. He eulogized and blessed his defenders, and called on the European Powers to intervene. He deplored the disastrous and pernicious policy of non-intervention, and urged the Powers to combine seriously into its dangerous effects, and concluded by expressing his conviction that the Catholic princes and people will rise en masse to the assistance of the Father of the Faithful, who is attacked by the particular enemies of the Catholic Church.

SARDINIA CEDES NO MORE TERRITORY.

In the Sardinian Chamber of Deputies, Cadolo demanded the production of the correspondence of the Italian agents in the Sardinian into Umbria and the Marches.

Cavour declared that he was ready to comply; he now declared that the published public document nor private treaty that no cession of territory to France had taken place: this statement was made in answer to question involving the cession of a single inch of territory to France. He repeated this statement in the most contrary utterly false.

VICTOR EMANUEL TAKES THE COMMAND OF HIS ARMY.

The following order of the day of his Majesty the King of Sardinia has been issued:

"ARCONA, October 4.

"Soldiers!—I am satisfied with you, because you are worthy of Italy. By arms you have vanquished your enemies, and by your valour the honour of the Italian name.

"The mercenaries whom I set free will speak of Italy and of you in Europe and elsewhere, after having learned God recompence those who serve him, and not those who oppress people and violate the rights of nations. We must establish a strong Italian monarchy on the liberty of peoples with will not a mere political concept. The Italian army will increase more and more the glory which since eight centuries has shone on the House of Savoy.

"Soldiers, I take the command. It would cost me too much not to be with you wherever there was danger."

GARIBALDI'S ORDER OF THE DAY.

The following is a late order of the day from Garibaldi:

"CAPUA, October 1.

"Our head-quarters are at Caserta. Our brothers of the Italian army, assembled at Teano, are fighting valiantly and conquering the enemies of Italy. The army of Lamoricière is routed by the Italian arms. The cities of the Papal provinces are free. Ancona is ours. The brave soldiers of the Northern army have delivered the country from all the Neapolitan territory. In a short time (Ora poco) we shall have the happiness of embracing them.

"G. GARIBALDI."

AUSTRIA PREPARING FOR WAR.

At the commencement of the present year the Austrian Empire, by means of an autograph letter, informed its subjects that a deficit of 60,000,000 florins existed in 1859; but an order has now been issued to raise 80,000 men "for the year 1861." The Austrian Government has called out the naval officers who were on furlough have received orders to return to their posts immediately. The whole of the Austrian army in Italy has been placed in a state of preparation for war. The Archduke Archduchess, but not on full war footing (Kriegsfuss).

A CURIOUS DUEL.

A truly romantic duel was lately fought in the environs of the not very romantic capital of Prussia. A young party, it is stated, of good family, but exceedingly poor, into possession of a challenge addressed to her lover, requesting him to meet her among the bathing herself incredible as it may appear, the intensity she carried out. Dressed in male costume she repaired to the appointed rendezvous, and found her lover already there. Both, as they met, fired their pistols, and fortunately for both, the bullets passed harmlessly on either side of their heads. Not satisfied with this, the two came up to each other, and fired their pistols a second time, after wounding her antagonist in the arm. Both were then satisfied, and the duel was at an end. Both were then satisfied, and the duel was at an end. Both were then satisfied, and the duel was at an end.

THE PURE CORRESPONDENCE.

The Paris correspondent of the New York Albion furnishes the following gossip, operatic and other: "Each fresh day brings with it its budget of theatrical gossipettes. At the Café Cardinal, at the corner of the Rue Drouot, and the Boulevard Montmartre, the principal artists and many of the artist singers dismount or enjoying their mezzetta. A few days, since, Mr. Lumley, manager of Her Majesty's, is soon to appear on the Italian stage of Paris; Gen. Bentinck, who arrived in Paris expressly to see Mlle. Adelina Patti; Mr. Lumley and Carrion; and Gaudina Alajon, with the Spanish tenor Tamberlick, were seated at a table in the garden for Lisbon. I think, too, I recognized M. Ullman. He who sings [or used to sing] well celebrated artists, and perhaps with the most remarkable among those of whom I have been speaking, is Mlle. Patti, who has attracted much attention chiefly in act the luxury and magnificence of the house of the Duke de Grammont-Caderousse. His hotel is the windows of the dealers in photographs. What a collection of portraits! Mlle. Patti is there in every variety of pose. Among them I see a prodigious number of feminine names of the demi-monde, and of the events, the military, that commence! And these at the side, costing a franc apiece, are likenesses of the Emperor, the Empress, or at least what these are. You may see them pass every afternoon. There is the widow in an open carriage; the face bemeared with white and red; her eyes fixed, and ready to burst from their sockets; the hair false, the blackened gin, and her hair frizzled over her brow in the fashion made famous by Mademoiselle Rachel. Then the crowd looks at these pitiful dresses as they drive by [I do not mention], but this is the exception. Handsome and bronzed-faced creatures should be taken as models for the study of the fashionable women of France—and does surprise me greatly. In other days, the women of the Empire were the most beautiful in the world; from the women envious if en fait. To-day I scarcely perceive one extended beauty among the best and the worst of Parisian society. It is pretended that this sad change is due to the abuse of strength of the cosmetic and of cosmetic notions. I believe rather that we must attribute it to the abuse of the bath. Formerly, the bath was a luxury of the rich, and a remarkable woman of the day, a lady of fashion, on the Champs Elysées and in the Bois de Boulogne, or at the Opera, or in the Tuileries Gardens, and adopt a four-and-any department, in the worst possible taste. Now, the bath is for everyone from the Rue Richelieu or Kensington Gardens at the hours of fashionable promenade."

SHOCKING ACCIDENT AT A CIRCUS.

The Paris correspondent of the Herald says:

"A shocking accident occurred last night at the Hippodrome. Yesterday, when performing what is termed the voltige horse, the Cuban equestrian threw a sort of pyramid somersaulting, and fell down upon the back of the ground, the three principal performers, Mlle. Caroline, Mlle. Sisney Hippolyte and Francois—were, by the breaking of the cord, precipitated to the ground, and now lay, it is to actually dead, without hope of recovery. They were conveyed to one of the dressing rooms, and treated with fearful heroisms. The performance was instantly brought to a close. Mlle. Caroline has been still breathing, but apparently beyond all hope of life. An agonizing shriek broke from the unfortunate girl when recovering from the many fainted. THE HORROR IN THE HOUSE.

"No. 22 Gayland Terrace only differed from the other numbers in being larger and more commodious. Some years before my first remembrance of the place, it had passed into the possession of Mr. Archbold, a wealthy merchant and ship-owner of Birkenhead, who furnished it in a style of surpassing magnificence, and adopted it as his regular summer resort. The death, however, of a widowed sister, Mrs. Annesley, who resided with him—an event which occurred in their second season—gave him a distaste to the spot; and placing the house, with all it contained, in the hands of the nearest agent, the merchant returned to his usual home. Sumptuous fittings and a moderate rent insured a ready acceptation; and in the seven years that succeeded Mr. Archbold's departure few families in turn inhabited the mansion—two for a season each, one for two, and one for three successive years. All these, especially the latest tenant, Mr. Callender, identified it with extraordinance; that gentleman even leaving with regret the mansion which had witnessed the illness and death of a beloved daughter.

"No. 23 was vacant when I first took cognizance of Gayland Terrace; but the notice to let speedily disappeared, the chimneys smoked, the windows opened, flowers blushed in the balcony, while silver voices and laughter betrayed the presence of fairer flowers within. A lady, with five daughters, had taken the house. Their name was Callender. The husband and father was a younger and part owner of an East Indiaman, had already realized a handsome independence, and was at this time on his way home.

"A brighter group I never saw. Mother and children had all the same clear, dark complexion, night-black hair, and brown hazel-tinged eyes—pigeony beauty refined—and what can be lovelier? Pleasant voices and pleasanter laughter! And there still, as I linger with my hoop beneath their window, waiting impatiently for my chosen lady of the band, Bud May.

"Rose, Lily, Violet (they were all named after flowers), Poppy, and May—each of them was charming, after her particular manner. And Violet, I think, was the greatest favorite; Bud Rose was the favorite with Lily and Poppy were dauntless; but the real queen of my affections was, as I have hinted, Bud May, who was, besides, the merriest of the band.

"What is that on your forehead, my sweet May?' asked her mamma, suddenly, one morning, as my favorite entered, sat down to breakfast.

"Mrs. passed her hand across her brow, and looked up angrily.

"'Ah, it's gone!' continued her mother, laughing.

"'What was it, mamma? A wasp?'

"'A frown, my love, and such a one as I never saw on your face before; yet, least of all on May's,' replied Mrs. Callender, with a rather puzzled expression.

"'May, on her part, looked thoughtful and somewhat troubled, but quickly resumed her usual demeanor; and nothing occurred for several days, till, one morning, Nurse Goodes, while attending on her mistress's toilet, hemmed and spoke: 'I beg your pardon, ma'am, but have you noticed Miss May?'

"'Noticed her? Especially? No. Why do you inquire, nurse?'

"'She grows thin, ma'am, that's certain; but she eats and drinks, and sleeps and plays as usual. I can't make out what the dear child's ailing; yet, somehow, she's not herself. For days together she will seem much as usual; then, again, all in a moment—'

"Nurse stopped.

"'What, in you mean?'

"'There comes a look upon her that makes me quiver!' said nurse, with a perceptible tremor. 'I never saw such a thing—I never did!'

"'Good Heavens, nurse!' exclaimed the startled mother, recalling the frown at breakfast. 'What can have stricken her?'

"'It's odd,' replied Nurse Goodes, 'but she doesn't seem aware of it herself! I wish, ma'am, you would come and look at her sometimes at night. I see the expression more strongly then; and sometimes she speaks a word or two I can not understand.'

"Her mistress promised to do so, and kept unaware watch over the darling the entire day; and Bud May was graver than ever, and gave her no opportunity for remark.

"I passed this afternoon, which was wet, in the house with my young friends, and we had a game at hide-and-seek, during which Bud appeared the most ingenious 'hide' of the day, being routed out at last in a great apartment on the ground-floor, in which there was a bed of extraordinary size. Upon this couch the fullest hunters had sat down more than once in consultation, not dreaming that the crafty little maid had removed to the interior, and substituting for it her own slight person, concealed herself to perfection with the pillows and coverlet.

"All the luxurious appointments of this richly furnished room—known as the Angel Chamber—but more particularly the bed, were objects of considerable admiration. The bed was of foreign manufacture, made unusually low, carved, gilt, and inlaid at the foot with malachite. The summer was marked by an angelic figure, exquisitely moulded, from whose arms, extended in attitude of protection, and from whose half-opened golden wings, descended the rich hangings of azure silk, which completed the drapery of a couch worthy of a queen.

"When that merry day was over, and the tired children had gone to rest, Mrs. Callender stole quietly up to May's little chamber, and found Nurse Goodes standing by the bed. Nurse put her fingers to her lips, and looked mournfully at the little sleeper. Her mistress's eyes followed hers. There was the same strange frown she had once already seen. Now, too, the lips were drawn back, the teeth set, the innocent face wholly changed, and wearing an expression of unlightly horror and disgust inexpressibly shocking to contemplate. Mrs. Callender scarcely recognized the child.

"Presently she murmured some indistinct sounds. 'Mamma put down her cake!'

"'They are rushing at us—rushing, rushing again!' Angel, oh angel!' gasped May.

"'My child! my child! what ails you?' Wake!' cried the terrified mother, clasping her.

"May woke, and the expression passed as though it sank half-fainting into her mother's arms, perfectly composed, and, kissing her mother, asked what was the matter.

"'I—I thought you were sleeping uneasily, my love,' said mamma, halffearing to see the look return. 'Was it a dream?'

"'Ah, I remember,' said May, lightly. 'Some creatures came flying at me all round, breaking, like black spars, against the bed; but the angel stops them always.'

"'Many slept two nights in the Angel Room, soon after re-occupied,' explained nurse, 'and had the same dream there.'

"'But I don't mind it,' said May. 'It—it's that other—'

"The strange look seemed about to steal over her face again, but she covered it with her hands.

"Mrs. Callender sat down beside the bed, and mentioned nurse away; she was bent on finding out the mystery.

"'What "other," May? My little girl, you have some trouble or fear. Confide in mamma. What is it?'

"May was silent for a moment, holding her mother's hand, and mechanically counting the white counterpane. Then she said,

"'Mamma, I can not tell. Something is wrong with me—with—with—I do not know, indeed I can not describe it. It is a sensation so quiet, so sudden, then, almost before I can feel how horrible it is, it is gone! It is neither pain nor illness, but yet is something of all three. I should not mind it so much, however, but for a sort of shock or pause of awe following horror that comes with it. It is as though—as though some wicked thing had touched me,' added the little girl, in a low voice, clasping more tightly the hand she held.

"Mrs. Callender's heart beat faster; but she was a firm and sensible woman, and addressed herself with such quiet energy to the task of soothing the poor child—more unnerved, apparently, by the relation of her fear than she had been by its concealment—that she very soon attained her object; and having watched her darling into a tranquil sleep, withdrew to consult with nurse, who she found in the adjoining apartment, weeping bitterly.

"'Oh, ma'am, ma'am! —oh, my dear lady!' sobbed Nurse Goodes. 'Take her away—take the darling away!'

"'Away, nurse?'

"'Away from this dreadful house. It is not for a Christian creature to live in. Charlotte says so.'

"'Charlotte?'

"Old Charlotte, the char-woman; she that was here, off and on, in Mr. Archbold's time. She knows that Mrs. Archbold's sister was served in the same way. Her brother hanged at it, and so did she, for she was a high-couraged lady, Mrs. Annesley; but she was touched six times, and six times!'

"'Touched and taken! Are you mad, you silly thing?' exclaimed her lady. 'You're a sad nurse, for my child's sake, beware how you give utterance to any such folly! As for old Charlotte, I shall talk to her myself presently.'

"The next day, a medical gentleman, their neighbor—and, like themselves, a recent tenant—Mrs. Callender—made a purely accidental visit; and pretty May, who happened to be alone with her mother, was subjected to the most minute personal questionings. Mr. Mawry was forced to admit that she looked worn and thin, but was utterly unable to detect any physical disorder; consequently, as nothing is avowedly the most approved remedy for nothing, he sent it to her in the form of some powerful colored mixture, which might have been swallowed with impunity by a delicate fee.

"But, in spite of the absence of medicine, in spite of care and vigilance, in spite of soft spring winds and strengthening sun, May began to droop and fade. So no more hoop, and hide-and-seek, and rustic rambles, for my little queen. From that strong assault on the citadel of health, from these to the sofa, from the sofa to her own little chamber, grew Bud May daily more pallid. Home life, till the most sanguine of the surrounding hearts dared hope no longer. Change of air and scene had been suggested, but in vain. Another other had been called in—at once declared that nothing could be so well adapted to her seeing constellation as the clear and bracing air of the sea, and breathed. As for change of scene, the little patient herself so earnestly, almost passionately entreated that she might not be removed from home, that the idea was instantly abandoned.

"One other request the little child preferred—that she might be placed beneath in the Angel-chamber, until—until— It was done; and now, as though she had nothing more to take or wish for, Bud May sank quickly and silently away.

"I have not told you what, till that time, I felt and did. I was May's lover, and betrothed to her, ay—going to God—yet I dared not dwell much upon the loss to myself: selfish regrets were out of place, could have no part or lot in such a matter. Still, I was not forbidden to sorrow with and for the rest; and many a day have I sat waiting patiently for the hour that sometimes saw me admitted for a moment to the Angel-chamber, to kneel beside the golden bed, and kiss the little waxen hand that faintly welcomed me.

"May lived on and on until—and we soon found that her greatest solace was to be left entirely alone, to gaze up at the shining countenance of the majestic angel, and to listen to the low sound of some sacred melody chanted in expression of unalloyed horror and disgust inexpressibly shocking to contemplate. Mrs. Callender scarcely recognized the child.

"Presently she murmured some indistinct sounds. 'Mamma put down her cake!'

"'They are rushing at us—rushing, rushing again!' Angel, oh angel!' gasped May.

"One evening—it was the 10th of April—the fact of our invalid's having been somewhat better in the morning had emboldened me to bring with me a beautiful kitten, of which she had once expressed her admiration. May was delighted, fondled it heartily, but was not with the only lady who had ever bestowed, and Lulu me leave the soft purring thing with her for a while, and return for it after dinner.

"I can not tell what feeling possessed me, but, as I softly turned, I longed for solitude, and, instead of proceeding to the music-room, stole into an intervening apartment, and presently began to weep.

"As I thus wept, I knew not; it was Mrs. Callender, whom I had not noticed sitting in the darkening room, and who, moved by my grief, came and sat beside me, offering broken words of consolation.

"As she spoke there was, or seemed to be, a faint call from the sick-chamber. Other ears had fancied it too, for Violet and the rest were already in the passage, and in another moment all had assembled in the Angel-chamber.

"There they lay, both asleep, the kitten and the little maid! Ay, my little maid shall never wake again till the resurrection.

"After a very brief interval Mr. Mawry and another occupied the left person of Colonel Robert Doulton, a stern warrior of the Wellington school, who had served in the Peninsular wars, and now, at the express suggestion of a London physician, brought down his invalid wife, to derive what benefit she might from the mild air and scenery and salubrious breezes of a notoriously healthy neighborhood.

"Mrs. Doulton—if the pale phantom that had traveled in a carriage-and-four, and been borne up by the chief bedroom in the arms of one strong maid deserved the name of a living being—was the object upon whom her lord—a man of iron, perhaps, unmalleable, self-indulgent—lavished all his love and his pity. Tenderness, which he was solicitude with which he watched the fluctuations of her disorder, and assembled round her every imaginable object calculated to soothe the pains or tranquillize the mind of his beloved partner. The physician, Dr. T——, came down once a week, to resolve himself that his prescriptions were accurately followed, to dine sumptuously with the colonel, and to receive the fifty-pound note which so poorly recompensed his skill. Between Dr. T—— while little Mr. Mawry, the apothecary, received orders to look in at least once in the course of every day.

"In spite of these arrangements, the generally received opinion that Mrs. Doulton would never quit that splendid bedroom alive grew and strengthened.

"Old Charlotte, the char-woman, who had no more business in that house than I—boy, indeed, for had I not buried my heart there, while she had only turned up the soil?—she, I say, contrived to reconnect herself with the establishment, and, upon those patterns, walked quietly back into its service.

"Charlotte asserted—and they believed her—that, no matter what the number of regular servants in the house, there was always room for one more woman. The reports she brought, in her clinkings to and fro, were gloomy in the extreme. Mrs. Doulton seldom rested in her bed—never her apartment. As for the colonel, he spent the greater part of the morning with his wife's bedside, reading to or conversing with her; then he rode or walked out for an hour, and returning, passed the hours till dinner in his own apartment, which he chose to call his study, engaged in the preparation of a work relating to his campaigns in India. The physician was their only visitor; and of the rest of the neighborhood, the good rector, who received a cordial welcome, and Mr. Mawry, alone had access to the drawing-room of No. 23.

"Thus passed about two months, when, on a certain morning, I was called to the rank prognosticator of old Charlotte and party were signally confounded by the appearance of Mrs. Doulton upon the gravshaded terrace of the house. She was decidedly better. Close beside her stalked her tall dark husband, rubbing his hands, and eying his well-nursed partner with the utmost complacency, as he saw that, which must have been a sweet and pleasant one in all days, the sweetest of all gratitude and pleasure, under the influence of the soft free air, and the sense of returning vigor.

"They drove many times together, and went home at last with manifest reluctance; the invalid, as if wain of her renovated strength, disdaining the ready hand that offered to support her across the narrow pavement.

"A day or two later, Mr. Mawry, who had already, as he confessed to his wife, experienced some slight twinges of conscience on the score of receiving so much for so little, was summoned to dinner by the colonel as he crossed the hall, and invited to remain and partake of the dinner at that moment about to be served.

"Mawry was fond of a good dinner. He sniffed, and accepted.

"The repast, though, to all appearance, a visitor had not been expected, was of the most costly description, alike in quantity and character, yearly feature, perfect in detail. Host and guest agreed in portioning more intellectual pleasure to the great business of the hour; and it was only when, the banquet finished, they drew chairs to the window, and began sipping their claret, that the colonel put forth his powers of conversation. And then Mr. Mawry fancied that he glanced from subject to subject rather too abruptly, and was reviewing in his secret soul whether his host was endeavoring to astonish him with his stores of knowledge, or whether his mind was in truth preoccupied with some deep matter, the remembrance of which he sought to drown in desultory talk, when the colonel suddenly rose, and, going to a book-case, took down a large and a small volume, and handed the latter to his visitor. Mawry saw that it was in some Oriental character, in paragraphs, numbered and lettered. The colonel then changed volumes, and showing Mawry that he now held an English translation, requested him to name any paragraph throughout the work, which he, the colonel, holding the original, would render into literal English.

"Mawry did as he was desired, naming in succession four or five passages of considerable length, all of which his host read off in English with perfect ease and correctness. He then laid the books aside.

"'Now, Sir, feel my pulse,' were his next words.

"Mawry obeyed. It was not a full beat, but regular, and moderately fast.

"'And in health, think you? Chest and lungs all right?'

"'Do you wish me to examine with the stethescope? I have it with me.'

"The other assented, and Mr. Mawry, through the medium of that plain speaker, ascertained that all was sound.

"'And I am not mad?'

"The doctor stared.

"'I have conversed collectedly upon many different topics, and have translated with literal accuracy several passages from the most involved and difficult of Eastern writers. Are these proofs sufficient?'

"Mawry bowed an affirmative.

"'Now, Doctor, I am going to ask you a curious question. Remember, I do not speak in figures. Simply and plainly—can a man taste death?'

"Mawry could not forbear a start.

"'I will explain further,' said the colonel. 'Once in three or four days—sometimes more frequently—I experience a sensation so difficult to describe that I was often at a loss for a name for the simile that caused your surprise. It is like—like a poisoned cloth flung suddenly over my whole face. Eyes, nose, mouth, and throat congealed with a horrible presence. I shudder from head to foot with an indescribable mixture of loathing and rage. In a second it is gone as it came as well as I. Have you, in your experience, met with such a case? I am not given to idle fancies. When I tell you, Doctor, that I have seen pestilence in all its cruelties, have passed nights among dead and dying creatures, without a single pluse of fear in all the war, you may believe that my nerves are not easily shaken. But I will own that the circumstance I have alluded to, as in the slightest measure, is to me considerable uneasiness; and fearing that, should the horror seize me in my wife's presence, the change of countenance I can not control might occasion her grave alarm, I resolved to take your opinion on the matter, and to-day I have it.'

"Mawry pondered deeply for a moment. He was struck with the coincidence of the symptoms described with those which had afflicted Miss Callender. Some whisper of the supernatural agency to which they were attributed had reached him in one or other of his frequent visits, but he man was devoid of the slightest taint of superstition, and his thoughts now set strongly in quite another direction.

"'Can you recall,' he presently asked, 'the first occasion on which this sensation occurred?'

"'Let me see. No. Stay—yes. I had been chatting with my wife, had partaken of her afternoon tea, and was returning to my study.'

"'It happens most frequently after meals?'

"'No, I think so,' said Doulton, reflecting.

"'You also take refreshment mornings during the day; you Indian gentlemen must have your tiffin, and perhaps, in the interval, a glass of pale ale or sherry-and-soda—'

"'Possibly,' said the colonel, whose attention was languishing. 'I believe I have.'

"'Brought to you by the butler, eh? What clares this is? Tredway, then, is always your cupbearer—Mr. Tredway?'

"'I suppose so—I forget. Really, I can hardly tell you. Sometimes Tredway, sometimes Mahomet, sometimes, eh—eh!' The colonel yawned.

"'Sometimes?'

"'Of course, I think they call her. An old woman who favors me with her presence here, for the sake, apparently, of helping eight idle servants to do nothing. But why these questions, Doctor? and, especially, what has that old luggage to do with the matter?'

"'Hir!' said Mawry, rather gravely, 'I don't know. When did this happen the second time?'

"'I had come, after resting for a couple of hours, feeling weary, and missing perhaps my siesta, I threw myself on the bed—there is one in the room on—and fell asleep. In about an hour, as I awoke and found, I started up in a state—I frankly avow it—of horrible alarm, as though I had been set upon by a band of fiends. Then came the shaking horror—then, thank God! release, for I do not think a human mind, however strong, could sustain so much as a moment of that unique sensation. Pah! Silence.'

"'It is curious,' said Mawry. 'I confess, Colonel, I do not comprehend your case. So far as my skill instructs me, you are sound in body, and unquestionable in mind. I have no fancy for fancies. Firm and self-possessed as you seem, it is yet quite possible that the solution may be found in some disarrangement of the nervous system. You have perhaps overtasked your brain—a little less work, and more exercise.'

"'I see, Sir, I see!' exclaimed the colonel, rising, with some heat; 'you take me for an illusionist, eh— Ha! by Heaven, it is coming now!'

"Mawry looked steadily at him. The colonel was not acting. The dark-lined countenance grew speedily pale, the eyes dilated, the lips blackened and gnashed. In spite of himself, the doctor was awe-stricken at an appearance that powerfully recalled the fearful traditions of possession.

"The attack, whatever its nature, was but momentary. With a long, deep inspiration, like one over whom a stifling wave has passed, the colonel seemed to recover himself completely, and, with a light laugh, held out his hand.

"Mawry took the hint, and his leave.

"'I have had a very pleasant draught,' he said; 'or rather, I will instruct your butler to make it.

And you will oblige me, Colonel, by receiving nothing of a liquid kind from any hand but mine. This is important: I will give you my reasons hereafter. Take your wine as usual. Good-night!

"Colonel Doulton neglected one portion of his friend's advice—he took even less than his accustomed exercise, and was so rarely seen abroad that old Charlotte underwent some severe cross-examinations. Her report now was that the mistress grew stronger and stronger, but refused to take the air; that the colonel was becoming seriously ill—could scarcely bear the fatigue of walking up stairs—and confined himself almost entirely to his study, dividing the day between his writing-table and the bed. The doctor, somewhat affronted at his patient's systematic disregard of his counsels, had discontinued his visits, and had not hitherto been invited to resume them.

"Thus affairs remained for several weeks, till one morning the reverend rector was sent for to the house. His visit was a prolonged one. He came out grave and pale, and charged with a melancholy tale, of which he made no secret. The colonel had been stricken with some mysterious visitation beyond the reach of human skill, and, with a rooted presentiment of his approaching end, was pressing the work on which he had been so long engaged to a conclusion. He seemed to be awaiting, although with the courage of a Christian and a soldier, an inevitable fate.

"Nor was he deceived. One bleak, gray morning in December—the windows of No. 53 remained closed. Colonel Doulton was dead!

"It was at this period that attention began to be more genuinely attracted to the house, and the peculiar evil fortune which seemed to attach to whomsoever became its occupant—the long list of families having each lost a member within its walls. A certain suspicion, originating none could say exactly how, hung about the mysterious old woman who had clung like an evil destiny to that house of grief. She could obtain no employment; few would open her door but the smallest idiots; the parish found means to resist her claim; the boys in the street rechristened her, without ceremony, as 'Mad Mother.' It invited her to supply them with a pen'orth of arsnic on credit; and, in return, pledged herself to faithfully to attend after her approaching execution. But apparently these suspicions were insufficient, and the law suffered her to starve on unmolested.

"In good truth, the weight of public opinion inclined to the supernatural side: and such extraordinary rumors began to gain credence that the agent deemed it his duty to apprise the landlord, Mr. Archbold, of the character attaching to his house, and the improbability of its getting another tenant, unless something could be speedily done to redeem its reputation.

"Not a week elapsed before Mr. Archbold, without commenting on his agent's report, laconically announced that his eligible tenancy was on the point of repairing to the spot, and would take immediate possession.

"A second idea had occurred to the shrewd old merchant. His favorite nephew, Charles Anwesley, had been guilty of an act of folly which thought fit highly to disapprove; had, in fact, taken to wife the beautiful daughter of a village schoolmaster. Mr. Archbold, who was a man of the fewest words, limited the expression of his indignation to a curt note, in which he informed the delinquent that, to avoid any future misapprehensions, he felt it right to state frankly that he, Charles, would never receive one farthing of the fortune he had destined for him.

"Charles was a young man of high spirit. He thought he had married Mary, if possible, a little better for the price he was likely to pay for her. The change in Charles's prospects, if it cooled a few friends, rendered others into more cordial life; and so much sympathy was felt and shown for the young couple, thus set rudely afloat on the sea of life, with scarce a helping oar to assist their lifeboat from a daily capsize, that Uncle Archbold became considerably conscious of his ungracious position; and, casting about for some means to redeem himself into the good thoughts of the world again, 'thought him of his vacant tenancy in Gaylland Terrace. Money he could not give—a home he might; and here was a splendid opportunity at once to confer an act of kindness on his nephew, and to rescue his property from the ill name that was daily becoming worse.

"He wrote accordingly, to Charles, proffering the loan of his furnished mansion in Gaylland Terrace until such time as Archbold have leisure to consider their future plans, or, indeed, for any period they chose, provided they took instant possession, and were apprised of the costly fixtures; and, on Charles's grateful acceptance, signified the result to his agent, as I have mentioned.

"So, early in February, No. 53, now in the full enjoyment of a haunted fame, opened its doors to new tenants; and Charles Anwesley, a young man of twenty-five, with good, frank, intelligent features, and resolute bearing—one with whom no ghost or any thing else would for a moment care to contending—escorted his charming little wife across the first threshold of which she was the declared mistress.

"The young people brought but one servant, a country girl; and their entire resources, inclusive of a little dower of thirty pounds, hoarded for his darling by the thrifty old schoolmaster, amounted to no more than seventy-five pounds. Charles, indeed, who had a taste for, and already some proficiency in medical science, intended to turn this to account; but how the war was to be carried on until the necessary license was obtained, and patients came to be killed in sufficient numbers to keep the sportsman alive, was an entire enigma.

"'How, upon earth, Charles, are we to keep all these lovely things of your kind uncle's clean, with only Hepzibah?' asked Mary. 'And, indeed, I shall be half afraid, as it is, to trust them to her determined hands. And oh, Charles! there's another thing. I'm so ashamed of myself!—I am. I can't—oh! what have I been doing? wanting my time with French and singing, when I can't even co—co—'

"'Coo, my child?' said Charles, laughing, and kissing off a tear—'why should you coo?'

"'Co—ok, Charles!' sobbed the poor bride. 'If I could have done that—and Hepzibah the house-work— I—think I'll try.'

"'You'll do no such thing!' rejoined Charles, seriously alarmed. 'You'll make a mess of it, burn your pretty fingers, and poison us both with all sorts of unearthly preparations! No, no! Burnt cork is quite enough for me in its way; but the caricature of a cabinet-pudding—the shocked phantom of a friedcake—no fun at all! No—we must manage another servant somehow.'

"The agent, when consulted on the matter, looked and looked blank, and, like Hepzibah—in short, he might as well inform Mr. Anwesley at once that there existed an unaccountable prejudice against the house, and that he dear little lady Charles might experience difficulties of a kind he did not expect in augmenting his establishment. There was nothing at present correct. Not a soul could be found in the vicinity willing to take service at No. 53: not the young couple, reluctant to incur the expense of sending to London for a domestic, sat down to their first meal a little disappointed in spirits—Mary, when she succeeded from his wife the cause of the difficulty, secretly resolving to extract some further information from the cautious agent on the subject.

"They were sitting after dinner, with recovered spirits, but in deep consultation, when there came a low knock at the door.

"Bidden to enter, a dirty old woman made her appearance. It was an humble, but a respectable-looking old woman, to offer her valuable services, in default of better.

"'She loved the house,' she said, 'and all that was in it. Oh! as she looked, she could do as much as twenty—was a very good cook, and would work her fingers to the bone for dear little lady Charles. As for wages, she didn't want none of them.'

"As these terms seemed reasonably cheap, and they were really in a difficulty, Charles, after a whispered consultation with his wife, left the woman's manifold figure, gave utterance to the assent he saw in his wife's clear eyes, and engaged the strange applicant, eighteen pence in the first place, to have recourse to soap and water; in the second, to eat a good supper.

"Though the old woman's eyes glistened, like those of a famished wolf, at the mention of food, she paused at the door, and, with a ghastly, wild, and in sort of hoarse whisper, 'Please, Sir, and my lady, don't say that you've taken old Charlotte into your service. I shall want a blanket; and nobody will know, if you don't tell 'em.'

"Charles smiled at the idea of the old crone fearing that the dangerous secret of her in the house might damage hers; but unwilling to explain before his wife, hastily gave the required promise, and summoning Hepzibah, dismissed her dear little ladyship.

"'Affairs for a few days went smoothly enough. Charles commenced a course of study preparatory to the regular carrying out of his medical project, while the little bride busied herself perpetually in the direction of their economical household, and was never tired of admiring the well-being of uncle's beautiful things.

"One morning, Annesley having gone out alone, Mary—accompanied by Charlotte, who was well acquainted with every drawer, shelf, and cupboard in the place—commenced a thorough inspection throughout the house, ending, as it happened, at the Angelo-chamber.

"'What a lovely room!' exclaimed Mary, for the twentieth time, as she entered; 'and what a couch! When I die I should like it to be on just such a bed as this—only I should prefer one in white that sweet majestic face shining upon me.'

"'Ah, my dear lady!' said the faithful Charlotte, cheerfully. 'Master's mother—Miss Mary Caldecde—Colonel Doulton, all breathed their lasts on that very bed.'

"'Can you remember all those deaths?' asked Mary.

"'Remember them? Bless you, my dear, they've all been touched and took within these five years.'

"'Touched and took! What do you mean, Charlotte?' said the young mistress, opening her blue eyes.

"'Well, well, we'll see!' muttered the old woman. 'And so you'd like to be laid out upon that bed, my lamb? She was a beautiful lady, that, gazing at the pretty, fragile creature before her from head to foot, as though mentally dressing her for the grave.

"Now, whether or not there was something unusually repulsive in the look and tone of Charlotte, or whether she simply desired to be alone, Mary yielded to an irresistible inclination to dismiss her follower, and, with a shudder, sank down on the great plate-glass window, which faced the west.

"The view from hence was both fair and sad. First came a slip of much-neglected garden, a crowded battle-ground of weeds and flowers—the weeds having decidedly the best of it—some leafless elms and shrubs, a low, high wall, magnified to an immense size with sheaves and coils of evergreens—beyond, just this was a glimpse of the cemetery, long since filled, and abandoned as a place of interment. Over and between three or four noble expanses, that shadowed many a mighty dead, might be seen the broad sward, green with sprouting corn; then a range of blue hills, on the last of which lingered the westering sun.

"Half an hour later Charles was returning home. When within a few paces of his own door a loud ringing shriek struck him like a stab! In a moment he was in the house, and dashed into the room from the direction of which he had fancied the cry proceeded.

"His wife was on the bed, frightfully convulsed—Hepzibah and Charlotte beside her. She recovered instantly from seeing him, and a violent flood of tears completely restored her tranquillity; after which, being left alone with her husband, Mary related as follows:

"She had sat for some time at the window, watching the purpling clouds, and the sombre tints of evening calmly enveloping the quiet scene, when, becoming sensible of a degree of lassitude, and a strange inert feeling not usual with her, she moved to the low golden couch, and lying fairly down, fell into an uneasy sleep.

"She lay with her right side, with her face to the wall—on that side, distant scarcely half a yard from the bed—and dreamed that, so lying, the wall before her opened, and that there issued from it a skeleton, bearing in its hands its own severed head. This, the ghastly and bloodless hands had detached itself from the skull and pointed to the vacant eye-holes, while the head muttered: 'You have taken my place, my bed, my house: Here was blue diamonds once, my sister, that laughed and swam like yours. Come, let us compare!'

"The skull was thrust up into her very face. She was conscious of the earthy, fetid odor—her own hair seemed to rise. She woke, more and more into the sister-skull, as though it were becoming part of it—when, with a shriek and a desperate struggle, she burst from the spectre and the dream.

"Although for the moment the painful impression appeared to pass away, it was but too evident to the fond eyes that watched and spirits of his little wife had received a serious shock. In a few days her rich color was gone, her lips looked dry and feverish—she had a constant complain of headache, and started when suddenly touched, or at the least unexpected sound.

"One day, after making vain efforts to eat her breakfast, the poor little thing leaned her head on her husband's bosom, and burst into tears. 'Charles, my poor boy,' she sobbed, 'I fear I'm very, very ill.'

"The wistful, anxious look in those blue eyes alarmed her husband far more than even her words. He laid her gently on the sofa, soothing her to the utmost of his power, and, not without some little self-reproach for neglecting it so long, dispatched Hepzibah to request Mr. Mayry's immediate attendance.

"The little doctor acknowledged that his new patient looked rather in the extreme, and required every attention. The present attack was clearly nervous; and he endeavored to elicit from her whether she had experienced any recent shock or alarm. Mary, however, was ashamed to confess her dream; and, with a look of whatever nothing but that she was subject to a sudden and fearful spasm, which affected her whole head from the eyes to the occiput. In the latter organ, especially, she suffered much pain.

"On the point of leaving, Mayry turned round, and carelessly observed: 'I take it for granted, my dear Madam, that you have an excellent watcher in your husband; but you need some care. Who, may I ask, is your regular medical attendant?' Mary smiled. 'Who, for example, makes your tea?'

"'Charles, sometimes, Hepzibah, generally; but sometimes old Ch—' Mary checked herself.

"'I beg your pardon—who?'

"'I was going to name an old woman we have taken into the house to help the housemaid, but, for some reason I have not inquired, she does not wish it to be known.'

"'Old Charlotte,' ejaculated Mayry.

"Such is her name,' replied Mary, astonished at his acquaintance.

"Mayry, who had sat down again, got up with a face white as marble.

"'I have a word to say to Mr. Annesley,' he said, and took a hasty leave.

"Charles was reading medicine in the Angelroom.

"'Good Heavens, Sir!' exclaimed the little doctor, in a trembling way, 'do you know what you have got in your house?'

"Horrid visions of his Mary in typhus fever—in small-pox—a lunatic—flashed like lightning across Charles's mind.

"'What—what?' he gasped out.

"'Mell Murder!'

"'Mell what?'

"'The old hag to whom the boys in the town have given that title, for her strange association with every death that has occurred in this unhappy house since the departure of your uncle's. The very worst suspicions cleave to her. For mercy's sake, Mr. Annesley, get rid of this old wretch before you are an hour older!'

"Charles stood aghast. 'Is it—possible that—' 'I know not what is possible; but it is. Sir—do it,' said the anger apothecary; and Charles, infected with his earnestness, promised compliance.

"That night Mary dismissed, and Charles undertaking her patients with her, as though her work were done.

"'Touched and took!' was Charlotte's benediction, looking back and shaking her finger as she passed the threshold.

"Let me pass quickly over these sad details. The young wife was indeed doomed. Drooping gradually, like the preceding victims, she slowly but certainly followed them to the same bourne.

"Annesley would have left the house, but nothing could induce Mary to consent. His uncle would be vexed; would think them careless, ungrateful. Poor, just this was a fatal mistake. Annesley, long since filled, and abandoned as a place of interment. Over and between three or four noble expanses, that shadowed many a mighty dead, might be seen the broad sward, green with sprouting corn; then a range of blue hills, on the last of which lingered the westering sun.

"Half an hour later Charles was returning home. When within a few paces of his own door a loud ringing shriek struck him like a stab! In a moment he was in the house, and dashed into the room from the direction of which he had fancied the cry proceeded.

"His wife was on the bed, frightfully convulsed adduced, the prisoner, on the very day of poor Mary's funeral, was restored to liberty, and immediately disappeared.

"It was now imagined that the house would be finally closed. The next-door neighbor on one side had already quitted; be on the other had given notice. Mr. Archbold himself felt his mind infected by the prevailing superstition; and, moreover, seeing the cause of misunderstanding removed, was ready enough to give indulgence to his returning tenants toward no hope, to whom he accordingly wrote, desiring them to quit without delay the scene of his bereavement, and resume the place he had formerly held in his uncle's home and affection.

"Charles refused.

"He considered that his uncle, in placing them in a house under the notorious ban, had been actuated by the most inconsiderate motives, as he had imagined, and had been even in some degree instrumental in the fatal misfortune that had befallen him. Besides, he had a duty to perform, to which it was his fixed determination to devote every energy he possessed—nay, if needful, life itself. He would find out the mystery of the haunted house. And no knight, in quest of the holy grail, ever started on the doubtful, but splendid, resolved purpose than Charles, when he entered the long-deserted house.

"Suddenly a sound struck his ear—it was like a distant footstep somewhere within the house. The door of the room in which he sat was wide open, and presently he was aware of a slow soft step ascending the stair.

"To say that Charles's heart did not accelerate its usual pace, or that a pulse or two would be to deny a feeling that might have so far assailed the most collected. Added to that the bold resolution he had formed was about to be met half-way. That the mysterious Horror of the House was actually approaching him in the shape of a human being—a listener with an appalling sense of being suddenly called upon to deal with what one can not comprehend. Charles involuntarily grasped the velvet arms of his chair, and half rising, slowly turned his face to the door, where the step had halted.

"There stood old Charlotte!

"His fear melted into rage.

"'Wretched hag! accursed murderess!' he exclaimed, forgetting for the moment his own doubts of her guilt—'dare you—'

"'Charlotte, Charlotte,' said the old woman, walking up to him, 'it is you who should not dare. I warned you—I warned your mother—I warned Mrs. Caldecde—I warned every one of you, young and old, of the danger hidden in this fearful house. But I loved and served them all when they would not see me, and so can the same risk with them. For reward, you have put me murderer's mark on me. I am known as Mary, Mell Murder, the poisoning witch. My life is nothing; they might as well have hanged me. I hoped they would, for the Lord keeps justice for the innocent; and He knows that I never willingly harmed a living creature. They were all touched and took, poor dears! but not by me. I know you are come back to find out who killed your darling, and old Charlotte's come to help you.'

"'You!'

"'Like enough in some things,' said the old woman shrewdly. 'You've no more patience in life—no more have I. You've one object—mine's the same, only my reason's the best. Find out what you want, you can't know it too dead. But I wear Cain's black brand, and that's an ugly mark to die in I won't, if I can help it.'

"Charles looked looking at him with an amazement he did not care to hide; something in the woman's shrewd speech inspired confidence, though despite himself. His thoughts held a rapid council: if the hag were guilty, and were really a prey to that fearful fear of mania which could not account for such cruel crimes, he had no fear for himself, and might even, by examination and analysis, obtain some clue to their alleged practice. If she were innocent, she might afford him important aid in his investigations. Some action must be absolutely required. In fine, he acceded to her proposal, and directed her to take up her residence in the house as a lodger.

"A feeling he could not well define determined Charles to sleep that night in the Angel-chamber. It was there that his Mary had experienced the first mysterious visitation—there, on his bosom, breathed her last gentle sigh.

"He had his bed-room, though with little hope of rest, he could not resist uttering a fervent prayer that he might be allowed to witness reveal itself to him; also—no matter with what peril accompanied —so that he might but analyze its fearful features, and purge its destroying power.

"His desire was fulfilled. It must have been about two o'clock when Charles woke, with a start, under the impression that a hand had been laid upon his face. But such a hand! It could have belonged to no living human thing. Recalling to his senses, it was like that of a putrid corpse. His mouth, his nose, his eyes, his throat, were choked and smarting with some foetid salve. His whole frame went irregularly—his very soul sickened within him!

"Annesley was a man of cool, intrepid nature, and the strongest nerves. Despite his confusion, he rose and wrestled with the terror, as if it were a living foe that had nearly mastered him—a moment, and the victory was won. Slowly and regularly, as though baffled in its assault, the horrible fear, whose presences he had almost felt, relaxed its hold and quitted him. Charles in-stinctly staggered forward, as in pursuit, reached the window, and, throwing it up, gazed forth into the calm, cold night.

"'Whence, whence, O Horror?' he gasped.

The next moment, with a countenance deadly white, he reclosed the window, and returned to his bed.

"In that instant the Horror, the Ghost, had revealed itself to him, as he had desired.

"But Charles would have further proof, and witness too.

"The following morning, after pretending to eat some portion of the breakfast he found comfortably prepared for him in the library, Charles summoned old Charlotte to a conference.

"He began by tracing as minutely as possible the history of the later illnesses and deaths, beginning with that of his mother, which event occurred during his absence abroad. In this he received most material assistance from Mr. Mawry, for whom he sent during the morning, and who, after overcoming his astonishment at finding old Charlotte a member of the council, entered with all zeal into the inquiry.

"The result proved that the same extraordinary symptoms had been evolved in every case—namely, severe nervous, semi-cataleptic attacks, prostration of strength, mental depression, decay of the vital powers, and death—Mawry declaring himself utterly unable to account either for the origin of the disease or for the rapidity and certainty with which, once conceived, it hurried the victims to their end.

"On receiving the information he had gathered, Annesley was struck with one singular feature in the case—the predilection evinced by every patient in turn for the Angel-chamber. It seemed a fatal fancy; for, certainly, whatever soothing influence it might exercise on the minds of the invalids, was not reflected in their bodies. On the contrary, every one became rapidly worse, and the mysterious Terror—though its recurrences grew more and more frequent—seemed gradually to lose its intensity, in proportion as physical health declined, till it left the last days of the sufferer wholly undisturbed.

"'Now,' said Charles, as with a deep sigh he raised his pale face from his hands, after a minute's meditation, 'come with me, and I will show you the Horror in the House.'

"He walked, followed by the others, straight to the Angel-room. There it shone, with its regal couch, its superb mirrors, its glowing cabinets, its purple curtains. Charles threw up the window, admitting the soft fresh breeze.

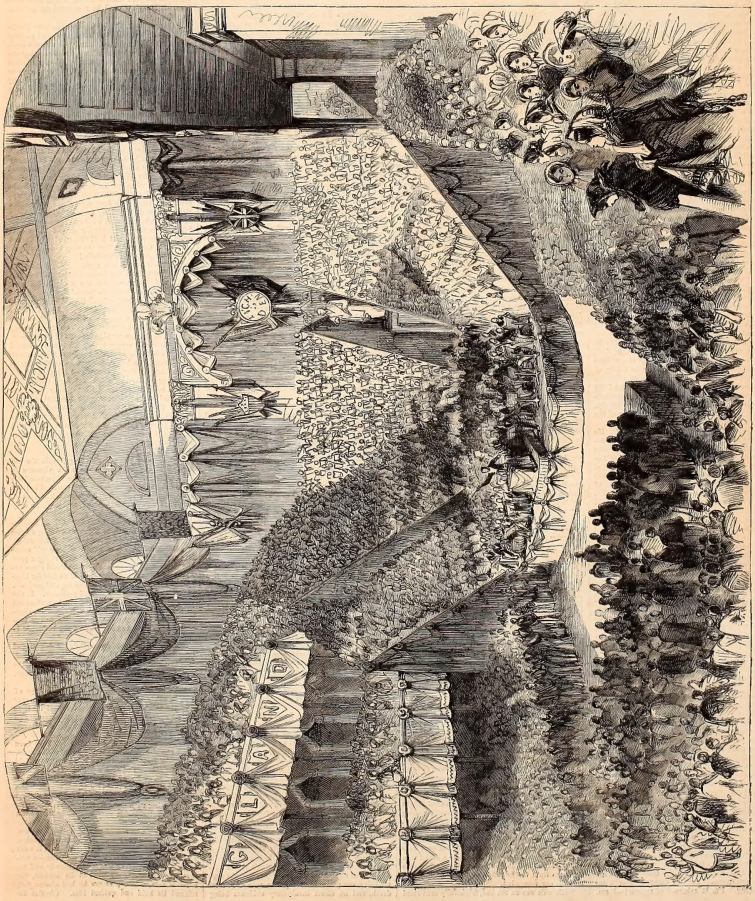
"'Does this,' he asked, 'look like a pestilence palace—a house of pain and death?'

"He struck upon one of the gilded panels as he spoke; it returned a hollow sound, like an echo of the last word, 'death!'

"The next moment Charles caught up a poker from the fire-place and dashed in the panel.

"'Stoop down,' he said to Mawry.

"The latter did so; but started back in horror, as a sickening, loathsome odor pervaded the apartment, as from a newly-opened grave.



"There lay indeed the secret of the Horror. Out of that panel crept the unseen destroyer that had sucked away the breath, the life of no less than five victims.

"From the Angel-chamber, which had been originally intended as a luxurious bath-room, a pipe had been prepared, the other extremity of which had vent in the sloping bank of the adjacent cemetery, long since become one mass of corrupting human clay. Thus this fatal conduit, itself decayed, winding among broken vaults and mouldering mausoleums, gathered up the noxious exhalations, and poured them into the golden room. By what atmospheric changes or movements in the earth the amount of miasma thus transmitted was governed and modified can not of course be known; but that the poison varied greatly in quantity and strength was sufficiently proved by the fact, that attention was never attracted to the vitiated atmosphere of the spacious and seemingly well-ventilated room.

"The panel which concealed the mouth of the pipe was low down—exactly on a level with the head of one sleeping in the Angel-bed, and probably distant from it but three or four feet. An almost imperceptible crevice in the thin panel must have projected that baneful breath into the sleeper's face as certainly, and, as it proved, as fatally, as the 'juice of cursed hebenon' dropped from the phial of the Danish regicide. No marvel that the end was rapid! To turn the face to that wall was indeed to bid adieu to life, its hopes, its troubles, and its cares.

"Those more remarkable symptoms I have had to relate can only be referable to nervous temperament, or to the mysterious trouble acting almost in the nature of disease, until disease was positively engendered.

"When, on the previous night, Charles threw up the window, some slight odor eliminated from the burial-ground, connecting itself with the loathsome sense from which he had just escaped, at once revealed to him the latter's origin."

MUSICAL FESTIVAL GIVEN TO THE PRINCE OF WALES BY THE BOSTON SCHOOL CHILDREN, OCTOBER 18, 1860.—[SEE PAGE 686.]

GRAND BALL GIVEN TO THE PRINCE OF WALES AT THE ACADEMY OF MUSIC, BOSTON, OCTOBER 19, 1860.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE PRINCE OF WALLS' VISIT.

THE BALL AT BOSTON.

ONE readers have seen, on the preceding page, the picture of the grand ball given by the citizens of Boston to the Prince of Wales on 18th October, in the Boston Academy of Music. It was, all are agreed, a triumphant success; as brilliant as the ball at New York, and unmarred by any accident or contretemps. The scene, as depicted by our artist, is thus minutely described by the special correspondent of the Herald:

"Turning toward the entrance of the marquee, and looking up and down the hall, the beauty, the style, the wax sparkling, and each detail only heightened the pleasure of the first impression. The arrangement of the orchestra is that most favorable for fine effect, and the result was all that could be desired. From the centre, which is most richly frescoed and painted in gold and white, hung a large chandelier—an inverted dome of pendulums and glass—glittering and blazing indescribably. This, and chandeliers around the walls, gave sufficient light for a dance on such halls, and brought every detail of the decorations full into view. They are of unusual richness, each of which was differently adorned. Obviously, might be taken to the native of the country, whose hall was mainly gilt and color—and might have found fault with the quantity and lack of simplicity which characterized the affair; but it is certainly every time a beautiful one to those whose taste is not offended—and it is no doubt the most elaborate and costly ball ever given—was accustomed to the bull-room. From the upper room the ground, and those were left undecorated, except by gilded cornices of red, white, and blue flags. The front of this upper tier was covered with a hanging of crimson cloth, edged with blue, and a blue border, draped in festoons and studded with gilt stars, run along the upper part of the lower tier. Each of these boxes was held by a bouquet of natural flowers, from which depended a wreath of flowers, and this, while in a gilt hoop, hung below the balustrade and over the tier below. The second tier was of the most unprecedented cloth, fringed with blue and festooned with crimson and wreaths of flowers, while the pillars which divided them were studded, alternately bearing the Prince of Wales' feather and the letters "A. V. R." and "Albertus," and other Latin inscriptions. Each of these shields was placed upon a blue hanging, with golden stars, and was supported on either side by the British and American flags. The first tier was draped with the royal purple velvet, edged and relieved by gold lace, and so festooned and draped as to form a rich and graceful effect, the gilded flower which adorn the front of this circle. The dancing-floor was slightly raised above the level of the floor-cloth, and was surrounded by a light rope railing, and was completely furnished by white drapery, with blue and orange cloth. Directly opposite the stage, and rising from the first to the second tier, was the royal box—handsomely draped with crimson, fluctefully embroidered with gold lace, and the whole surmounted by a crown of blue and white, with outlines and ornaments in gold. Four seats in front of the box were occupied by the royal party, the retiring

The Grover & Baker
Noiseless
Family Sewing Machine
Is rapidly supplanting all others for family use. The DOUBLE LOCK-STITCH formed by this Machine is found to be the only one which survives the wash-tub on long seams, and, therefore, the only one permanently valuable for Family Sewing.
READ THE FOLLOWING TESTIMONY:
"MR. JEFFERSON DAVIS presents her compliments to Grover & Baker, and takes pleasure in saying that she has used one of their Machines for two years, and finds it still in good order, makes a beautiful stitch, and does easily work of any kind."—Washington, D. C.
"I take pleasure in saying, that the Grover & Baker Sewing Machines have more than sustained my expectation. After trying and returning others, I have three of them in operation in my different places, and, after fairly trial, have no fault to find."—J. H. Hanson, wood, Senator, of South Carolina.
"My wife has had one of Grover & Baker's Family Sewing Machines for some time, and I am satisfied it is one of the best labor-saving machines that has been invented. I take much pleasure in so commending it to the public."—Hon. Wm. Bigler, late Governor of Pennsylvania.
"The Grover & Baker Sewing Machine has given entire satisfaction to my family. My negro clothes were made with it last fall, and again this spring, and the clothes for winter are now being made with it. The seams, always, double, durable, etc., were used for the clothes. It has been used on many fine articles, such as collars, etc., for family wear, and is perfectly satisfied with it, and would not be deprived of its use for three times the cost of it."—Hon. Alfred Iverson, Macon, Ga.
"On the recommendation of a friend, I procured, some months since, one of your Grover & Baker Sewing Machines. My family has been most successful in its use from the start, without any trouble or difficulty whatever in its management. My wife says it is a 'family blessing,' and could not be induced to dispense with it. I regard it as the best and I most heartily concur."—James Pollock, Ex-Governor of Pennsylvania.

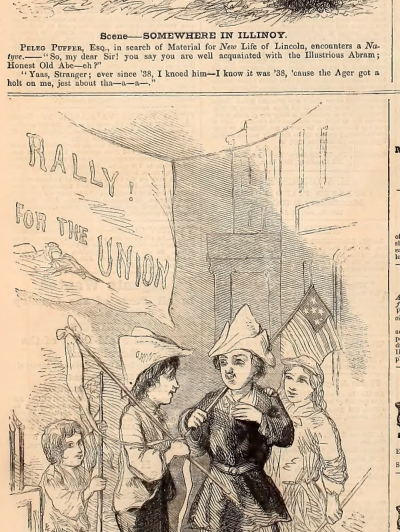
AGER vs. INFORMATION.



Scene—SOMEWHERE IN ILLINOY.

PELEG PUFFER, Esq., in search of Material for New Life of Lincoln, encounters a Native.—"So, my dear Sir! you say you are well acquainted with the Illustrious Abram; Honest Old Abe—eh?"

"YAAS, STRANGER; ever since '38, I knoed him—I know it was '38, 'cause the Ager got a hole on me, jest about tha—a—s—."

Mr. PUFFER at this moment is horrified to find that, while taking Notes, his friend and informant has assumed a very peculiar form and action—scratching gravel, and kicking up a dust generally. Looking like a small thunder-cloud, out of which issued, "For Mercy's s-a-ake, Stranger! w-wait t-t-ill I -git th-through this Ager Shake, a-an I'll t-tell you all a-a-bout it!" PELEG sloped for higher ground, satisfied that Illinoy Earthquakes interfere fearfully with information on matters and things generally.

VISIT OF THE PRINCE OF WALES.

OUR CONCLUDING PICTURES.

WE terminate our series of pictures of the tour of the Prince of Wales through the United States this week. The reader will find on page 692 THE GROUP OF THE PRINCE AND HIS SUITE from Brady's photograph; on pages 696 and 697 a fine picture of THE PRINCE'S EMBARKATION ON BOARD THE "HERO," IN THE BAY OF PORTLAND; on page 700 a picture of THE CITY OF PORTLAND; and on this page a view of THE ROYAL SQUADRON PASSING FORT PREBLE on their homeward voyage.

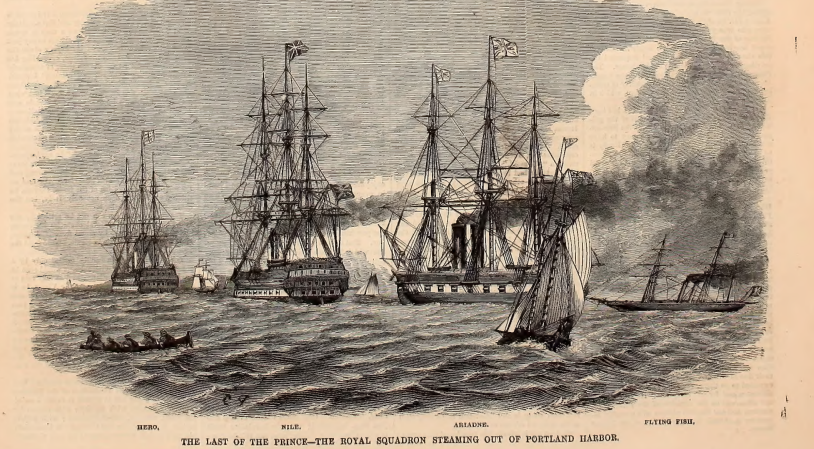
The Prince reached Portland in the afternoon of Saturday, 20th. It was a fine day, but cold; and the movement of the Prince's party being retarded by the procession, he is reported to have exclaimed, "Hurry!—I'm cold!" After a brief interchange of compliments with the local authorities he hastened to the wharf, shook hands with a few of the officials who had accompanied him, and jumped into the Hero's barge. The Herald correspondent describes the scene which ensued:

"As the royal barge left the wharf the British squadron all fired a royal salute of twenty-one guns, and similar salutes were fired from the city and from Fort Preble.

"The harbor was full of steamers, sail-boats, barges, etc., which accompanied the royal barge from the wharf, the latter being surrounded by boats from the royal squadron filled with British officers. There was a fresh easterly breeze blowing, and the water in the harbor was quite rough, so that the steam vessels moved quite slowly. As the flotilla neared the squadron, against the yards were manned, and this, with the strings of flags and flags flying from every point of the fleet, formed a magnificent spectacle, which was witnessed by an immense concourse of people, assembled on Mount Joy, the various piers, and every accessible place of observation.

"As the royal party passed the various vessels of the squadron the Prince was received with repeated cheers; and when he reached the Hero, at ten minutes before four, the royal standard was run up to the 'main,' and another salute fired by all the fleet."

This is the moment which our artist has selected as the subject of his large picture. The squadron sailed at 4 P.M. The Hero led, and was followed by the Nile, the Ariadne, the Flying Fish, and the Styx. The bands on board each vessel played "Yankee Doodle," and Fort Preble saluted the party with farewell guns as they passed. On shore thousands of Americans cheered and waved their handkerchiefs, and not a few fair eyes grew dim as they wished the young Prince good-by, and a fair voyage home!



THE PRINCE OF WALES' NEWFOUNDLAND DOG.

The Tribune correspondent thus describes the scene:

"The departure was a finer sight than even the arrival three months ago in the Bay of Halifax. Along the rough shore of Cape Elizabeth groups of farewell gazers were clustered, waving such parting salutations as they could give. To these, even the least of them, the ships responded by the dipping of their colors. As they passed through the narrow channel, plunging and tossing until the waves swept into the lower ports—for the swell was very heavy—the sun, just drooping behind the hills, seemed to throw out over the water its own refulgent beam of farewell, which turned the wet, black hulls into shining gold as it fell upon them. Upon the outermost ledge, beyond the light-house, there were standing two spectators, who sent through the twilight their silent testimonials of adieu. Then the ships receded dimly, losing form at last in the harrowing dusk, until only three motionless dots were seen on the horizon. And this was the ending of the visit of the Prince of Wales."

OUR GROUP OF THE PRINCE AND SUITE AT BRADY'S GALLERY explains itself. The Iron Duke of Newcastle, whose courage and firmness were so finely developed in his discussion with the Orangemen of Canada, stands rather behind the Prince. He was the leader of the party. His opinion prevailed in all cases of doubt—he stood in the room of the sovereign. Nor is there any question of his fitness for so responsible a post. A man of liberal instincts, cultivated intellect, great tact, and indomitable will, he has piloted the Prince safely through a very trying ordeal, without making a mistake or an enemy. The Duke, as his portrait shows, is a tall, stout man, with large, rugged features, and a heavy red beard, sprinkled with gray. The Earl of St. Germans, who is Lord High Steward of the Royal Household, is a gentlemanly-looking man, with gray hair, dandified appearances, and agreeable manners. He was not at all prominent in the tour. General Bruce is the Prince's governor: his functions on the tour through this country seem to have been chiefly confined to disbursing moneys and writing letters which were not important enough for the Duke to sign. He is the brother of the Earl of Elgin, and owes to him his present position and his rank as General in the army, which he has won without ever having seen service. Lord Lyons is the British Ambassador at Washington; a very popular man, who seems to have been as successful in his diplomatic career as his predecessor, Lord Napier. The other members of the suite were Major Teesdale—one of the Kars heroes—and Captain Grey, equerries; Dr. Ackland, the Prince's medical attendant at Oxford; Mr. Jenner, attaché to Lord Lyons; and Mr. Ware, Secretary to the Duke of Newcastle.

THE LAST OF THE PRINCE—THE ROYAL SQUADRON STEAMING OUT OF PORTLAND HARBOR.

THE PRINCE AT BRADY'S GALLERY.

Shortly after the Prince's arrival in New York Mr. Brady was notified of the desire of the royal party to pay a visit to his establishment. The fame of his historical collection of portraits had reached them through various sources, and it was to this, doubtless, that he was indebted for such an honor. In response to the request of the Prince Mr. Brady called upon the suite, had an interview with his Highness and the Duke of Newcastle, and made an appointment for the visit on the following day. It was understood that the visit was to be entirely private; consequently the doors of the establishment were shut, and no one admitted after the entrance of the royal party.

Englishmen of rank, as well as many of the middle-class, are largely interested in the process of photography. The Prince quite astonished Mr. Brady's veteran operator by the extent of his intelligent familiarity with all the details of the process. The royal criticisms upon the subject of back-grounds, poses, and groupings quite startled those skilled and experienced practitioners. The princely theories on these and kindred subjects may have been unsound, but they were pungently expressed, and indicated familiarity with the art. Nearly twenty pictures were taken in all; among them two groups of the entire suite, one single figure of the Prince, one of His Grace the Duke of Newcastle, and one of Earl Saint-Germans. These pictures were taken of His Highness and younger members of the suite, for visiting-cards and stereoscopes.

The visit altogether lasted nearly three hours, a portion of the time having been spent in the inspection of the collection which adorns the gallery. It was remarked that most of the noble-evinced familiarity with the names most prominent in American literature, while the portraits of our distinguished statesmen were comparatively unknown. Washington Irving, Bryant, and Prescott attracted far more attention than Webster, Clay, and Calhoun. Dr. Kane's picture was seen in for a large share of the royal attention and interest.

Among Mr. Brady's rarest and oldest portraits is an admirable one of Lord Brougham, the theft-ex-Chancellor, who recently delighted the public by his lectures to Mr. Dallas; who has, in fact, been distinguishing himself for divers rudenesses and many grand heroic utterances, during the past or two. The grand, rugged, knotty head, the aggressive nose, and the general aspect of fight which distinguish the tough old Lord Chancellor are admirably given, and the picture was from the Prince an enthusiastic expression of surprise and delight.

Probably none among the American experiences of the suite will be remembered with more pleasure than the few hours spent in Mr. Brady's collection. All those who have distinguished themselves in science, literature, statesmanship, and jurisprudence are duly represented in this Valhalla; and in no other way could the noble visitors have so much insight into the life and character of those, now dead, who have so nobly adorned our history.

AMERICAN PORTRAITS FOR THE ROYAL FAMILY.

The Prince and the Duke of Newcastle evinced their interest in American politics and politicians by ordering several copies of Mr. Brady's portraits of the present Senate and House of Representatives, as well as those of the viral distinguished party soliciting the suffrages of the American people.

Of course, as becomes royal and noble visitors, these commissions for pictures of the statesmen group and single portraits taken were profuse and munificent.

MEETING WITH A VETERAN.

Among the pleasant incidents which transpired during the visit was one which will bear narration. Among Mr. Brady's employés is an old veteran man who was present at Buckingham Palace on the day of the Prince's birth. As the suite was about leaving the gallery Mr. Brady mentioned this circumstance to the Duke and requested the privilege of presenting him to the Prince. The Prince very gracefully acquiesced, and the venerable old man thus enjoyed an opportunity of meeting face to face the son of his sovereign, for whom England would have been denied him.

One of the results of the gallery visit has been the crowding to an unpleasant extent of the gallery ever since. The interest felt in the heir-apparent and his retinue seems to be more than assuaged since the royal departure. Mr. Brady is to be congratulated upon having secured so graceful and truthful a memorial of so many notables, to pass into history as among the most notable of royal journeyings.

THE PRINCE'S NEWFOUNDLAND DOG.

The picture of THE PRINCE'S NEWFOUNDLAND DOG was sketched by our artist in the streets of Portland. The animal was being exercised through the streets by two of the Hero's ship-boys, and looked handsome indeed. He almost as great an object of attraction as his master.

THE CITY OF PORTLAND.

The very striking VIEW OF THE CITY OF PORTLAND, MAINE, will remind our readers of the last hurried scenes of the Prince's visit to the United States. Portland, as every body knows, is a flourishing sea-port of Maine, once dependent on Falmouth, but in 1786 incorporated as an independent port with its present name. It is the terminus of St. Lawrence Railway, which was completed six or seven years ago, made Portland the winter seaport of Canada, and raised it to a position of great importance. Its population is now over 20,000; it has a large export and import trade; the Canadian steamers make it the Western terminus of their line in winter. When the Great Eastern was expected to go there, the Portlanders built a magnificent wharf for her reception. Its first importance arises from the occasion of the Prince's departure, and our English visitors will probably remember it as their last recollection of the United States.

VIOLA.—A LOVE STORY.

I SAT one morning before my desk, glancing round the room, gathering in its thoughts. A quaintness of the room was pretty; warm tints and graceful contours, and the windows framed very lovely landscapes. Only Viola, my old friend Viola, sitting opposite me, was called ugly, according to the world's judgment. Coarse features, tawny hair, milk-and-water eyes, and a nose that would have been positively expressionless but for the delicacy of the nostril, that quivered at every emotion. The red lines—not ripples—grew down, down upon her forehead, leaving just room for three horizontal furrows that care had clearly creased from side to side. There was but one redeeming feature—the mouth was inexpressibly sweet; a firm, living mouth, capable of no negative but a positive, vital goodness. My friends say there is nothing within the bounds of our acquaintance so devoid of the impress of Beauty's hand; and they wish to know why I have asked her to spend my evening. I would enjoy having so honorably an object in my view.

"Butterflies! her wings are not so brilliant as yours, but she has a better gift—a heart to feel an honest. 'Like loves like'—and I love her," I reply, laughing.

They call me beautiful, and I am grateful. Perhaps if I possessed less to charm the eye I might look at it lightly, and forget it in the interest of the mind which, despite the theory that our physical frames are mirrors of the inner, is not unfrequently enclosed in a very ugly casket.

Viola was so ugly that when I looked at her I expected nothing; so I was continually surprised and delighted by the revelation of its worth and beauty; as when one is traveling along a dreary plain, suddenly the earth opens, and fertile green valleys nestled among shaggy, sentinel hills. Then she had a voice of most marvelous sweetness, of thrilling power, of deep pathos, which, in the exultant oratorio, or plead in plaintive "Gethsemane," the tones lived long in me as a divine message. She read the poets like I. Shall I say, so do I, shame my previous understanding of them. She had a knot of overlooked, delicate, and tempting in every form; and tell me, now, could she be ugly? It is impossible! Our conversation I have good be changed, for it was full of the enchanting. I must speak to Ruskin about it.

I said I was looking round my room. I was looking at her; and turning to her was impossible nature might read my thoughts, I began:

"Viola, why were you ever born?" You have sapphy talents, appreciation, imagination, power of construction, fits of inspiration; and I believe that, by all means, you should use your fine talents for writing."

The girl raised her honest eyes from the book she was reading, and a look of pain passed over into its habitual look of weariness, sadness, and suffering.

"Pity! there are too many unutterers already. I don't think I am needed, or could do any good in that way."

Quietly she put away her book, put on her bonnet and shawl, and went to her daily toil—the drilling, dulling, deadening toil of schoolkeeping. I said no more, though I knew the drudgery of her half-repulsive work; how long she labored to see not very little progress; how little appreciation that, knowing nothing about the matter, but judging in dog-fashion by what they did know, was forever suggesting that this or that should be lettered. I know that this or that patron was emotionally constituted so that he could only feed too little or too slow; I know, for I had travelled in that path, of the mental prostration which follows a day's duties done in the school-room. I know, what was worst, how it saps the energies and narrows the mind; I know that she, too, saw its results; and bitterly I pitied her. I can even confess when we were rollicking, gay young girls together at school, and she, the plain, light-hearted, winsome, bird-like creature of all that happy band. She was the favorite of Professor B——, and he lavished upon her the treasures of knowledge with such pride in cultivating and displaying her splendid voice; gave her books and music and flowers, and interpreted things all for her pupil, Viola. And—oh! it was the old, sad story again told—she loved him, and he went and married another. She would not see it, and he went and married another. It was a long time before the bird was glad and sang again. She was not unhappy, for she had another. When her friends importuned her to accept some one, when they told her that she was almost an "old maid," she had the calmness to express that she had loved Professor B——, and she could love no other. Laughingly, now she says she is "married to Professor B——."

To-night Viola came in from school with a flushed cheek and a brighter eye than usual. I saw that Sadie Bellamy, my sister, slung up a glove and passed on into her room and closed the door. Something had gone wrong; the old complaint of parent who would dress her as a toy supplied with brains gratis; or perhaps the trustees had notified her that she might leave. "It is a shame!" said both my sister and I. Well, she should have a home with us, and the favor would be all to us. I bade Biddy to make an extra cup of tea, and use all the rest of her skill on some cream toast, and sat down to the piano to fling off my indignation. I played "Fra Diavolo." Presently Viola's hand was upon my shoulder.

"Will you hear well to-night?" I said, without looking up.

"Very well, Carrie."

What made her voice so calm and sweet? I looked up.

"Carrie, I am to marry Professor B——. He has been to see me to-day. You know his wife is dead. He says he loves me."

What a look of happiness! The expression of rest from struggle and desolation and victory such as the deserted orphan only knows.

God, on earth, giveth His trusting children rest.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1860.

THE PRINCE AMONG THE LADIES.

MOST certainly, since there first were young men and young women in Gotham, no one ever created such a flurry among the fair sex as the Prince of Wales. Thousands of young women, of otherwise robust constitution, now live exclusively upon the remembrance of having seen, spoken to, or danced with him. The blessed few who were presented are thrice happy, the envied of their own sex, the delight of the other. In a ninety-five out of a hundred drawing-rooms the Prince is the sole subject of conversation; his appearance, his face, his figure, his eyes, his mouth, his hands, his waist, his walk, his style of dancing, are all topics of intense interest and unflagging importance to the world of crinoline.

It is agreed on all sides that he was delightful. Any lady who found fault with him would probably silence the fate of the Irishman who tried to insult him on his departure, and was promptly and righteously knocked on the head by a bystander. Considering his youth, the opportunities of which he has had, and the fact that the severe trials he underwent, it is certainly remarkable that he should have made not a single mistake, and have left nothing but pleasant recollections behind. Much is doubtless due to the good judgment of the Duke of Newcastle and the other noble lords to whom he was surrounded; but still, the Prince himself must be a youth of rare discretion not to have committed one act at least once by some brave natural to his age.

The most general remark about him appears to bear upon his strikingly gentlemanly demeanor. He seemed every body's idea of the most perfect gentleman they had ever met. Of course one expects a future king to be a gentleman; but really, when one looks at the broadseads about the ancestors of Albert Edward, and especially his grandmuncle, who was known as the First Gentleman in Europe, the genuine gentleness and modesty of the Prince's manner deserve not to be passed over in silence. Our aristocracy, and especially every body of the most perfect gentleman they had ever met. Of generously undertook to represent the citizens of New York on the occasion of the late ball, and to decide who should, and who should not, be admitted into the charmed circle of "the best society," may learn a useful lesson from him. They may learn from him that the first duties, duties of politeness, as the word implies, gentleness, and modesty, and deference to others; not vulgar assumption, and haughty pride, and overweening self-assertion. It is no blame to a man that his father may have been a cobbler, or himself bred a tailor; we can not all be princes. But all of us can and should so demean ourselves as never to displease any one or hurt any one's feelings; and this lesson of deference to the meanest King of England together let us hope profitably—to the aristocracy of the United States.

HOW TO USE YOUR FAMILY NEWSPAPER.

A FAMILY newspaper, if its name imports any thing, ought to be a family affair. All the members of the domestic circle ought to be interested in it, and, indeed, trained to appreciate it as a part of the inner economy of household life. The common practice that limits the use of the newspaper to the parents and grown-up children, deprives the family, as a family, of its benefits. And a wealthful use of every part of all, it should be regarded as a centre around which the intellect of the household should be collected—a family table for daily mental nourishment.

Reading is ordinarily one of our most selfish enjoyments. Men and women who are liberal to a fault in their hospitality, shut up in a private parenthesis—which they are entitled to enjoy. But this is a sort of intellectual hermitage which is incompatible with family culture. Not that we wish to convey the idea that there is to be no private reading and study by individuals for themselves. Every one must have paths in literary fields that are silent to the tread of other footsteps; but in the family, mind and all its forms of action ought to be common. Let the father's, or mother's, zeal as to kindness, sympathy, and love, with their retinue of graceful offices, are to be shared in by all the household. It is a law, however, that is constantly violated. Few families have any intellectual exercise in common. Aside from the familiar topics that constitute the staple chit-chat of the table and the fireside, they have no such thing as family mind, trained every day by contact with the same general truths, facts, incidents. One main reason of this has just been intimated; viz., the insulating habit of private reading. How, now, can this be remedied? There is at least one method that may be adopted with obvious advantage, and it consists in the proper use of a first-rate family newspaper.

Devote an hour each night that you may be able to command to this interesting work. Read aloud such portions of the newspaper as may be suited to your purpose. Require one of the children to explain the geographical allusions; give arithmetical questions to another; get a third to point out bad grammar, and let the eldest explain the rhetoric and historic errors of the best-written articles. The long columns of advertisements will suggest many profitable inquiries. And how will have a machine that will call out their knowledge of themselves as taught in natural philosophy; and there a cargo of Japanese goods, will practice them in the productions of distant climates. One of the great difficulties in really and thoroughly educating a young mind is in exercising its powers in the application of its knowledge.

Nor will the benefit end here. Every family ought to have a family education in the knowledge of the world. It ought to be trained to look out upon the great sea of human life from the snug cove of home. Experience in the world is not to be had by study, nor wisdom, and indeed it often happens that the most learned are previous introduction of the domestic mind to an acquaintance with the realities of existence, and the practical affairs of school. True manly experience presupposes the study of principles, maxims, sentiments; and by them the intellect will have at least got ready for an experimental intercourse with society. Every parent should see to this domestic work. No one will be a better auxiliary to it than a good newspaper.

Apart from these effects, the bare fact that the different members of a family cultivate thought, taste, expression together, must strengthen the ties of domestic sympathy and enlarge the scope and activity of their nature. There is a great need for this sort of breadth in social unions. If the Bible is excepted, what common education influence of the domestic intellect have we? Nothing implies it. In the man who reads the relations between abstract ideas and practical possibilities.

Cavour's address to the Sardinian Parliament is a speech of unequaled simplicity and force. Italy is in that condition which alone can be its weal, honestly, and Cavour does not hesitate to say just what he thinks. Instead of blarneying about the patriotism of Italy in the hope that flattering his own views until he discovered those of somebody else, and taking care not to "commit" himself, he says boldly what he himself thinks. Without the least hesitation he puts upon record just what he thinks, although he does it at the same time of rancorous opposition from the radical Italians.

Cavour's Italian policy is simply consolidation of the United States of Italy. As the people wish, present passivity toward Venetia, and protection of the Pope.

"We do not forget their cause," he says, speaking of the Venetians, "but we think we are serving it most effectually by constituting a strong and united Italy." War with Austria, he says, is the cause of the unanimous opposition of the Great Powers, he thinks, the endanger not only Italy, but the cause of liberty in Europe.

The Roman question can not be settled by the sword, says Cavour. Moral forces alone, and they must be met by moral forces. Besides, there are French soldiers in Rome, and to fight the French is to fight Italy.

The Naples question can be settled only by a united Italy. The Neapolitan national spirit can be fatal to the Southern Italians; and as they rose at the word and in the name of King Victor, he is answerable for their fate. But he will not assume to control it. It shall be determined by the people, as in Tuscany. But this must be done immediately. Naples and Sicily should be formally unorganized until Venice and Rome are in a condition to be ready to kingdom if the question be made permanent in Southern Italy, the cry will no longer be "Italy and Victor Emanuel!" but the mystic cry of sectarianism, "God and the People!"

Cavour says that the "generous patriot" who favored the immediate annexation of the Marches and Umbria ought not to oppose it in the case of Naples; with Naples; with respect for the King, country, and Parliament; with perfect loyalty to the services and character of Garibaldi; but with no less consciousness of his own character

THE LOUNGER.

THE BRAIN OF ITALY.

IT is worth while to turn back to the portrait of Count Cavour which we published last year in the Weekly, to look once more upon a great man, to hear his clear, incisive words of a statesman, for a statesman in a man who not only comprehends principles, but understands how to shape them into policies. It is the man who sees the relations between abstract ideas and practical possibilities.

Cavour's address to the Sardinian Parliament is a speech of unequaled simplicity and force. Italy is in that condition which alone can be its weal, honestly, and Cavour does not hesitate to say just what he thinks. Instead of blarneying about the patriotism of Italy in the hope that flattering his own views until he discovered those of somebody else, and taking care not to "commit" himself, he says boldly what he himself thinks. Without the least hesitation he puts upon record just what he thinks, although he does it at the same time of rancorous opposition from the radical Italians.

Cavour's Italian policy is simply consolidation of the United States of Italy. As the people wish, present passivity toward Venetia, and protection of the Pope.

"We do not forget their cause," he says, speaking of the Venetians, "but we think we are serving it most effectually by constituting a strong and united Italy." War with Austria, he says, is the cause of the unanimous opposition of the Great Powers, he thinks, the endanger not only Italy, but the cause of liberty in Europe.

The Roman question can not be settled by the sword, says Cavour. Moral forces alone, and they must be met by moral forces. Besides, there are French soldiers in Rome, and to fight the French is to fight Italy.

The Naples question can be settled only by a united Italy. The Neapolitan national spirit can be fatal to the Southern Italians; and as they rose at the word and in the name of King Victor, he is answerable for their fate. But he will not assume to control it. It shall be determined by the people, as in Tuscany. But this must be done immediately. Naples and Sicily should be formally unorganized until Venice and Rome are in a condition to be ready to kingdom if the question be made permanent in Southern Italy, the cry will no longer be "Italy and Victor Emanuel!" but the mystic cry of sectarianism, "God and the People!"

Cavour says that the "generous patriot" who favored the immediate annexation of the Marches and Umbria ought not to oppose it in the case of Naples; with Naples; with respect for the King, country, and Parliament; with perfect loyalty to the services and character of Garibaldi; but with no less consciousness of his own character and position, Cavour concludes in a strain from which all liberal and truly Christian minds have a lesson. When Italy has such a head and heart as Cavour, and such a hand and heart as Garibaldi, who shall despair?

"The vote of confidence you gave the ministers, a few months since, enabled them to overcome difficulties, both numerous and serious, which stood in their way. Now that they may hold with a steady hand the helm of the State, it is necessary that they should know, and that Italy should know, whether their deeds and behavior during this interval were of a nature to diminish the confidence you put in them.

"This is all the more necessary, as a vote justly dear to the multitude expressed to the crown and the country its distrust of us.

"Such a declaration, indeed, painfully affected us; but it could not turn us by a little from our purpose.

"Faithful guardians of the Constitution, of which we must be the most scrupulous executors, we think that the voice of our citizens, whatever signal service he may have rendered to the country, should not prevail against the authority of the supreme law of the State.

"It, therefore, is the duty of the ministers of a Constitutional King not to give way before pretensions so illegal, even if they be backed by a splendid halo of popularity and by a victorious sword.

"But we would fail in our duty by giving way to those pretensions, so we should have failed in our obligation toward Parliament if we had not put the question as to whether it be ready to sanction the sentence pronounced against us."

HOWE NOT TO DO IT.

PATIENCE PARSONS has written a letter to the Lowell (mass.) Mr. Howe's patient. Can nothing be done? she asks. Will he insist upon a prolongation of his patient?

"His Mr. Howe to herself of mercy—not a howl! Can he not be satisfied with half a million of dollars, the blessings of all women? He is decidedly the greatest benefactor of women that the world has ever produced. He will hold that position until some backer more skill invent an automatic housemaid, which, at a moment's notice, will start out from its resting-place, kindle the fire, boil the tea-kettle, toast the bread, boil the eggs, and perform the multitudinous duties of cook and chambermaid. Until that blessed invention appears, Mr. Howe's name will be ever coupled with thanksgivings. Will he return these to-night, coupled with the 'almighty dollar'?

"Can he return the suffering wives, mothers, and sisterstoo, throughout the length and breadth of this land, do anything to alleviate their woe? Will he restore liberties in their behalf? I greatly fear I commit a grievous sin, and covet my neighbor's wedding-garment.

Patience Parsons should remember that to ask Mr. Howe to contribute a million or half a million dollars to relieve suffering people is to make an appeal which would hardly be a match for the probable response. We have no right to require of any individual that he should give what we would not expect of every body. But we may all justly wish that the Patent Laws might be so arranged that what is a man has been unsufficiently paid he should not continue to be paid. In other words, we have a right to wish—have we not?—that the renewal of patent rights should depend upon and upon the profits already made by the patentee. The patent rights only the price which the public pays him for the use of his talent: and the public must determine what it is worth, and how the price shall be paid.

THE MORAL HISTORY OF WOMEN.

THE translator of Michelet's "Love" and "Woman" has translated, also, Legouvé's "Moral History of Women." This work comprises a course of lectures delivered at the College of France a dozen years ago, and it is not to be confounded with the Women question. It is extremely interesting; full of anecdote and curious erudition; and it succeeds in investing a grave discussion with great popular charms.

It calls itself a History of Women, but it is more precisely a history of French women, as every woman under the conditions of French civilization; and the results of the discussion each question in that country as only lost and judicious discussions, will be surprised to find with what a simple directness it has been handled elsewhere. The author of John Stuart Mill, in the Westminster, and this work of Legouvé's, a college course of lectures in France, show a coincidence of respectability of opinion upon the part of the public which we have not yet reached. But the time is coming, in other ways, and upon other subjects, which are forbidden in those countries. Only as we profess to tolerate discussion of every subject our shame is greater when we sneer at any opinion than that of countries which do not pretend to the grace of toleration.

Mr. Lubbock has made an excellent, a racy, and faithful translation of a valuable and timely and fascinating book. It is not merely speculative. Legouvé makes practical suggestions to women which will be useful every where; even in this country. Although the learned pundit seems to since gravely announced, after a display of ignorance which prepared the reader's mind to estimate his opinion at its proper value, "The condition of women in this country is about as good as it can ever hope to be."

Where?

What a pity! Because nobody pretends that our conditions are so good as it can be while there is a chance that, by any means, it may be made better. If Legouvé had not written his lectures before that remark was made, he would certainly have given it a place among the curious proofs of the position that much remains to be done.

Legouvé's idea of the tragedy of Jeddo, which Rachel would not play, but which has been the great triumph of Ristori, and, as many think, of Miss Heron.

WHAT H.R.H. SAW.

THE London Times thinks that the Prince's visit to this country will be extremely useful. Grandest: but why? Because, says John Bull's newspaper—because he will see English institutions divested of the wise checks of monarchy against political corruption. That is good. William Hogarth, of whom Mr. Sala is writing in the Cornhill, would think it good. Mr. Hogarth drew a picture once of Chairing the Member; and many English authors have described for us the sweet absence of political corruption in England.

It is well understood that John frowns upon every kind of political bribery; but yet what does the Times mean? The reception of the Prince in New York or in an intelligent forested of the wise check of monarchy—namely, a standing army. The militia, the constitutional substitute for a monarchical check, for it was composed of the people who constitute the government. H.R.H. saw by same institutions that he was at home, as he was pleased, and he saw that they secured the same liberty without a single excuse.

H.R.H. himself is one of the monarchical checks, and a very costly one, H.R.H. saw that an R.P.P. was a very much less expensive luxury than himself. The Duke and the Earl and the Lords must have seen the same thing. They may have thought more than they said. They may have seen the "institutions" tried as by fire—tried with a force which in England would come near to blood, as it has before; and they may have taken their hosts, to which may all kind breezes waft them! they will learn that the wisest "check upon anarchy" is that principle of government which secures prosperity to the great mass of a people.

THE LECTURE IN GREAT BRITAIN.

We might as well surrender. We must confess that Americans spit. Mrs. Trollope said so a quarter of a century ago—and now Mr. Grant Thorburn says so—and he ought to know. Mr. Grant-ley Berkeley came last year and hunted at the West, and hunted at Cincinnati, St. Louis, and complained that he was not allowed to take his dogs gratis in the cars, and was generally unhappy. He has now returned to his home, and has delivered a lecture in Glasgow.

"The West-end" was present, in great force. The Lord Provost presided. The eloquent lecturer said that he had no wish to disparage the magnificent country. . . . Mr. Grantley Berkeley did not wish to disparage America; but the ladies' dresses in railway carriages in America are five feet high in obsequious. Mr. Grantley Berkeley had no desire to speak ill, but justice compels him to mention that the ballot is a curse to America. Also, modesty is grossly outraged in the United States, unless he is accompanied by a man in black. Also, the whole country is horribly democratic. Also, on his arrival had been mentioned in the papers, and the excitement was such that twenty-four people stood upon the railway platform to look at him on Philadelphia. Also, he should never forget the grandeur of the scene as he "came up with" eleven dozen upon the line.

The political condition of this country, Mr. Grantley Berkeley told the Glasgow "West-end," was "the end" of Glasgow, is frightful. But then, considering that Mr. Grantley Berkeley was in the English Parliament during the Reform Bill, that is natural again. There are some misfortunes that even America escapes. "Of Mr. Grantley Berkeley," says William Higgins, "I scarcely know any thing. . . . I had belaid something of his appearance in Parliament, but his efforts as legislation are never recorded to put on record of the House."

This is the Mr. Berkeley of whose novel, "Berkeley Castle," Thackeray wrote a parody in which the view twenty-four years ago in Fraser's Magazine. Soon after its appearance Mr. Berkeley and his brother Cavendish fought a duel in Hyde Park. There was no one in but that gentleman. Brother Craven stood guard at the door while brother Cavendish received with a bullet upon his bridle handle. Finding Mr. Fraser alone, brother Grantley struck him with his fist upon the temple, and knocked him down; he then beat him senseless with the whip-stock, and then mangled him with the bar, which terrible weapon he wrenched out of the hands of a crowd outside at bay, and called to brother Grantley, "I—a—him; give it him well." The attack was fatal to Mr. Fraser, and Mr. Berkeley, and Mr. Magion, the editor of the Magazine and the author of the article, and Grantley Berkeley, . . . on the eve of his account of the whole affair afterward, and it is a curious peep into the domestic revelations of parliament. "Mr. Berkeley spoke as "I wish the intelligent and independent electors of West Gloucestershire joy of their representative." So we wish Mr. Grantley Berkeley and the "Lord Provost" of Glasgow joy of their lecturer.

RAILROAD RHYME.

No. 2.

As late I hied me to the Berkshire Hills,
Rumbling and grumbling o'er disjointed "ties,"
A crash of criminals, . . . and then a pause.
With sudden glamour all the darkness thrills;
Beside me towers a radiant angel, this
The fair ci-devant of a rout's disguise—
A Jove in petticoats, a Venus in curls!
Witches the air: birds sing—while dance the Pills.
I speak her fair: she answers me curtsies at me.
"What pre-existence had we shared before?"
Eyes look through eyes—one mind sits then and there;
And now my spirit has no more, never more
Sit, Mr. Lounger, thou our happy stars!
And rail no more, Sir, at our matchless railroad cars!

HOPKINSONIUS.

TWO LOST SONNETS.

I WAS lately looking into a small volume to verify a quotation, and as I laid it down could not help moralizing a little upon the fate of the book. It is twenty-one years since it was published, and I suppose it is long since out of print. It is very small, and contains three essays upon "Epic Poetry," "Shakespeare," and "Hamlet," followed by poems. The essays are exquisitely simple and lucid in style, and are subtle and vigorous in thought. The poems, especially the sonnets, are remarkable. Indeed there are two sonnets which are among the very best of this form of verse. Certainly none so good have been written in America. Let it therefore console the author of the last book of rhymes, which is already slipping into oblivion, that his chaff is dignified by the society whose fate it shares. Let no American poet grumble at the coldness of the public when he knows that two such sonnets as follow have neither made a name for their author nor saved his book from forgetfulness.

NATURE.

The bubbling brook doth leap when I come by,
Because my feet find measure with its call:
The birds more blithely chant the thing I love;
For I am known to them both great and small:
The flower doth spring where I set down my foot,
Expects me there when spring its bloom has given;
And always a tree and bush my wandering knows,
And e'en the clouds and silent stars of heaven:
For he who with his Maker walks aright,
Shall be their lord as Adam was before:
His ear shall catch each sound with new delight,
His sight each object more than then he saw;
And he, as when erect in soul he stood,
Hear from his Father's lips the law that all is good.

TO THE CANARY BIRD.

I can not hear thy voice with others' ears,
Who doubt not why thou singest or what part
And in thy tale of blighted hopes and fears
Feel not that every note is born with pain.
And that with thy delicious gentle well
Past days of joy should through thy memory throng,
And each to thee their wrath of sorrow tell
While ravished sense forgets them in thy song;
The heart that on thy music feeds
And pours in human words its thoughts divine,
Though it with thee in song exceeds
In song may charm the listening ear like thine,
And men with gilded cage and praise will try
To make the bard, like thee, forget his native sky.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A MODEL HUSBAND.

I KNEW a model husband—in a dream.
Where should I meet with one but when they seem;
A mural man, to decipher to it known;
The kind he never was, and never more can be;
And for the fool—I care the husband was.
Still, still I see him in the summer at the gate,
While his wife waited, and he could not speak one coin
Or bitter word, though nothing but the truth
For dinner was at three, and it was three,
He didn't swear to find a button gone.

A country justice of the peace, when sequest of seventy years of age, married a girl about nineteen; and being well aware that he was likely to be called on the subject, he resolved to be beforehand with his neighbors, when any of the intimate friends called upon him, after the first salutations were passed, he would say, "Well, you have come to wish me joy on being believed he could tell them news. "Why," says he, "I have married one of my master's daughter." If he was asked why he did so, the old gentleman replied, "Why I'll tell you another story. I was very much grieved at the thought the daughter might put me her party gone to sea."

The following notice, written on the door of a village school-house, would seem to indicate that the "schoolmaster is abroad:" "Ladies and gentlemen will please knock before they enter."

A celebrated author says that in sleep we are especially open to heavenly influences. How about the nightmare?

There is a man in Jermyn Street so knowing that the men who don't know their own minds come to him for information on the subject.

Beauty, like bakers, will spoil in time; kisses, like tea, will melt; wine will turn sour, and love is easy a bubble, bright, beautiful in the light of fancy—touched by the sharp reality of life it is no more. Friendship only is the hour: despair, the suicide's excuse; money, the god whose worship, though in fear of calling, will not die. Life as possible, and soon out of the fashion; pride, an exploded ridiculous folly.

A brilliant young gentleman remarked, the other day, to a lady with whom he was bowling ten-pins,

"I beg your pardon, I fear you would have made a capital baker."

"Indeed, Sir! Why?"

"Because you make such excellent rolls."

An Indian and white man were passing along a street, when the former observed a large pile of wigs, and pointing to the owner, who was standing in the doorway, said, "Ugh! him got plenty scalps here—like many ugly!"

CROTCHET CONVERSATION.—What carpenter's tool represents a soothsayer? An augur (augur).—What word signifies strong drink, and a young lady? A miss.—What plaything may be deemed above every other? A top.—What is dark, and yet not without colour, is ever welcome? A clerk.—What is that, although only four inches broad and three inches deep, sometimes contains a cold foot? A shoe.—When is a bonnet not a bonnet? When it becomes a cap.—What is that which we all take any questions, but requires many answers? The street-door.

Professor Jones had a peculiarly red nose; he red, indeed, that it was usually noticed in the dense interior of the temple was dedicated to Bacchus. Upon this point the Professor very properly remarked, One day a discussion propelled by some invisible hand, was hurled across the lecture-room, and was evidently in motion when the learned gentlemen's bald pate that, glancing off, it upon almost to the ceiling. "Down!" thundered out the Professor, "that was you, Sir; I know it, Sir; don't deny it, Sir; I'll not be insulted in this way, Sir; I'll not be insulted by a set of cowards, Sir; I'll not be—" "Stop!" repeated the Professor, "your nose is as red as beet." "Nose!" said the student, "I thought it was a rose-bud, and I'll only the richer for it, Sir, perhaps you looked at me over your nose."

A distinguished author was recently overtaken in a shower, and ran for shelter into a portico at the Westend. A young and beautiful lady, who was at the patio window, without looking attentively at the face of the author, waved a note out with an umbrella. The next day the delighted author received a billet-doux, in the last round of the prideous of what was becoming; and as the umbrella was an old one, and it took a long time to get through the crowd, the gentlest taste, called on the lady to return her battering ram. She received the author with evidently wishing remarking the change, and after listening with curious gravity to the many complimentary terms of the distinguished acknowledgments, she suddenly comprehended that he was not the gentleman who had been enamored of him; and forthwith warmly explained, to be had stood in the way of an accidental visit from her intended, who wished to come and see her unobserved, she had sent him the umbrella to get him up her front door!

A cockney conducted two ladies to the observatory to see an eclipse of the moon. They were too late; the eclipse was over, and the ladies were disappointed. "Oh!" exclaimed our hero, "don't fret. I know the astronomer very well; he is a very polite man, and I am sure he will begin again."

He must be a strong general who can storm and carry a fortress.

A NEVER THAW.—A correspondent of a French paper recently encountered an old woman leaning by a bank of snow. Kindly clasps on her arm; he inquired her calling. She said she was a Marchande des Irresistibles. Her profession was to blow the nose of the old lavolid cotillon who had no sense. She would scarcely make a living this fine weather, and was longing for November, which would bring catarrh in its train. Then the price a morning rose, and blows bursts of nose.

BUSHE SURLETT.—A country girl, who had lived in a small farm-house where bells were unknown, was sent to a neighboring gentleman's family. The bell was rung to give a signal for the servants to come to their meals. "Never the bell: don't you know when it is time to eat?" inquired the girl: "if her mistress was any don't her butter."

A negro being caught stealing from a hen-roost, excused himself by saying, "But his only reason he do so was for children, you must all dat, massa."

"Dear Laura, when we were young, you were ever dear to me; but now you're my wife, and I am paying your bills, you make me dearer and dearer still."

A short time ago a man became so completely "wrapped in thought" that he was tied up, labeled, and set off on the "train of ideas."

Before the days of toothshaker a neighbor of Mr. Bisbee's saw that gentleman at an early hour of the day crawling slowly homeward with his hands and knees over the fence ground. "Why don't you get up, Mr. Bisbee? why don't you get up and walk?" said his neighbor. "I've—swall-lo-lo-bot it's so mighty thin here that I'm afraid I shall go through through!"

An Irishman discovered a part of the wood-work of a chimney-piece on fire, that endangered the whole house. He rushed to the room, and, in his hurry, did not observe the intelligent. Down he rushed with him. A large kettle of water was in the fire. "Well, what's to be put out the fire?" "I can't, faix!" "Why, you fool! put the water out." "Sure, it's hot water, Sure!"

Tall gentlemen are always enemyful, because the ladies are all in favor of hy-men.

The habit of drinking can be cured by giving the drinkers all the liquor they want to drink all the time. A friend of two in our own experience who were cured in three weeks. One was pressed out by a mangle, and the other a cartoonist into his head. The other didn't get up one morning, and now now a cartoons growing over his head in the grave-yard.

"Why is the letter D like a rim?" said a young lady to her sweetheart, as they were promenading. "Because it surrounds an inch a ribustion, was as dull as a hammer. "Because it's in the middle of end," was the reply. "Because it's sure at the other end of the room," because we can't be sad without it."

"I, Mr. Tribb's a slow man that you never associate with him."

"Mr. Tibbs, my love, is as slow as the clock in the Court of Chancery, which takes an hour and twenty minutes to strike one."

"The boy at the head of the class will state what even the Queen of England is the world." Boy hesitates. "Dear, Master Jones, can you tell me what the dark ages were?" "I guess they were the ages before spectacles were invented."

"Wife, bring me some cold beef," said a shiftless husband, the other day. "Why, husband, I have served that up once more hungry than ever."

"There is no beef in the house," was the mild reply. "Fetch me some pork, then."

"No pork, either."

"Well, then, let me have some potatoes."

"Not a potato in the house."

"Thunder and lightning! get some bread, then."

"Not a crust in all the house."

"Well, then, give me a knife and fork, and let me go through the country!"

At a late military dinner one of the visitors proposed a toast, "May the man who has not lost one eye in the service of his country have courage to address with his own!" But the person whose duty it was to read the toast, by omitting the word not, completely changed the sense of the sentiment, and caused much merriment by the blunder.

GERMANS EUROPEAN.—It being reported that Lady Caroline Lamb was dead, a gentleman who had attended down one of her boys with a stout old poet Moore. "Oh, no, Sir," said the boy, "she's not dead, but she's very ill." On finding the nurse would for a literary lady then to stroke down a page. "Oh, I would rather," replied her bridship, "see a man than a woman, for he has never a pen behind."

IRISH TEMPERANCE.—A gentleman from Ireland, on entering a London tavern, saw a countryman of his, a Tipperary man, standing over his glass, when the following occurred. "Blood and 'ounds! my dear fellow," said he, "what are you doing here?" For the honor of Tipperary, I'll be after sitting over half a pint of wine in a house like this." "Sure, you're not in a public-house, are you?" he replied: "it's the seventh I have had, and every one in the house knows it."

How to destroy. One of these days he may be polite and return your bow.

How to make people acknowledge the corn. Tread on their toes.

Why is Berlin the most dissipated city in Europe?—Because it is always on the spree.

Our commercial affairs are all is queer, but he who asks may question is the parlor.

Laughing after dinner is a better stomachic to promote certain than Cognac, Champagne, or Curaçoa.

Why are all games of chess of equal duration?—Because it always takes four knights to play a game.

The first symptoms of love in the wheat of the world's progress were certainly very remarkable. "Love," says Burke, "my shoulder to her shoulder, and my head to hers." "Love," says Legouvé, "is a mutual gift." "Love is a fact, a sudden sting in my shoulder, like the biting of a gnat." "Love is a fever two days after, and a continual itching crept into my heart."

As old grub, in the city of Glasgow, who discounted bill and never dropped by saying "I promise to pay," and signed back securities, in the stage of indecision, was applied to for a loan, and said he would be glad to oblige one old Scotsman required additional security. The friend, who little cared for a signature of the kind, flew into a violent rage.

"Security, Sir! I'll give you the devil for security!"

"Well, well," replied the cautious old banker, "just bring him forward; and as I never have seen the gentleman, get two others to join in the note that he may bring, and we'll get the sitter."

We lately picked up the following memoranda, which we are dropped by a young lady attired in an elegant velvet tuba, an exhibition of which, with exaggerated fashionable novelty brilliant silk dress, with exaggerated fashionable novelty brilliant silk dress, with exaggerated flounces: "A must get a Vail, Sarkind, Glove, Iloven Hose, Satin Shymezett, Kahoe."

"I feel," said an old lady, "that I've got about through with my world. I don't enjoy much more trouble, nor suffer much more comfort."

Though we have no positive evidence of the fact, it is almost certain that Shakspeare was a broker, no one having furnished more stock quotations than he.

OUR RECENT VISITORS, THE PRINCE OF WALES AND SUITE—AT BRADY'S GALLERY, NEW YORK.—[SEE PAGE 689.]

FATHER GAVAZZI PREACHING AT THE PLACE DEI CROCIFIERI, AT MESSINA.

GAVAZZI PREACHING IN SICILY.

ALMOST all of our readers, we presume, have heard of Gavazzi, the famous Italian preacher who was with Garibaldi at Rome, and who subsequently traveled through this country preaching a crusade against the Pope. He is now in Sicily, preaching again, but this time to his countrymen, freed from oppression, and emancipated from theocratic tyranny. We present a picture of the scene.

What changes in a few years! Only ten years ago, Gavazzi, preaching against the Pope in St. Andrew's Church, Quebec, was assailed by a band of Irishmen, and would have been killed but for the protection of some Protestant gentlemen who gathered to defend him. The same Gavazzi, in whom time has not weakened his hatred of the Papacy, is still preaching against the Pope—but this time in Italy; and Irishmen, who had volunteered to maintain the Papal despotism, are prisoners at Ancona, vainly begging the protection of the British Government.

FARISTAN AND FATIMA.

AN ORIENTAL LEGEND.

DONE INTO HIS MOTHER-TONGUE BY E. A. BOWRING.

PART I.

Once in a famous Eastern city
There lived a tailor with a pretty,
In fact a very pretty wife,
Whom he loved better than his life.
Her eyes were of the blackest sort,
No lily's stem was half so slender,
Of finest silk her hair seemed wrought,
Her rosy cheeks were smooth and tender,
Her age scarce twenty—and, in short,
It was impossible to mend her.
One day quoth he: "You darling little wife, you!
Whatever would become of hapless me,
If I should happen to survive you,
And your fair body I should see
Lying a corpse, all cold and void of motion,
Within my arms? The very notion
Gives me a chill as if I now were dying!
I swear that if I, wretched man,
Only survive the shock, you'll find me lying
Upon your tomb for nine long days, and crying,
Crying the very best I can!"—

"And if, dear husband," she began,
"I'm the survivor when we're paried,
I'll bewail he, my Faristan,
Inside your coffin, broken hearted."—
"A noble woman!" he with rapture thought,
As in his arms his wife he caught.
He felt no doubt about it, for, you know,
She said it—so it must be so!

About a year had pass'd away
Since the agreement made that day,
When it so chanced that, as they sat
Over their evening meal of curry,
Spending the time in pleasant chat,
Poor Fatima, in too great hurry
To eat some tid-bit, while her eyes
Opied, in manner far from wise,
Her husband, not her plate, by ill-luck swallow'd
A little bone—of course you guess what follow'd.

What could be done? Poor Faristan
Skips here and there, does all he can,
Upon the back he thumps her,
He shakes her, bumps her, jumps her,
He tries to push it down, he upward tries to pull it—
In vain! She's choked by that small bone inside her little gullet!

Only imagine his despair!
Soon in her winding-sheet they fold her,
Black in the face, 'tis may be, yet so fair!
He could not summon courage to behold her.

Now Fatima is in her grave,
And Faristan begins to rave,
And rolls upon it, sighing with such ardor,
That he is heard a mile away and more,
Fully resolved (so much did he regard her)
Nine days to stop there, as we know he swore.

The Prophet chanced to pass that way,
Found it impossible to pray
In such a noise, so asked politely:
"What mean these groans and writhings so unsightly?"
"Oh, Sir!" said he, "within this tomb there lies
The best of wives—I never knew a cluster
Or nobler woman, loving, young, and wise—
And in the grave this very day I've placed her."

The Prophet answer'd: "Since you for her sake
Are grieving so, and merit to be lucky,
I'll grant your wish," and as he spoke,
The staff his hand was grasping struck he
Upon the tomb, and, lo! it open'd wide,
And Fatima appear'd outside
In health and beauty, and with rapturous passion
Rush'd to her husband's arms in loving fashion.
How they embraced and hugg'd each other!
Any spectator must have thought
Such kisses were enough to smother
Both man and wife.—And next they sought
To thank the Prophet for this miracle portentous,
But couldn't—he was non inventus!

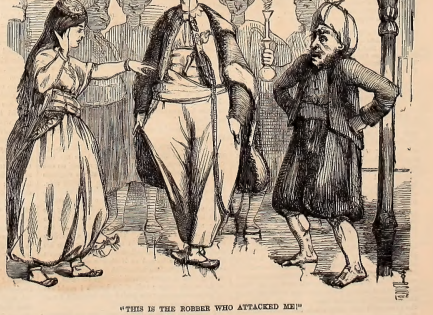
PART II.

Good Faristan bethought him then
That Fatima's lone funeral linen raiment
(Although 'twas dusk) for walking home again
Was scarcely in the usual way, meant.
"Light of my eyes! behind these stones stoop down,
While I run home and fetch your shoes and gown;
The moon is up, there's little danger in it,
Fear not, and I'll be back in half a minute."

He spoke, and vanish'd like a shot.
Meanwhile there happen'd to approach the spot
The Sultan's son, escorted by the light
Of many torches through the night.
His servants, by the flickering glare,
Perceived a woman with disheveled hair,
And sagely clothing, seeking to conceal
Her somewhat striking dishabille,
Which in the darkness, by the torchlight aided,
Seem'd greater than it in the day did.

The Sultan's son his march suspended,
And then approach'd her unattended,

While she with arms and hands was trying
Her want of clothing to replace,
And left exposed, in beauty vying,
Two legs and feet of matchless grace.
The Prince, instead of putting on his duty
Clearly explain'd his hands before his face,
With might and main stood staring at the beauty—
"What loveliness is this I trace!
And yet the time, spot, dress, are rather funny—"
"My lord!" she said, in accents sweet as honey,
"I feel so awkward in this negligée,
I really know not what to say!"



The Prince at once confess'd the force
Of her remark, and then of course
Gave her his own great-coat at this suggestion,
And said, "Fair lady, just one question!
Pray, are you married? If you single are,
Come home with me, and be the brightest star
Within my harem! Be a prince's bride,
I love you more than all the world beside!"

Fair Fatima soon comprehended
Th' advantage of this offer splendid,
And found her knowledge as a tailor
In measuring its extent avail her.
Alas! when this proposal made he,
I grieve to say the naughty lady
Forgot her duty and her plighted troth,
Forgot her husband and her oath.
"My lord! I'm single, and quite ready
To offer you allegiance steady.
And live but for Your Royal Highness!"
"A bargain!" he exclaim'd with shyness!
A horse is brought, and, lighted by the torches,
Soon Fatima's inside his harem's perches.

Scarce had she gone when Faristan comes back,
Bringing the clothes she seem'd to lack.
She is not there! His wonderment immense is;
He shouted, search'd, and well-nigh lost his senses.
"She is some robber's prize," then thought he—
In this we scarce can contradict him;
He little dreamt that she could be so naughty
As to have been a willing victim!

"YOU DARLING LITTLE WIFE, YOU!"

"THIS IS THE ROBBER WHO ATTACKED ME!"

"Why didn't I escort her home at once,
Dress'd as she was? Alas, poor silly dunce!
To what distress my darling little wife
Will be! She said that she should find her life
So and without me, that she needs must be Buried alive in the same grave with me.
You phenix of a woman! I'll be strange!
Has dared to pester you saved yourself from danger,
I'm sure that you'll have saved yourself from danger,
As any polite person would: the chance is
That you have scratch'd your face, or torn your hair,
Or even stain'd yourself in your despair!"

Alas, poor Patrician deluded,
She felt more happy for thou you said!
She liked her escort in the haven in
That she had not the slightest wish to go
And was all ready to her new position.
She quite forgot you and your sad condition.

PART III.

Poor Patrician begins to seek her
Early and late, through all the country round,
But all in vain; his hopes grow restless,
No trace of her can any where be found.
He also searches for the Island of the Dying,
Hoping that he could tell him something of it.

At length a person who was present
At the adventure, thought that he never unpleasant
That Fatima, the good and tender,
Instead of securing "No surrender!"
Host chosen the Prince a preference decided,
And in his haven happily resided.

Our hero now no longer waits,
But hastens to the Sultan gates,
Past all the servants, heralds, courtiers pushes,
Into the Prince's very presence rushes
And there begins to implore him
Him faithful his son to restore him.

The Prince, kind man (who maybe had enough
Of Fatima ere this), gave no rebuff,
But told him what he'd said, without excitement,
On learning what this strong appeal meant.
"She doubtless is inside herself with terror,"
Said Fatima, "and thought that you were me;
Oh let her come, and I'll explain her error.
My son dear will be very proud to shall see,
My gracious lord, with how much fervor
She'll rush to him as—Heaven preserve her!"
"Tis well!" the Prince replied, "so be it!
I'll as a daughter-in-law to see it."

The lady came—good Fatima!
Was so much dazzled by the splendor
Of her gold dress and jewels, that, poor man,
He knew her scarce, and felt like some pretender.
But Fatima in half a second
Knew him she well, despite dark, turn'd deadly white,
Then fiery red; but soon she reckon'd
With reason who was the way to win the fight.

Now, when the Prince observed her start, he Rush'd up and said, "You know this party?"

"Oh yes!" replied the genius of all creatures,
"I recognize him and his features.
This is the robber who attack'd me,
Just now and dragg'd me to the spot from whence
Your Highness had the goodness to extract me.
Hell-scared, thanks be his impertinence!"

On hearing his dear wife thus speak,
Poor Fatima turns pale as death,
Stares wildly round, feels faint and weak,
His senses reel, he grasps for breath.
The Court in chorus all asserted
Each context proved a solid perverted;
His guilt was clear, the Prince commanded
That they should take him to the Cadi.
Into the judgment-room he's handed,
The case is tried, the guilty found
Deserv'd his doom, for proved
Malice aforethought, and even he for his life,
Seeing his conduct of his faithless wife?
He'd rather have it at an end.
The verdict "Guilty!" so they take him straightway
Off to the gallows near the city's gateway.

What could have saved his neck and reputation,
As he stood trembling at the gallows' station?
Had not the Prophet (who in our narration
Has got a by a party approach) the point
His figure glitter'd with an angel's splendor.
"This man is innocent," he told an officials,
And I'm his witness too!" he cried aloud,
The hangman dropp'd the rope, the crowd
Shrank when they heard this speech of one
Who never spoke in ignorance or malice,
And all together hasten'd to the palace
The Sultan came, attended by his son.
The Prophet, highly honor'd at the Court,
First says his say; then Fatima is brought.
Around them both the others form a ring:
Too conscious of her guilt, the naughty thing
Lifts up her eyes, the Prophet recognizes,
Falls down in trance while great the crowd's surprise is.

Good Patrian gets ample compensation,
While Fatima's consigned to be old tomb!
There she remains up until the day of doom.
He hasn't now the slightest inclination
To throw himself away, nay, and two,
Even for nine seconds, on her grave.

DOWN A CREVASSE.

I ARRIVED in Chamouny on the 6th of August, 1859, with a friend and companion, an Englishman like myself. We had had some days' walks in Switzerland, and in that time had "done" every thing considered necessary by our countrymen. We had gained some experience in glacier work, having ascended the Alitsch Horn, whose summit had been reached for the first time by Englishmen, a member of the Alpine Club, only two months before. We made the ascent successfully, and were proud of having been the first exploring party to stand on its lofty peak, nearly fourteen thousand feet high. On that occasion we passed two whole days on the snow and glacier.

I remembered well the first glimpse I had had info one of those terrible crevasses which intersect glaciers. Getting a guide to hold my hand, I leaned over its yawning brink and gazed carefully into the fathomless abyss. The two perpendicular walls of ice appeared to join together about three hundred feet down; an appearance resulting from the convexity of the crevasse. Usually, I believe, the great split ends only where the glacier touches the ground beneath.

"No one who falls into one of these ever comes out alive," said one of our guides. "Yes," said another, "a man once escaped, and lives still at the Grindelwald; he was a chamois hunter, and when coming home alone over the glacier, his foot slipped, and he was precipitated into a crevasse. His fall was broken by projecting ledges and blocks of ice; which, however, gave way as he clung to them. After falling three hundred feet, he reached the bottom of the glacier, with a leg and an arm broken. He found a hollow place between the ground and the ice through which a stream of water ran. Instinctively he followed its course, despite the great pain he suffered, and after crawling along for three hours, found himself freed from the glacier."

Ordinary crevasses are from three to eight feet wide at top, but the sides approach each other rapidly, so that a man would be wedged in between the two walls of ice long before he could reach the bottom. And then, unless there should be ropes at hand by some strange coincidence, what an awful death! An unfortunate Russian gentleman perished thus in a crevasse only last year, half frozen, half starved to death, and dead at his body ever melting the ice, he ever sinking deeper and deeper into its dreadful grave.

My companion and I ascended the Brevant, and as few climbing travelers leave Chamouny without visiting the Mer de Glace and the Jardin, we arranged to make that excursion. To shorten our day's work we left Chamouny in the evening and slept at Montanvert, a little mountain inn on the edge of the Mer de Glace.

We were up betimes in the morning. We provided ourselves with alpine sticks and wine, and started with our guide, whom we had brought from Courmayeur. It was a fine morning indeed, and promised well for our expedition. Our road, for about half an hour, was along an uneven path skirting the mountain side. Below us on our left hand, very much crevassed and covered with débris. The path then came to an end, and the guide said we might as well take to the glacier for a short distance. We descended on to it, and threaded our way over the crevasses without much difficulty.

The excursion to the Mer de Glace not being looked upon as a regular glacier expedition, is not made with the attendant accompaniments of axes or ropes. We had neither. We were in high spirits, and went along at a great rate; so quickly, indeed, that our guide, who had been somewhat cautioned us once or twice, and requested us to allow him to lead the way a little.

Just then our progress was arrested by a wide crevasse. Looking to the left I perceived that it terminated a little further down on, in a steep slope of ice, which I thought I could easily climb. As the crevasse was about sixty yards long, I determined to try this slope rather than go round by the other end.

Using my Alpenstock instead of an axe, therefore, I began making foot-holes in the ice with it. The guide had now come up with us. He looked at the icicles and the crevasse, and said, very seriously, "It is dangerous, let us go round." By this time I had, with the aid of my Alpenstock, climbed about half-way up the slope of ice. I had already come to the conclusion that it was much too steep to scale without an axe, and had determined to return and go round, when the guide had spoken. I carefully stretched back my right leg, feeling for the hole I had made in the ice. My foot went past the place, and I felt that I was slipping; the smooth surface offered not the least projection that I could grasp. I slipped forward perpendicular, and I fell, head foremost, into the yawning crevasse below.

I heard a loud cry of despair from my fellow-traveler and the guide. My own sensations can not be described, or even remembered clearly from the whirl and shock. I felt that I was being bumped from side to side between the two walls of ice; that I was being crushed, and that I was going to utter destruction; that I had lighted on a horrible death. Suddenly I felt that I was caught by something that I had instinctively felt in the air. I was able to take my breath, and to call out for "A rope! a rope!"

By the most extraordinary chance my fall had been arrested by a little ledge of ice which spanned the crevasse about fifty feet down. Had it been more, not more than two inches wide at the top, and (as well as I could judge) about two feet deep, I had fallen, as it was, sheer down on my right side, my legs on the other. Instinctively and immediately, by means which I can not at all recall, I raised myself from this dreadful position to a sitting one on the ledge, in which there was a little niche sufficiently wide to admit me. Here, I was now so far collected as that I could hear and understand my fellow-traveler saying from above, "We never hoped to hear of you again. For God's sake, take heart. The guide is gone to Montanvert for men and ropes; he is running, and will be back directly."

"If he is not," I answered, "I shall never come up alive."

My position was awful one. The little ledge was so narrow that I could not get both my feet upon it. I was, in fact, supporting myself on one leg, half leaning against one side of the crevasse and pressing my hand against the opposite side. The ice felt very smooth, and I had nothing to grasp. A stream of water poured over my shoulders from above, and I felt that I was losing my with its icy coldness. Overhead I could see the long narrow strip of blue sky, bounded by the walls of ice, and could hear the voices in terrible, unrelenting look in the intensely blue ice that surrounded me on all sides. The grim walls of the crevasse looked as if they would unite to crush me rather than relinquish their victim. Nausea rolls of water poured over me from above, and in the whole sixty yards of its length I could see no projection except the little ledge on which I had so miraculously chanced to fall.

I ventured to look down, only for an instant, into the fearful chasm in which I was suspended. At the depth to which I had fallen the crevasse was barely two feet wide, but downward it narrowed rapidly, and about two hundred feet below me the sides appeared to join. I believe that if I had fallen six inches on either side of the little ledge I must inevitably have been jammed in head downward, at a depth where no ropes that could have been brought there could possibly have reached me.

I had now been about twenty minutes standing in this horribly perilous position, straining every nerve to prevent myself from giving way, looking up at the blue sky above me and the clear ice on all sides, and endeavoring to cast a glance into the abyss below. Blood was trickling over me from a cut on my cheek, and I felt that my right leg (fortunately the idle one) was badly bruised. In the mean while my left leg was becoming exceedingly painful from the strain upon it, and I was afraid of losing my balance if I tried to relieve myself by changing to the other. I felt that I was growing benumbed by the intense cold of the ice against which I was leaning, and of the stream of water from above, which never ceased to flow.

I called to my fellow-traveler to know if any one were in sight? There was no answer. I called again. A human being seemed to be within hearing. A dizziness came over me, as the thought struck me, "He has gone to look if any help is coming, and he can not find his way back to the crevasse. There are hundreds of them. I am lost."

Again I had to strain every nerve to keep myself from sinking; I almost gave up hope; I felt inclined to let myself down and have the end over. At that miserable time I suddenly heard my friend shouting from above. He had gone to look if the guide were in sight, and when he returned found to retrace his steps, had been thunderstruck to see the surface of the glacier intersected by innumerable crevasses, and so similar in appearance as to leave him no landmark by which to know my living grave. At last, I think I must have had caught sight of a little knapsack left at the mouth of the crevasse by the guide, which had directed him to it.

I called to him to look at his watch—five minutes more were past. The cold was growing more intense; I felt a degree of speech that I felt as if the blood were freezing in my veins. I called to him again to know if any one were in sight. It was thirty-five minutes since the guide had started, but not a soul was visible. Indeed, it was most unlikely that they could be back so soon, as we ourselves had been three-quarters of an hour in coming thus far.

I felt that I could hold out but a very short time longer; and besides that I did not know at what moment the little ledge, which was my only safety, might give way under my weight. I remembered that I had a large clasp-knife in my pocket, and determined on attempting to climb with it, if I could. I began by making a little hole in the ice as high up as I could reach, large enough to admit my hand, and then endeavor was to cut a deep foot-hole about two feet above the ledge. I succeeded in this, and found that by placing my left foot in it, and my right by the place I had made for my hand, and at the same time pressing with my back against the other side of the crevasse, and with all my strength, I was able to raise myself and stand firmly in my new position. Again let myself down on to the ledge, and commenced cutting another foot-hole about two feet above the last. It seemed to me possible that in this manner I might work my way up across; but a single slip or a false step, and I knew I must be precipitated down the yawning gulf.

I was working diligently at the second foot-hole when I heard a joyful shout from above. "They are in sight!" cried my friend. "Ropes—coming as hard as they can!" A few minutes afterward I heard their voices at the mouth of the crevasse.

I steadied myself on my terrific perch and slippery footing in order to be able to seize and attach the rope when throw to me. I saw the end of it dangling over my head. "Merciful God! It will not reach me!" It is too short!" "We have got another rope, and are unwerrel from above' and it was knotted on and lowered. I caught the end, and tied it firmly round my waist. Grasping the rope above my head, I found I gave the word. The strain began, and I felt that I was safe. In another minute I was standing on the glacier.

I had been fifty minutes in the crevasse, during which time I had not lost consciousness for a single instant. But I was thankful at once more upon a firm footing, an all-pervading sense of gratitude for the wonderful escape I had had came over me, and made me forget for the moment Montanvert and the glacier whirled before my eyes, and I should have fallen but that they held me up. This was soon over, and we prepared to start for Montanvert. Before leaving I took a last look at the mouth of the crevasse which had so nearly been my sepulchre. I saw that it would have been utterly impossible to climb out; as I had been trying to do. The mouth was so wide that, as I approached it, I could have had no support from behind; and without such support, not even a cat could have scaled the perpendicular walls.

Our poor guide was in a terrible state, and had left the whole party behind him, and could find no rope fit for the purpose in the house. He was in despair, and was starting off to Chamouny when two more guides came. Their mules were laden with wood fastened on with ropes; he begged hard for those ropes, telling the men that a young Englishman was being frozen to death in a crevasse. They hastily threw the wood from the backs of the mules, and came to my rescue with the ropes, and brought the ropes with them knotted together (it seemed there were three in all), they made a length of about sixty feet, just enough to reach me.

With the assistance of my deliverers I was able to walk slowly back to Montanvert, where I was immediately put into a comfortable bed, where the injuries I had received (which were insignificant considering the depth I had fallen) were carefully dressed. I dreamed, with unspeakable dread, of what had happened when lying in that bed, and I have dreamed of it in many beds since. I believe that nothing would induce me to go among ice and snow now without a long and strong rope. I offer the caution to all other travelers in Switzerland, out of a great experience and a great escape.

THE OLD STORY.

FOLD the table hands over the lily-white breast. Smooth the silken hair upon the temples so accessibly throbbing with thought. Close the yet tinted lips. Let the pale, waxen hands be crossed over the tiny feet. Unclasp the fingers and fill them with buds and blossoms. Scatter rose-lips mingled with green leaves upon the swelling folds of her breast. Touch the marble forehead. Droop the curtain a little more. Gently smooth the one fold in the covering of the bed, white bed. Move that chair just a little—so. Leave her alone in the still room.

It is only a year since Frank went away. It is only two years since he sat one morning with Ellie to see the sun rise. That was a curious whim of the little student—that Frank should sit with her on the mossy rock which shadowed the cottage door and see the glory of an August morning. But with little wonder to Frank. For if Ellie would have him sit by her side and look at a desert, he would joy to do it for the blue of her eyes.

The morning was beautiful—fragrant, dewgemmed, cool, still, almost solemn in its silent search from the black-lapsted shadows of night to the lighted coarts of day. Frank's exuberance was checked, his springing merriment softened into a silent kneeling on while the hush of morning was being evolved. Clouds, crested and massive, marched in totallions to the glistening gateways. Airy, attenuated cloud-fragments swept the face of heaven in childlike trepidation as the golden glory seemed ready to break. The crown of the day-king lifted behind the forest-tops: the birds sang a trilling, tremulous song of welcome; and the face of the little worn was wreathed in delight.

The miracle touched a chord in the young man's heart. This glory brought to his thought the glory of the Infinite, and then the whole life infinite; and then that finite love through which we catch glimpses of the other. And then Frank—

Ellie, leaning within his arm, said,

"I little thought of this joy when I asked you to meet me and see the morning."

"We live in deeds, not years—in thoughts, not breaths." One—two—three—ten months sailed by, with only the little foam-nasles and the musicripple of Ellie's laughter at the prow. Then word went up West, fortune-hunting—money-making. It is the one stern necessity of the people—the hope upon which beings party and love from the clouds to perch upon rugged heath, and seek worms in the land.

One—two—three long, lonely months, sparkling with loving letters. Four—five—Ellie is a little sad—very sad—tearful. The letters are not regular. They are less frequent. And words, a million times worse than all, there is a strange chill in them. The same words are there, but they have lost their life, and are dead words, corpses.

Ellie is brave, and holding back the tears she clasps her nature in the rigid grasp of will, to hold it against the sweep of such a storm as moans in the distance.

There are whispers of a brilliant, black-eyed beauty having cast her spell on Frank. Ellie knows that it is true, for she has seen it in manila. She makes no answer to his letters, and they come no more.

Friends do not see Ellie in tears. They do not see her sad. "How very brave!" they say. "She does not mope over it, as most women do." Remark the gossipers over their tea and toast.

She is indeed brave; but not strong enough to hold her tears always. She has learned that is not allowed to beat its will beats faintly and more low word. The strain upon the will makes the will tired and weak. Months, one—two—three—carry each a portion of her strength away; and with strength, life. A little more pale, a little more quiet. A little more tender and loving. Ellie can not lift as she used to. The breath comes heavy and fast when ascending the stairs of room. The hands upon the pillow are more and more transparent; the fingers lighter, the nails more pink and pearly (one more tint); but it and the lily whites are softer, purer. The eyes upon the pillow are more full of light than ever. Ellie is very, very weak. She is not sick; but her life is sinking from her. And yet she holds her woman nature in that strength—to the last.

No. A dear opens, a strong trend reaches the bedside, and a face is buried in the pillow, while dark, heavy locks are mingled among the silken ones. There is a prayer for forgiveness. Freely, oh, how freely! granted; and then Ellie lets go her strength, and the tears of many months.

Frank is manly, and tells it all. Dazzled, fascinated, overmatched by a stronger spirit than his own, he yielded. He thinks now that he was miserable: and the price itself became a blank in value. Cursed by conscience and the old returning love, he had told his enchantress all, and now had hurried home to beg of Ellie the one boon—forgiveness.

Too late to stay the tide of life. But when Ellie gave her last glance Frank was there, and saw in it a glance of free forgiveness.

Let the room be hushed when Frank goes in. Leave him alone with the beautiful dead, himself, and the Father of us all.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE

THE NEW GOVERNMENT LOAN.

THE bids for the $10,000,000 Government loan—half of the sum authorized to be borrowed by the last Congress—were opened at the Treasury Department on Monday. The bids were for par, and interest, and are considerable in ten years. There were very-six bidders for various amounts, the aggregate being half a million over the sum required. The premiums offered averaged about 1 per cent—a high price for a five per cent. stock at this season.

A DISUNION CONSPIRACY.

The Times correspondent writes from Washington as follows: "It is my painful duty to confirm, on undoubted authority, the statements which have gone abroad from this City concerning certain high officials in the most diabolical schemes of treason and chicanery. The gentleman who revealed them is R. J. Ecclesy, Chief Clerk of the Treasury Department. He is a Virginian by birth, and son-in-law to Governor King of Missouri, and enjoys a reputation in this community for integrity and goodness of heart of which any man might be proud. He was dismissed from office a few weeks ago on the pretended ground that he had declared his preference for Governor Breckinridge. This he denies, and the probabilities all go to sustain his denial, for he is not only a Southerner, but the owner of a large amount of slave property in Missouri.

"Mr Lackey distinctly states that a high official in the Treasury Department communicated to him the plan of the Disunionists, of which he cordially approved. The plan, in short, is for the Governors of the Southern States to convene their Legislatures by proclamation on the 8th day of November, or as soon thereafter as possible, and if Mr. Lincoln can be ascertained; that the Legislatures will proceed to declare the Union dissolved, and to pronounce in favor of Mr. Breckinridge as the President of the Southern Union."

ANOTHER SAN JUAN AFFAIR.

Advices from Washington Territory state that Colonel Casey, of the United States army, commanding troops there, has received orders from his superiors to send no more rents for the station back of Steilacoom. For several years the United States Government has been paying an annual rent of $6000 to a British agricultural company, for the purpose of keeping troops within the boundaries of American soil.

HORRIBLE ACCIDENT.

A telegram dated Scranton, Pennsylvania, Thursday, October 25, says: "A horrible accident occurred at seven o'clock this morning at Fort Griffin, between Carbondale and Wilkesbarre, at the Pennsylvania Coal Company's Works. A car containing ten miners started from the bottom of a slope of 1300 feet, and when about half-way the rope broke, and the car was precipitated to the bottom. Seven men instantly killed and two are not expected to live. The remainder of escaped by jumping from the car."

A SNAKE SENT BY POST.

A colored woman in Chicago astonished the Post-office lumpers a few days ago with a series of the most terrific shrieks and screams. She had just received a small package from Memphis, and on opening it found a snake enclosed to her address. The package was directed in a disguised hand-writing, and the woman showed them a letter written, simply to say that the snake was a present to her from her late master, and take it, and keep with it for luck. The woman also informed her that the snake had been a gift of diverse as soon as possible. Jealousy was of course the origin of the inhuman escapade.

A MUNIFICENT DONATION.

A communication has been received from Mr. N. Hatch, of Syracuse, Massachusetts, by the Commissioners of Charities and Corrections proposing to present to the City of New York two hundred acres of land, situated in Westchester County, in this State, for the exclusive use and benefit of the children of the poor in New York, and to be kept upon the city for support and protection. The benefit will be extensive to the worthy and poor children of the poor, as may be selected by the Commissioners. The property is to be held in the hands of trustees, one of whom will be appointed by the Commissioners of Public Charities. The donor is rather eccentric.

THE LATE EARTHQUAKE.

The earthquake gave five shocks to the Springfield people. The Springfield (Mass.) "Republican" says: "The effect over all the northern part of New England and through Canada, as far east and vertical as Quebec, seems to have been lighter than here; at Manchester, New Hampshire, about the same; while at Saco, Maine, there was said to have been a perceptible rocking of buildings, with the ringing of bells. It grew in severity as it extended to the Connecticut Valley. We hear of it through Vermont, at Burlington, St. Johnsbury, Northfield, Woodstock, Rutland, and Brattleboro. At Burton fastened doors were unlocked and the church bell rung by it; and at Bradford a church in course of was shaken out of its propriety, and left standing slewing. Derby, Newcastle, Montreal, Albany, and Troy, also do not mention the phenomenon as observed in those places."

A BRUTAL MURDER.

On Thursday night of last week, about eleven o'clock, Martin Cull, an Irishman in the employ of Messrs. S. and H. Sayles, of Pawtucket, was brought upon Main-Bridge, Central Village, by having his throat cut from ear to ear. The deed was evidently done in the house of another Irishman, one of the deceased.

It appeared that on the night in question Martin and James, with a small child, occupied a bed together in a room in a tenement from this occupied by James Cull's wife and children, who were the only occupants of the house. About 11 o'clock Martin was informed that his wife had just had entered the house and murdered Martin. She was immediately arrested, but her husband escaped for the time, as, and she remained in bed through fear, while he went out to obtain assistance. When they returned to the room the body was already stiff and cold.

At the inquest, a jury of inquest was impaneled, and continued in session during the day. James Cull's statement was that he and the deceased lay down on the bed to sleep over awhile Martin had been murdered, and just caught a glimpse of a man disappearing in the door.

Upon being cross-questioned he gave a very unsatisfactory account of affair. He did not know who the murderer was, or whether his hands was black or white, and the room was dark. He could not tell how long it was after the murder was committed. Finally, after a long examination, he confessed to being the murderer.

It appeared that there had been some previous quarrel the previous day, and in the night he got up, and leaving Martin's body where the side of the bed, he procured a razor, hit throat with a razor, the blood falling in a pool upon the floor.

A LETTER FROM RALPH FARNHAM.

Ralph Farnham, the veteran of Bunker Hill, who has recently visited Boston, counts the following letter with which to be the papers of that city:

"ATTICA, NEW YORK, October 22, 1860.

"I will give you a brief account of my journey home. When we left Lake Lawrence there was a large crowd at the depot. They requested us to make a few remarks from the window, which I did, when they showered the cars for us to go to the Falls. We arrived at the Falls at 2 o'clock, and the train moved on, and the same amidst such cheers as I shall never forget.

"At Dover, New Hampshire, I received a like reception, and the worthy Mayor very kindly attended me over to Great Falls and presented me with a $10 bill.

"At Great Falls I met with the same demonstration as at Lawrence and Dover, and the Chief Engineer of the Great Falls Branch Railroad invited me to a dinner that I enjoyed very much.

"After leaving Great Falls I was received with hearty cheers all the way along, until I arrived at this place, and then, when I got home, that I had been the elephant, and was very glad to get back.

"I am in good health, and my friends think I am better than when I started on my journey. I am sure that I am as well.

"I am very grateful for the honor done me, by the invitation to visit Boston, and the many kindnesses which I received when there. I remember with special pleasure my visit to Bunker Hill, attended by the Bachelors city authorities, the military and music also the addresses delivered on that occasion by the Mayor and Mr. Frothingham.

"I am also greatly indebted for the liberal sums of money and the many presents I received. My thanks, which are all I have to offer, come but a poor return for so many favors. I ought especially to mention Mrs. W. Farnham and Mrs. Lowell, of Boston, and J. Mayer Dana of Charlestown, and Mr. Gilmore's Concert Band, for their liberal presents.

"Though I am in my 105th year I am not put all confidence I shall yet live to see many days. I will be my own boss. I am the first one up in the morning, and the last one to bed at night. I do not work as hard as I did in my time, but rise at five and retire at seven, and that I continue remarkably well. I have lived with the same parents, and for over thirty years past I have not tasted a drop of spirituous liquors of any kind, nor smoked a cigar in my life, so as to require the attendance of a physician. About twenty-five years ago I broke my thigh by falling on the ice, and had a surgeon to set it; but this is the only time a doctor ever visited me. I eat, drink, and sleep well, drink tea and coffee, and eat a very light supper, never eating meat after dinner. I have no doubt that it is owing to these abstentions and regular habits, and the avoidance of excesses in all things, that my health and life has been so prolonged. I voted for General Washington for President, and have voted for every one since that election since, and hope to vote at the next election. I am in the duty of every day to my country.

"This letter, which my grandson has written at my dictation, I have carefully read and approved, and I sign it with my own hand.

RALPH FARNHAM."

THE WASHINGTON PITOL DOME.

The Washington Star says that Thaddeus Hyatt, proceeding to Berlin Falls for the purpose of obtaining information in relation to the dome, was there waited on by many persons, one among whom offered to show him all the improvements of the extensive family. Inquiring into the matter, he soon ascertained that the gentleman was the owner of a pair once belonging to General Washington, and was then using Colonel Lewis Washington's house at the time of the Harper's Ferry affair. He spoke to the gentleman about the dome, and told on his way to Kansas. When he returned from that part of the country to New York, he met the same gentleman by mysterious boy, which had been awaiting him for some time, and which he found to be little paper thrilled to him, should turn out to be an infernal machine. The box was found to contain a pistol, cocked, and this has now been restored to its rightful owner.

THE DECISION IN THE HARTUNG CASE.

We read in the New York Tribune as follows:

"Among the decisions just made by the Court of Appeals is one in the case of Hartung, which will have a bearing upon the construction of the new law in relation to capital punishments.

"The Court holds that the statute of 1860, in its application to persons under sentence of death at the time of its passage, is unconstitutional and void, as ex post facto, because it increases the punishment of crime committed before the law in force at the time when the offence was committed. To the punishment of death is added that of solitary confinement at hard labor.

"The Court also expressed the opinion that the new law, having abolished the only statute which prescribed any age to the mode of punishment for the commission of new mode, there is now no known statute prescribing any punishment for the commission of murder in the first degree. Though they express no opinion as to the power of the Governor to reprieve, or by poisoning, in the jail, or by burning the prisoner at the stake, they say that the omission in the discretion of nobody knows to the public to prescribe any punishment for murder.

"The execution is to take place whenever ordered by the Governor in office. The convict remains imprisoned for the present, but the Governor cannot order his execution by instant execution in any way that caprice may dictate.

"There is no provision for appeal from this decision, no provision is sheltered, keeping remains the punishment of common law. Not only the punishment of murder, but also which was merely in allurance of the common law, it can not be pronounced by the Court, and there is no way thing which they abolished.

"In the case of Hartung the offence charged was at common law declared as 'petty treason,' and the punishment prescribed was that of burning at the stake. It would scarcely answer to claim that the Legislature intended to abolish punishment by fire, and yet retain the name of crime.

"It may be urged that all murderers can, under the new law, be convicted of murder in the second degree, for the sake of punishment. Juries cannot do this. They must pass the criminal, to evade this, pleads guilty of the crime of murder in the first degree. The Court can not sentence him for a less offence than that of which he is, by his own confession, guilty of the highest.

"The decision in the case of Mrs. Hartung by the Court of Appeals, it will be seen, is unanimous. It is one of fourteen and another, now under sentence in the city of New York."

MEN'S FASHIONS.

The New York correspondent of the Charleston Mercury furnishes the following paragraph concerning hats and cravats:

"A word about men's fashions. The tendency of late years, as you know, has been to make hats smaller in the crown. The Prince's visit has done something to encourage this movement. Many gentlemen have taken to the use of wearing the abominable hats which every body in the Royal party wore, from the Prince down to the servants. Cases of shocking bad hats we never seen, except on mercenary Irish politicians. The Prince's hat was a very small one, awkwardly at the edges, and had a dull lustre, as if they had been extensively worn before. The Prince was not eminently neatly, and no New Yorker with the slightest regard for his appearance would have worn the hat that he bore Broadway. The Earl of St. Germans sported a still shabbier hat, of the same description. The Prince has had a decided appearance of having been out on several things and this appearance has been imparted to the hat of original shape, which was a very bad one. The younger members of the Royal party wore hats somewhat better in respect to their hats, but there was not one among the whole collection which was not shabby-genteel. Some of them turned out of his store as a specimen of his own manufacture, and the Prince and the Earl of St. Germans and their fellows, however, that copies of these atrocious hats are to be found in every hat store in the city. The cravat, which is what his brothers bestow the public's third-rated evil, is worn. The handsomest and most elegant is the black, established by the Prince and his party. Next to the black are the white, worn by the ready copists on Broadway. The Earl of St. Germans sported a blue cravat, which fashion among us. With the exception, there is nothing new in the fall fashions for gentlemen."

DEATH OF A VETERAN.

Another of the moral veterans of 1812 is dead. Commodore Thomas M. Hunter died at his house in this city of injury in the Navy, died on Monday, at Richmond, Virginia, in the eighty-first year of his age. Commodore Hunter has performed altogether fourteen years and seven months sea service. He was on the coast of Africa during the war, and spent seventeen years unemployed. For the officers have done less expeditious duty than Commodore Stewart. We believe he never commanded a fleet but one, which, in 1855, he relieved the gallant Commodore Perry on the African station. He was attached to the Washington dispatch during the war, participated in the battle of Lake Waterloo, and subsequently was chief of the Bureau of Ordnance from 1838 to 1841, Governor of the Navy Yard (in 1837), and Superintendent of the Ordnance Bureau. He served in the Mediterranean, and was employed in general disposition and many sensible social qualities. For the last few years he resided in Richmond, Virginia, where nevertheless. He was placed on the retired list in 1850.

SHOCKING AFFAIR.

A melancholy tragedy occurred in Chambers County, Alacbama, on the 7th, of which the Opelika Era says: "It appears that a quarrel occurred between Captain Samuel Jeter and an elderly man named James Taylor—originating, probably, in an old grudge. In the course of the discussion Taylor struck Jeter with a cane, when Jeter, seizing upon two of his (Taylor's) sons joined in the assault, and succeeded in overpowering and killing the old man. Jeter's two sons-in-law, Reuben and Edward Lee, were present at the Captain's call to his father's aid, and plunged a knife into the breast of young Jesse Taylor, causing his death instantly. Captain Jeter still survives, but it is thought he will not live long. Reuben Lee is a very worthy married. E. C. Jeter resides within one and a half miles of this place, and is one of the most respectable, wealthy, and intelligent of our community."

EXECUTION OF A MURDERER.

On Friday last Daniel Cooper was hung in the jail yard at Dalloway, Iowa, for murdering a man named Clark, whom he killed in a drunken fight about two years of age, yet the murder was so unprovoked that a body any sympathy has been manifested for him. He refused to eat any breakfast on the morning of his execution, and had to be supported while on the way to the gallows. Arrived there, he had to be lifted up the steps, and when invited to pray with the priests, he kept constantly repeating, "O Lord, receive my soul!" "O Lord, receive my soul!" He was then hung, and in about seven feet when the rope was cut, the wretched man died comfortably.

MR. PETER COOPER'S TROUSERS.

It is positively asserted in the Conversation Hash Club, and in a letter on the 8th inst. to Prince of Wales, that of that famous festival "the pantaloons of the venerable Peter Cooper were the most conspicuous among the ambitious pantaloons," adds the graceful chronicler, "came on to the floor with the second of Prince Albert, and at each bow made by the obsequious millionaire the top of his trousers disappeared from the opening of his vest, which eye opened wide in order the better to admire his Highness."

A MYSTERY AT SEA.

The following letter contains the probable loss of the American ship Grace Parsons appears in the Boston Post:

"CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES AT MARSEILLES, October 9, 1860.

"SIR,—I beg to communicate, for publication, the following statement:

"On the 19th day of August last there arrived at this consulate, from the port of Leghorn, the following seamen, viz.: Charles O'Neil, Thomas Donnelly, Benjamin Briggs, William Jenkins, Jenkins, Thomas Griffin, and William Robinson, who stated that they were a portion of the crew of the ship Grace Parsons, of Boston, of Newburyport, Ann Smith master, shipbuilt at ten, in a voyage from Leghorn to Boston, on the 15th of July, in the longitude of 40° 55' east, and latitude of 28° 2' north. That they had been overtaken by a violent gale, and in taking some effects, instruments, etc., to the long-boat they were washed off the deck, and return to the ship by all hands to be divided between the two boats, and leave the vessel. That they were picked up by a Greek vessel, put into effect, these men in their boat became separated from the rest of the crew, and have not since been able to get upon the vessel to leave, what, has become of them. They show somewhat, they passed alongside of her, and that the vessel appeared to be tight, and to go on her course. The ship appeared deserted, and the long-boat which they had left towing astern. The crew of the Grace Parsons were saved by the coast of Madagascar, and after five days were picked up by the British ship Lord Nelson, and put in Cadiz and Bourbon.

"The master of the captain, officers, and remaining crew have as yet reached me.

"I have presented this statement of the men in detail, a copy of which can be furnished to any person interested.

"I am, respectfully, your obedient servant,

"GEO. H. FAIRFIELD, U.S. Consul."

THE HARLEM RAILROAD.

The Harlem Railroad has never been managed with more energy than at present. It affords greatly increased facilities to the residents of the upper part of the city and the rich valleys of Westchester, Putnam, Dutchess, and Columbia counties, through which it passes, and extra trains have been put upon the road, and a number of new cars have been added, to meet the increased accordance for the comfort of passengers. The new baggage and mail cars will be in operation in a few days, as well as the mess passenger cars, have the new patent attachment for passing from car to car while the train is in motion at the wheels. There are two express trains to Albany daily—the morning train at 9 A.M., and the evening train at 5 P.M., either at five in the evening, arriving at Albany at noon and 10 P.M. The fare to Albany is three dollars, and to Troy $3 50 A.M. Connections are made by the express trains at the Junction with the Harlem road for Montreal and points to the principal places of the West, Northwest, and Southwest. These facilities, with the accommodation of the line will doubtless increase the travel, and add greatly to the prosperity of the road. Both trains are now running on the road daily.

PERSONAL.

The Herald says: "Lady Franklin is still among us, the honored guest of the Astor House, receiving the attentions of elite for her sympathy and his munificence. It is a like to see them thus honored. Lady Franklin has inherited the special object of her visit being to pour out her sincere and grateful acknowledgments for the sympathy manifested in behalf, and the disinterested private enterprise which fitted out two expeditions in search of her husband, ascertaining the fate of her husband. She has traveled in some of the Western States, and will probably remain some time longer in the city of New York. While her revered companion was sleeping, during the night of the 11th ultimo, the sad influence of hope caused like a beautiful aurora streaming from the Northern sky, Arctic winds were blowing fierce; and though the coarser thickets seems have covered the mountains, the snow-drifts were piled in the valleys, amidst all her sorrows, have left the genial impression on her countenance which is mostly grateful to all. It is the inspiration for the intrusion of the Devil and Dimin, in company with the Angel of Mercy, to the tomb of Him, for the engraved autumn as a subject for some of the pupils to the Academy of Design, and the Angel of Mercy, in the glowing terms of the magnificent sympathy and the subject seemed

SPIRIT-RAPPING MADE EASY;

OR,

HOW TO COME OUT AS A MEDIUM.

BY ONE WHO IS IN THE SECRET.

THE writer of the present paper is induced to proffer his explanation of the phenomena produced by the so-called Spirit Mediums, from two or three circumstances peculiar to his own experience. He is disposed to look at the performances of the Spirit Mediums from a point of view somewhat different from that of their ordinary audience. In fact, he considers them as professional imitators, and would even regard them as professional associates, if they had but the honesty to acknowledge their craft. It is his inclination, under any circumstances, to watch them very closely; and, though he can not allow their title to the rank of honest conjurers, he is interested in observing the means by which they produce their little effects. So satisfied is he that his inferences are, in the main, correct, that after he has stated them, he is disposed to withhold his name, for he sees no reason that, if it were known, he believes there would be no more spirit manifestations in his presence ever after. It would be just as impossible for him, as it proved for Robert Houdin, on a certain well-known occasion, to communicate with the capricious spirits through the ordinarily successful medium Mr. Home. To make a free observation of the spirit world it will be found that we require an incognito; for the spirits are shy, the spirits are fastidious, the spirits are averse to every overture, if it comes from a suspected, because suspicious, inquirer. The spirits would not shake hands with me, for the spirits have no professional esprit de corps; and therefore it is that professional vigilance is not only alive to the mode of their manifestations, but takes an interest in drawing off those retiring shadows, and exhibiting their real pretensions to the public.

Another circumstance which induces me to take them by the hand was an incident in which I myself participated; I might say with whom, and when, and where; but that I have no inclination, as I said before, to exclude myself forever from the spirit circle. It happened that I was present at a certain exhibition of two of the most popular Mediums of the day, and, after watching intently their whole performance, I ascertained the agencies by which it was accomplished. At all events, I was enabled at a subsequent performance to detect the spirits in a very palpable trick, resulting in their exposure and dismomfiture (see Figure 10), and having since experimented, I can now perform all that they then exhibited to sight, hearing, or touch. I am confident I could tell, with a little further trouble, the means by which Mr. Home astonished the writer of a recent article in the Cornhill Magazine.

As a preliminary I have to make this general remark, that the means by which the "spirits" usually manifest themselves are far more simple than readers anticipate. When a witness experiences any thing he can not account for, it is natural that he should refer this to some elaborate machinery adequate to what he considers the startling result. Let the reader, however, discard this impression at once, for it has a certain tendency to mislead his judgment. It is really the object of Mediums to depend on machinery as little as possible, for machinery is not only unintelligent, it may not only fumble and make mistakes, but it precludes that triumph of a Medium's art, the submitting to the preliminary or subsequent test of an examination. The "knocking," as they are termed, are far less serviceable and less frequently used than the natural aptitudes of the human body, when these are seen to be natural average, or are developed by discipline and education.

The first requisite, no doubt, is an impassive countenance, exhibiting no sense of shame, or fear of detection—a natural, or acquired brass, the perfection of which will depend, of course, upon the morale of the performer.

After this, the secret of the Medium's power is the flexibility of her lower limbs. Her legs must do the work of arms, and her feet must be educated to act like hands. Any one who doubts this potentiality of the human frame knows nothing of its relation to the Quadrumana, or of the feats of the Indian jugglers. The Indian jugglers, as is known to the initiated, produce their most extraordinary effects by this very capacity. And, therefore, we say it is in vain to accomplish spirit-rapping out as a Medium unless you are provided with flexible legs and manipulative feet and toes.

The Medium so qualified must go through a course of gymnastics to enable her to move her lower limbs with leisure, and especially to enable her so to move them without corresponding movements of the head and shoulders. She should even be able to perform the opera-dancer's feat of holding her hand above her head, and kicking the palm with her toe, as exhibited in the vignette to the popular "Memoirs of Mademoiselle Rigolboche;" which practice will enable her when standing on one foot to raise her knee nearly as high as her shoulder, as thus:

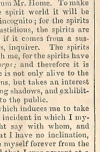

FIGURE 1.

The tendons of the knee, foot, and ankle, should next be strengthened by accustoming her, when seated on a chair, to raise great weights with her foot; the leg acting as a lever, the other knee, over which it is crossed, acting as a fulcrum, thus:

FIGURE 2.

The feet from the ankle must be rendered peculiarly flexible, and able, in conjunction with each other, by placing the sole of one over the top of the other, to hold and snatch away with rapidity heavy and light articles, such as slates, books, etc.

FIGURE 3.

Acting in a similar manner, they must be accustomed to seize and nip substances between their soles, so that apparel can be pulled and pinches inflicted with the sharp edges of the two soles of the boots.

The feet must also be practiced to clasp objects between their upper surfaces, by crossing the legs, so that, the soles of the boots not being felt, they may produce the sensation of a grasp by a hand.

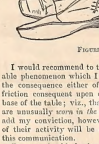

FIGURE 4.

I would recommend to the observant, a remarkable phenomenon which I myself perceived to be the consequence either of this facility or of the friction consequent upon other operations at the base of the table; viz., that the boots of Mediums are unusually worn in the upper leathers.

I must add my conviction, however, that this indication of their activity will be carefully repaired after this communication.

The toes should also be exercised so as to enable the Medium to rap with them as easily as other people can rap with the fingers, on which accomplishment it may be as well to consult "Fox's Confessions" in Professor Anderson's work on "Spirit-rapping."

FIGURE 5.

Section showing the Position of the Foot in the Boot.

The Medium must also practice writing with her feet by holding a lead or slate pencil between them. This can be easily done up to a certain point, though not to the perfection attained by the accomplished Miss Biffin. Such perfection in this really difficult operation it, however, unnecessary, as any kind of scribbling will pass for spiritual handiwork.

For the manipulation with the hands very little practice is required, except in the production of surface raps, as the sounds struck on wood so nearly resemble them. These can be produced (I am stating a fact) by pressing the tip of the middle finger firmly on the polished surface of the table, and letting it start forward in short unobtrusive jerks. (Figure 6.) If her hand be not naturally dry, the Medium should lightly rub the finger-tips with beeswax, or powdered rosin, both of which are imperceptible at the first glance. When, however, by constant practice, the finger has become corned, this subtlety will not be found requisite.

If the Medium thinks that the corn on her finger may tell tales, she may make the spirits rap by another method; that is to say, by using the surface of the nail of the first finger doubled sharply under it, and pressed heavily, at the same time that it is worked backward and forward, thus.

FIGURE 7.

(Figure 7.) In either case she must not hold her hands apart, but close together; one slightly covering the other to hide the movement, as in Figure 8.

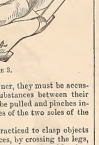

FIGURE 8.

To get up an effective séance, the Medium should procure an assistant to engage the attention of the sitters while she manipulates.

Great care must be taken to preserve a natural manner, yet the Medium must never be off her guard, and never make a slip. She must never admit that any of the phenomena emanate from herself, but continually protest that she has no hand in the matter.

Whenever she is asked if she can do any thing, she must carefully and invariably reply in the negative.

She must never give a promise that any thing will positively take place, but say the phenomena are influenced by the weather, or a thousand other causes. This will assist her, should she be enabled to meet the wishes of any whose prostration she fears may be too much for her. Thus, as I stated, when Robert Houdin was summoned before the Emperor of the French to see Mr. Home no manifestation took place.

After these preliminary remarks, let me instruct the Medium

HOW TO CONDUCT HERSELF PROPERLY IN A SEANCE.

Get your company into conversation, endeavoring to glean from their remarks whether they are penetrative or quite the reverse; treasure up any stray piece of information that may reach you, and use it in the course of the evening; but your principal work must be that of drawing the long bow.

You and your assistant must relate the most extraordinary narratives conceivable. Small fibs such as these, if of a certain audacity, are conducive to its enormity; for, though the statements you make are difficult to believe, it is still more difficult to credit a woman audacious enough to invent them. Accept it as an axiom, that "society," as it is called, is highly credulous, and, as Ladies are the "rage" in society, no believe is already half convinced."

You will find plenty of weak-minded people who will help you out by relating anecdotes of their own self-deceptions which will carry additional weight from the position they hold in society, while nothing will be deducted for their want of penetration; a facility which every body believes he possesses, but which none can attain in perfection without a considerable amount of patience and study.

When you judge that you have worked the majority of your company into a proper state of mental perturbation, provide yourselves at a large round table (pretty nearly four feet diameter, with a centre column and three feet), the specific gravity of which is small in proportion to its immense leverage. Whip off the cloth; ask if there are any spirits present, and reply in the affirmative by surface raps.

Having stated yourself to be an rapport to all questions asked by the sitters you reply also by surface-raps—three indicating an affirmative, one negative, and two, when your information is imperfect, or your nail or corned finger fails to bring out the sound.

Now state that the spirits will dictate the particular place of each sitter is to occupy. Rap accordingly, placing the suspicious ones at a distance, and the sympathetic close to you, and tell them all to place their hands on the table; for this you have a double reason, first to give a mysterious aspect to the séance, and last, though not least, to keep their hands out of mischief.

During the séance you need not confine yourself to the particular knocks already described, you may give others with the sharp edge of the sole of your boot against the foot, or kicks straight up against the bottom of the table. Any mysterious noise that you can succeed in making—by cracking the leather of your boots, or the wood—will pass for a rap. When your audience is pretty far gone, you may trust to chance inspiration.

By making the room dark or light, they will appear to come from different parts of the room, provided you have first indicated the quarter from whence they are expected.

This is difficult to believe, but you or the genuine reader may be easily convinced by the following experiment: Place a glass tumbler and a shilling on the table, having another tumbler and a shilling concealed in your lap; hold the shilling between the thumb and finger, make three feints at the one in view, and three corresponding feats ride blows on the concealed tumbler; then ask the spectator how many times you struck the tumbler on the table; he will unhesitatingly reply three, as you will expect to do, when you when you state that you did not strike it even once. This is simply a type of an infinite series of similar deceptions.

FIGURE 9.

When you wish to answer questions with any degree of certainty, if you have not obtained private information, place an alphabet before the sitter, and tell him to point to the letters or repeat them aloud; you will easily, by acute observation, be enabled to detect a slight anxiety in tone or manner when the right letter is reached, and then rap accordingly.

Should you suppose that an individual requires the presence of his brother Charles's spirit, the inquiry will proceed as follows:

Q. Are any of my relations present?

A. Rub, rub, rub.

Q. Female?—(calmly).

A. Rub.

Q. Male?—(anxiously).

A. Rub, rub, rub.

Q. Will you spell your name?

A. Rub, rub, rub.

Q. A, B, C?—(interrogatively).

A. Rub, rub, rub.

Q. A, B, C, D, E, F, G, H?—(pauses).

A. Rub, rub, rub.

And so on until you have made him spell the entire name, to which in most cases he will assent. Then a choice of names written out is infinitely less tedious.

A word more, and we have, however, easily frustrate this process by running through the alphabet, and studiously avoiding all emphasis, or by designedly emphasizing it, which is worse, the wrong letter, so that you find you are compounding utter nonsense —that, in fact, he is leading the spirits by the nose to kick wild. Of course you get out of this difficulty by saying that the spirits are uncertain or capricious, or that, for the sake of mere fun, they willfully perplex you.

As soon as the spirits decline to rap correctly, or exhibit, if you please, you may suggest to the company that they may even be touched by spirit hands. To indicate their power, place a hand-bell underneath the table and ring it with your feet; then commence (by the methods already described) pulling the ladies' dresses and gentlemen's coats, shaking their feet and ankles, and even lifting their legs off the ground, by clasping them round the ankle, as in Figure 4. To operate upon each person with equal facility, frequent change of place will be necessary, and as it would not do for you to leave your seat, you rap out C, H, A, N, G, E, when this is desirable.

You may next invite a person to throw down a pencil, and hold a slate underneath the table; snatch it from him with your two feet, in the mode shown in Figure 9, and scribble it on the floor, feel about for the pencil with your feet, pick it up, and commence scratching on the slate to the best of your ability, relying on the sound to affect the company, while they are in a state of absurd suspense. If the writing be illegible, as it is nearly sure to be, say that it is very bad to-night, but that, on other evenings, the spirit autographs were remarkably clear, in proof of which you will exhibit some specimens written by hand and kept for the purpose. You can even assert that communications are frequently made in the hand-writings of different members of the company, and so avail yourself of a fib which none of the present company can contradict.

You may next place a Bible under the table for the spirits to turn over the leaves; of course you can kick them over with your feet, or as the book, on account of its thickness, refuses to keep open in one place, you can put your foot under it, and invite the sitters to look under the table and see the leaves turning over without your assistance. When the company have become thoroughly fascinated, you may slip your right foot under one leaf, place your left firmly on the page, and lifting the toe of your right foot, turn up the corner and bend it sharply down; then shut the book with your foot, lift it with both feet, thrust it into your neighbor's lap, and rap out that he is to open it. He will of course find the leaf turned down, and will be compelled by curiosity to find an application of the particular text. While he or others are this occupied, you may, if the opportunity present itself, place a wash-leather under the table and rub it backward and forward; but should previously satisfy yourself (this is very material) that he has no bottles—and not even boots with cork tops, or he will be enabled to detect, with painful certainty, that he is seized not by a single hand, but by a pair of feet encased in women's boots, and those boots without a doubt yours. After this he will cease to wonder at the electric influence inflicted on his ankles, or the facility with which you snatch articles from people's hands under the table.

You may now proceed to your crowning experiment, which consists in making the table rise clear off the ground, still maintaining its spiritual position. As a preliminary, you make it go through some extraordinary evolutions by alternately pressing and relaxing the tip with your hands, contrary to Michael Faraday's theory, by voluntary, and not involuntary muscular action. You then allow the agitated table a little respite while you cross the right leg over the left knee, and insert the end of your right foot under the bar which supports the column; maintain the pressure of your hands as you straighten your leg, and the table will rise perpendicularly about two feet from the ground.

Before, however, attempting this astounding feat, care should be taken that no wary person is sitting within reach, or he may dash out his foot, as a friend of mine did, and catch yours under the ankle, planting you to the table with your leg in the air, as in the illustration below, a position from which you will find great difficulty in evacuating yourself, without bringing the séance to an ignominious termination.

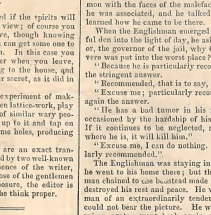

FIGURE 10.

You will probably be asked if the spirits will rap when your feet are in full view; of course you will answer in the affirmative, though how many well they will not, unless you can get some one to hammer in an adjoining room. In this case you should take away the hammer when you leave, especially if it does not belong to the house, and should not leave it to tell your secret, as it did in the case I refer to.

You should also avoid the experiment of making an old plumber's, with pen and ink-eyes, to preside when closed, in the presence of similar wary people, or they will surely walk up to it and tap on the wires through the very same holes, producing similar results.

The foregoing suggestions are an exact transcript of the deceptions practiced by two well-known London Mediums in the presence of the writer, who was together with those of the gentlemen who were present at the exposure, the editor is empowered to publish should he think proper.

THE
Uncommercial Traveler.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

THE rising of the Italian people from under their unutterable wrongs, and the tardy burst of day upon them after the long, long night of oppression that has darkened their beautiful country, have naturally caused my mind to dwell often of late on my own small wanderings in Italy. Connected with them is a curious little drama, in which the character I myself sustained was so very subordinate, that I may relate its story without any fear of being suspected of self-display. It is strictly a true story.

I am newly arrived, one summer evening, in a certain small town on the Mediterranean. Before I left England, there came to me one night a certain generous and gentle English nobleman (he is dead in these days when I relate the story, and exiles have lost honor but British honor is proud to respect: "Whenever you come to such a town, will you seek out one Giovanni Carlavero, who keeps a little wine-shop there, mention my name to him suddenly, and observe how it affects him?"

I accepted the trust, and am on my way to discharge it.

The sirocco has been blowing all day, and it is a hot, unwholesome evening with no cool sea breeze. Mosquitoes and fire-flies are lively enough, but most other creatures are faint. The coquettish airs of pretty peasant women, in the narrow wickedest of dolls' straw-hats, who lean out at opened latticed doors, are almost the only animation. Very ugly and haggard old women with distaffs, and with a grey tuft upon them that looks as if they were spinning out their own hair (I suppose they were once pretty, too, but it is very difficult to believe so), sit on the footway, leaning against house walls. Every body who has come for water to the fountain stays there, and seems incapable of any more energetic idea of going home.

I keep straight on, and come in due time to the first on the right: a narrow, dull street, where I see a well-favored man of good stature and military bearing, in a great cloak, standing at a door. Drawing nearer to this threshold, I see it is the threshold of a small, wine-shop; and I observe, make out, in the dim light, the inscription that it is kept by Giovanni Carlavero.

I touch my hat to the figure in the cloak, and pass in, and draw a stool to a little table. The lamp (just such another as they dig out of Pompeii) is lighted, but the place is empty. The figure in the cloak has followed me in, and stands before me.

"The master?"

"At your service, Sir."

"Please to give me a glass of the wine of the country."

He turns to a little counter to get it. As his striking face is pale, and his action is evidently that of an enfeebled man, I remark that I fear he has been ill. It is not much, he courteously and gravely answers, though bad while it lasts—the fever.

As he sets the wine on the little table, to his manifest surprise I lay my hand on the back of his, look him full in the face, and say, in a low voice, "I am an Englishman, and you are acquainted with a friend of mine. Do you recollect ——?" and I mention the name of my generous countryman.

Instantly he utters a loud cry, bursts into tears, and falls on his knees at my feet, clasping my legs in both his arms, and bowing his head to the ground.

Some years ago this man at my feet, whose overfraught heart is heaving as if it would burst from his breast, and whose tears are wet upon the dress I wear, was a galley-slave in the North of Italy. He was a political offender, having been concerned in the then last rising, and was sentenced to imprisonment for life. That he would have died in the dungeon of his cell, but for the circumstance that the Englishman happened to visit his prison.

It was one of the vile old prisons of Italy, and a part of it was below the waters of the harbor. The place at its confinement was on certain underground and underwater gallery, with a grill-gate at the entrance, through which it received such light and air as it got. The prisoners was insalubrity foul, and a stranger could hardly breathe in it, or see in it with the aid of a torch. At the prayer and the petition, and consequently in the worst position, as being the furthest removed from light and air, the Englishman first beheld him, sitting on an iron bedstead to which he was chained by a heavy chain. His countenance impressed the Englishman as having nothing in common with the faces of the malefactors with whom he was associated, and he talked with him, and learned how he came to be there.

When the Englishman emerged from the dreadful den into the light of day, he asked his conductor, the governor of the prison, if he knew what were the worst place?

"Decano is particularly recommended," was the stringent answer.

"Recommended, that is to say, for death?"

"Excuse my particularly recommended," was again the answer.

"He has a bad tumor in his neck, no doubt occasioned by the hardship he has undergone. If it continues to be neglected, and he remains where he is, it will kill him."

"Excuse me, I can do nothing. He is particularly recommended."

The Englishman was staying in that town, and he went to his home there; but the figure of this man chained to the bedstead made it no home, and destroyed his enjoyment of it. He was a brave man of an extraordinarily tender heart, and he could not bear the picture. He went back to the prison gate, went back to the cell, saw the man, talked to the man and cheered him. He used his utmost influence to get the man removed from the bedstead, were it only for ever so short a time in the day, and permitted to come to the grate. He took a bribe, but the Englishman knew that the governor, and steadiness of purpose were not opposition so far, and that grace was at last accorded. Through the bars of the grate this man got light upon the tumor, the Englishman lanced it, and it did well, and healed. His strong interest in the prisoner had become known some time, and he formed the desperate resolution that he would attempt his attempt unaided and use his utmost efforts to get Carlavero pardoned.

If the prisoner had been a brigand and a murderer, if he had committed any one of the many atrocities in the Newgate Calendar and out of it, nothing would have been easier than for a man of any court or priestly influence to procure his release; for it was, nothing could have been more difficult. Italian authorities, and English authorities also in the interest with them, alike assured the Englishman that his object was hopeless. He met with nothing but encouragement in the matter of his life. The prisoner became a joke in the place. It was especially observable that English Circumlocution and English Red-tape were thrown away. Every person on the subject as Circumlocution and Society may be on any subject without point of taste. And that Red-tape unwinded (and proved it well in his life) a coarse very uncommon among us: he had not the least fear of responsibility, and the least humane cause. So he went on persistently trying, and trying, and trying, to get Giovanni Carlavero set free. That prisoner had been a conspirator, and after the tumor operation, and it was not likely that his misery did not touch that very long.

One day, when all the town knew about the Englishman and his political prisoner, there came to the Englishman's house a stranger, of lowly estate of whom he had some knowledge; and he made this strange proposal: "Give me a hundred crowns to obtain Carlavero's pardon, Sir, and I can get him a pardon with that money. But I can not tell you what I am going to do with the money, nor must you ask me for an account of the money. I will keep it honestly, and account for it, and the hundred pounds. He did so, and heard not another word of the matter. For half a year and more that Alvarado remained in that town he once "took on" in any way, to have the subject on his mind. The Englishman was then obliged to change his residence to another and distant town in the North of Italy. He parted from the poor prisoner with a sorrowful heart, which he doomed man for whom there was no release but Death.

The Englishman lived in his new place of abode another half-year and more, and had no tidings of the wretched prisoner. At length, one day he received from his Advocate a note, which he opened, one note, to this effect: "If you still wish to bestow that benefit upon the man in whose you were once interested, send me fifty pounds more, and I think it can be managed." Now the Englishman had long settled in his mind that the Advocate was a heartless sharper, who had preyed upon his credulity and his interest in an unfortunate sufferer. So he sat down and wrote a letter, never giving the Advocate to understand that he was wiser than he had been supposed, and that no more money was extractable from his purse.

He lived outside the city gates, some mile or two from the post-office, and was accustomed to walk into the city with his letters and post them himself. On a lovely spring day, when the sky was exquisitely blue, and the sea divinely beautiful, he took his usual walk, carrying the letter to the Advocate in his pocket. As he went along his gentle heart was much moved by the loveliness of the prospect, and by the thought of the lovely, young prisoner chained to the bed-stead, for whom the universe had no delights. As he drew nearer and nearer to the city where he was to post the letter he became very uneasy in his mind. Deluded with himself, was it remotely possible, after all, that this man of fifty pounds could restore the fellow-creature whom he pitied so much, and for whom he had striven so hard, to liberty? He was not a conversational Arch Englishman—very far from that—but he had a spare fifty pounds at the banker's. He resolved to risk it. Without doubt God has recompensed him for the resolution.

He went to the banker's and got a bill for the amount, and inclosed it in a letter to the Advocate that I wish I could have seen. He simply told the Advocate that he was quite a poor man, and that he was sensible it might be a great weakness in him to part with so much money on the faith of so vague a communication: but that such it was, and that he prayed the Advocate to make a good use of it. If he did so, no good could ever come of it, and it would lie heavy on his soul one day.

Within a week, the Englishman was sitting at his breakfast, when he heard some suppressed sounds of agitation on the staircase, and Giovanni Carlavero fell at his feet, and fell upon his breast, a free man!

Conscious having wronged the Advocate in his own thoughts, the Englishman wrote him an earnest and grateful letter, avowing the fact, and entreating him to tell him what means, and through what agency, he had succeeded so well. The Advocate returned for answer through the post: "I have the honor to inform you that I am this Italy of ours, that are safest and best not even spoken of, or far less written of. We may meet some day, and then I will tell you what you want to know; not here, and now." But the two never did meet again. The Advocate died, and about what the Englishman gave me my trust; and how the man had been set free remained as great a mystery to the Englishman, and to the man himself, as it was to me.

But I knew this: here was the man, this sultry night, at my feet, and I knew, because I was the Englishman's friend; here were his tears upon my hands; here were his words choking his utterance; here was his kisses on my hands, because they had touched the hands that had worked out his release. So I knew, but left to tell me it would be impious to him to die for his benefactor. I doubt if I ever saw real, sterling, fervent gratitude of soul before or since.

He was much watched and suspected, he said, and had had enough to do to keep himself out of trouble. He had been hard hearing prisoner in his worldly affairs, had led to his having failed in his usual avocation, and was poor. He was poor in fact—as I now remember the period—some two or three years. But his prospects were brighter, and his wife, who had been very ill, had recovered, and his fever had left him, and he had bought a little vineyard, and would I carry to his benefactor the fruit of its vintage? I would (I will be true to him with enthusiasm), and not a drop of it should be drunk in the house.

He had cautiously closed the door before speaking of himself, and had talked with such excess of emotion, and in such impassioned Italian so difficult to understand, that I had more than once been obliged to stop him, and beg him to have compassion on me, and on his own interests, and be calm. But he came so, and tranquilly walked back with me to the hotel. Before I sat down indeed I went to bed and wrote a faithful account of him to the Englishman: which I concluded by saying that I would keep the wine home, against any difficulties, every drop.

Early next morning, when I came out at the hotel door to look about me, I found my friend waiting with one of those immense bottles in which the Italian peasants store their wine—a bottle holding, some half-dozen gallons—bound round with basket-work for greater safety on the journey. I will not say that, in the first moment, fear of the wine bale in his eyes, proudly inviting my attention to this corpulent bottle. At the street-corner, hard by, two Spanish, double-bodied mules were attending to talk together, but keeping their four evil eyes upon us.)

How the wine had been got there did not appear: but the difficulty of getting it into the roadside vetturino-cart, and of getting the bottle moving was so great, and it took up so much room when it was got in, that I elected to sit outside. The last I saw of my friend was his standing through the town by the side of the jingling wheels, chasing my hand as I stretched it down over the box, and parting from me with a thousand loving and dutiful messages to his dear patron, and finally basting in the air the bottle as it passed aside, with an admiration of its honorable way of traveling that was beyond measure delightful.

And now what shadow of mind this kindly-beloved and highly-treasured Bottle began to cast on me soon knows. It was my precious charge through a line of miles, and a hundredfold more it never had it off mind by day or by night. Over bad roads—and they were many—I clung to it with affectionate desperation. Up mountains I looked in at it, and saw it helplessly tilting over on its back with terror. At innumerable inndoors, when the weather was bad, I was obliged to be put into my vehicle before the Bottle could be got in, and was obliged to have the Bottle fed at odd before human aid could come near me. The legs of the same, except that his associations were all evil, and his associations were all good, would have been a less troublesome traveling companion. I might have served Mr. Crookshank as a subject for a new illustration of the miseries of the Bottle. The National Temperance Society might have made a powerful Tract of me.

The suspicions that attached to this innocent Bottle greatly aggravated my difficulties. It was like the apple-pie in the child's book. Parma posted at it, Modena mocked it, Tuscany cackled it, Naples nibbled it, Rome refused it, Austria accused it, Soldiers suspected it, Jesuits jobbed it. I composed it, Orations, decrees, and inoffensive intentions in connection with this Bottle, and delivered it in the infinity of guard-houses, at a multitude of town-gates, and on every drawbridge, nagle, and rampart of a complete system of fortifications. Fifty times a day I got down to harangue an infuriated soldiery about the Bottle. Through the filthy degradation of the abject and vile Roman States I had as much difficulty in working my way with the Bottle as if it had been half up a complete system of heretical theology. In the Neapolitan country, where every body was a spy, a soldier, a priest, or a lazarone, the shameless beggars of all four denominations incessantly pounced on the Bottle, and made it a pretext for extorting money from me. Quires—quires do I say? Reams—of forms illegibly printed on whitybrown paper were filled up about the Bottle, and it was the subject of more stamping and sealing than I had ever seen before. In consequence of which haze of sand, perhaps, it was always irregular, as I have said before with dismal penalties of going back, or not going forward, which were sure to be abated by the silver crossing of a base hand, a gold clutched out of a ragged pocket above. Under all discouragements, however, I stuck to my Bottle, and held firm to my resolution that every drop of its contents should reach the Bottle's destination.

The bitter refinement cost me a separate heap of troubles on its own separate account. What corkscrews did I see the military power bring out against that pitiful little gimlets, spirit-levels, sling-rods, gauges, and unknown tests and instruments! At some places they persisted in declaring that the wine must be poured out before being opened and tasted; I, pleading to the contrary, and then to argue the question seated on the Bottle lest they should turn it in spite of me. In the southern parts of Italy, more violent shrieking, gesticulating, gesticulating—more extreme vehemence of speech, and countenance, and action—went on about that Bottle than would attend fifty murders in a more Northern latitude. I was frequent functionaries out of their beds, in the dead of night. I have known half a dozen military lanterns to disport themselves at all points of a great sleeping Piazza, each lantern summoning some official creature out of some bed. I have sat upon it stantly, and come and stop the Bottle. It was characteristic that while this innocent Bottle had much immoral wine poured out of it, before it came to town, Signor Manzini and the fiery cross were traversing Italy from end to end.

Still I stuck to my Bottle like any fine old English gentleman all of the olden time. The more the Bottle was interfered with, the more I felt the name (if possible) in my first determination that my countryman should have it delivered to him first as the person whom he had so nobly restored to life and liberty had delivered it to me. If ever it have been ostimates in my days—and I may have been, and was one of two—I was passionate about the Bottle. But I made it a rule always to keep a pocket full of small coin at its service, and never to be out of temper in its cause. Thus I had the Bottle made our way. Once we had a smash-down—and a little breakdown—on a certain high place, with the sea below us, on a temperamous evening when it blew great guns. We were driving four wild horses abreast, Southern fashion, and there was some little difficulty in stopping them. I was outside, and not thrown off; but no words can describe my feelings when I saw the Bottle—traveling inside, as usual—burst the door open, and roll sheerly off into the sea. Thus I used

GREAT EASTERN DOCK.
THE VIADUCT OF EMBARKATION.

A SCORE OF YEARS AGO.

Down by the breaking waves we stood,
Upon the rocky shore;
The brave waves whisper'd courage,
And hid with friendly roar
The fall'ring words that told the tale
I dared not tell before.

I ask'd, if with the priceless gift,
Her love, my life she'd bless?
Was it her voice, or some fair wave—
For, sooth, I scarce may guess—
Some murmuring wave, or her sweet voice,
That lisp'd so sweetly "Yes."

And then, in happy silence, too,
I clasp'd her fair wee hand;
And long we stood there, carelessly,
While o'er the darkening land
The sun set, and the fishing-boats
Were sailing from the strand.

It seems not many days ago—
Like yesterday—no more,
Since thus we stood, my love and I,
Upon the rocky shore;
But I was four-and-twenty then,
And now I'm forty-four.

The lily hand is thinner now,
And in her sunny hair
I see some silvery lines, and on
Her brow some lines of care;
But, wrinkled brow, or silver locks,
She's not one whit less fair.

The fishing-boats a score of years
Go sailing from the strand;
The crimson sun a score of years
Sets o'er the darkening land;
And here to-night upon the cliff
We're standing hand-in-hand.

"My darling, there's our eldest girl,
Down on the rocks below;
What's Stanley doing by her side?"
My wife says, "You should know:
He's telling her what you told me
A score of years ago."

A DAY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER.

CHAPTER XV.

On entering the drawing-room his excellency presented me to an elderly lady, very thin and very wrinkled, who received me with a cold dignity, and then went on with her crochet-work. I could not catch her name, nor, indeed, was I thinking of it; my whole mind was bent upon the question, Who could she be? For what object was she there? All my terrible doubts of the morning now rushed forcibly back to my memory, and I felt that never had I detested a human being with the hate I conceived for her. The pretentious stiffness of her manner, the haughty self-possession she wore, were positive outrages; and, as I looked at her, I felt myself muttering, "Don't imagine that your heavy black move or your rich falls of lace impose upon us. Never fancy that this mock austerity deceives one who reads human nature as he reads his print. I know, and I abhor you, old woman! That a man should be to the other sex as a wolf to the fold, the sad experience of daily life too often teaches; but that a woman should be false to woman, that all the gentle instincts we love to think feminine should be debased to treachery and degraded into snares for betrayal, this is an offence that cries aloud to Heaven!

"No cream tea—none!" cried I, with an energy that nearly made the footman let the tray fall, and so far startled the old lady that she dropped her knitting with a faint cry. As for his excellency, he had covered his face with the Globe, and I believe was fast asleep.

I looked about for my hat to take my leave, when a sudden thought came on me. "I will stay, I will sit down beside this old creature, and, for once at least in her miserable life, she shall hear from the lips of a man a language that is not that of the debauchee. Who knows what effect one honest word of a true-hearted man may not work? I will try at all events," said I, and approached her. She did not, as I expected, make room for me on the sofa beside her, and I was therefore obliged to take a chair in front. This was so far awkward that it looked formal; it gave another bad character of accusation to my position, and I decided to obviate the difficulty by assuming a light, easy, cheerful manner at first, as tho' I suspected nothing.

"It's a pleasant little capital, this Kalbbratenstadt," said I, as I lay back in my chair.

"Is it?" said she, dryly, without looking up from her work.

"Well, I mean," said I, "it seems to have its reasonable share of resources. They have their theatre, and their music garden, and their promenades, and their drives—to—"

"You'll find all the names set down there," said she, handing a copy of Murray's Handbook that lay beside her.

"I care less for names than feats, Madam," said I, angrily, for her cruel sting had me, and routed all my previous intention of a smooth approach to the fortress. "I am a man of unfashionable habits, and never think the better of vice because it wears French gloves and goes perfumed with Eau Incomparable."

She took off her spectacles, wiped them, looked at me, and went on with her work without speaking.

"If I appear abrupt, Madam," said I, "in this opening, it is because the opportunity I now enjoy may never occur again, and may be of the briefest even now. We meet by what many would call an accident—one of those accidents which the thoughtless call chance directed my steps to this place; let me hope that that which seemed a hazard may have all the fruits of a natural combination, and that the weak words of one frail, even as yourself, may not be heard by you in vain. Let me ask you one, and only one question—only one—and give me an honest answer to it."

"You are a very singular person," said she, "and seem to have strangely forgotten the very simple circumstance that we meet for the first time now."

"I know it, I feel it; and that it may also be for the last and only time is my reason for this appeal to you. There are persons who, seeing you here, would treat you with a mock deference, address you with a counterfeit respect, and go their ways; who would say to their selfish hearts, 'It is none of mine, why should it trouble me?' But I am not one of these. I carry a conscience in my breast—a conscience that holds its daily count, and will even to-morrow ask me, 'Have you been truthful, have you been faithful? When the occasion served to warn a fellow-creature of the abyss before him, did you cry out, "Take soundings! you are in shallow water?" or, "Did you with slippery phrases gloss over the peril, because it involved no danger to yourself?'"

"Would that same conscience be kind enough to suggest that your present conduct is an impertinence, Sir?"

"So it might, Madam; just as the pilot is impertinent when he cries out, 'Hard, port! breakers ahead!'"

"I am therefore to infer, Sir," said she, with a calm dignity, "that my approach to a secret danger—of which I can have no knowledge—is a sufficient excuse for the employment of language on your part that, under a less urgent plea, had been offensive?"

"You are," said I, boldly.

"Speak out, then, Sir, and declare what it is."

"Nay, Madam, if the warning find no echo within, my words are useless. I have said I would ask you a question."

"Well, Sir, do so."

"Will you answer it frankly? Will you give it all the weight and influence it should bear, and reply to it with that truthful spirit that conceals nothing?"

"What is your question, Sir? You had better be sparely with it, for I don't much trust to my continued patience."

I arose at this, and, passing behind the back of my chair, leaned my arms on the upper rail, so as to confront her directly; and then, in the voice of an accusing spirit, said, "Old woman, do you know where you are going?"

"I protest, Sir," said she, rising, with an indignation I shall not forget—"I protest, Sir, you make me seriously doubt if I know where I am!"

"Then let me tell you, Madam," said I, with the voice of one determined to strike terror into her heart—"let me tell you; and may my words have the power to awaken you, even now, to the dreadful consequences of what you are about."

"Shalley! Shalley!" cried she, in amazement, "is this gentleman deranged, or is it but the passing effect of your conviviality?" And with this she swept out of the room, leaving me there alone, for I now perceive—what seemed also to have escaped her—that the minister had slipped quietly away some time before, and was doubtless at that same moment in the profoundest of slumbers.

I took my departure at once. There were no leave-takings to delay me, and I left the house in a mood little according with the spirit of one who had partaken of its hospitalities. I was constrained to admit I was the very reverse of satisfied with myself. It was cowardly and mean of me to wreak my anger on that old woman, and not upon him who was the really great offender. He it was I should have arraigned, and with the employment of a little artifice and some tact, how terrible I might have made even my jesting levity! how sarcastic my sneers at fashionable vice! Affecting utter ignorance about his life and habits, I could have incidentally thrown out little episodes of all the men who have wrecked their fortunes by abandoned habits. I would have pointed to this man who made a brilliant opening in the house, and that who had acquired such celebrity at the Bar; I would have shown the rising statesman tarnished, the future chief-justice disqualified; I would have said, "Let no man, however modest his station or unrecognized his locality, imagine that the world takes no note of his conduct; in every class it has its judged by its peers, and you and I, Doubleton, will as assuredly be arraigned before the bar of society as the pickpocket will be charged before the bank!"

I continued to revolve these and such-like thoughts throughout the entire night. The time I had spent wavered and excited me, and added to that disturbed state which my own self-accusing created. I doubt, too, that across my mind whether I ought not to have maintained a perfect silence toward the others, and reserved all my eloquence for the poor girl herself. I imagined myself taking her hand between both mine, while, with averted head, she sobbed as if her heart would break, and saying, "Be comforted, poor stricken deer! be comforted; I know all. One who is far from perfect himself sorrows with and compassionates you; he will be your friend, your adviser, your protector. I will restore you to that home you quitted in innocence. I will bring you back to that honey-suckled porch where your mom heart expanded in home affections." Nothing shall equal the refined delicacy of my manner; that mingled reserve and kindness—a tone of cross between a half-brother and a cousin of St. Paul's—shall win her over to repentance, and then to peace. How I fancied myself, at intervals of time, visiting that cottage, going, as the gardener watches some cherished plant, to gaze on the growing progress I had nurtured, and enjoy the luxury of seeing the once drooping flower expanding into fresh loveliness and perfume. "Yes, Potts, this would form one of those episodes you have so often longed to realize." And then I went on to fancy a long, heroic struggle between my love and that sentiment of respect for worldly opinion which is due to every man the years of conflict and wearing me down in health, but exalting me immensely in every moral consideration. Let the hour of crowning victory at last come. I should take her to my bosom, and say, "There is rest for thee here."

His excellency begs that you will call at the legation as early as you can this morning.' And a waiter, entering with the breakfast-tray and I now perceived that I had never gone to bed, or closed my eyes during the night.

"How did this message come?" I asked.

"By the chasseur of his excellency."

"And how addressed?"

"To the gentleman who dined yesterday at the legation."

"NO MORE TEA—NONE!" CRIED I," ETC.

I asked these questions to ascertain how far he persisted in the impertinence of giving me a name that was not mine, and I was glad to find that on this occasion no transgression had occurred.

I hesitated considerably about going to him. Was I to accept that slippery morality that says, "I see no more than I please in the man I dine with," or was I to go boldly on and denounce this offender to himself? What if he were to say, "Potts, let us play fair! Put your own name on the table, and let us see are you always on the square? Who is your father? How does he live? Why have you left home, and how? What of that horse you have—"

"No, no, not stolen—on my word, not stolen!"

"Well, ain't it ugly? Isn't the story one that any existing might, without even a spice of malevolence, make marvelously disagreeable? Is the tale such as you'd wish to herald you into any society you desired to mix with?" It was in this high, easy, and truly companionable style that conscience kept me company while I ate two eggs and a plate of buttered toast. "After all," thought I, "might it not prove a great mistake not to wait on him? How if, in our talk over politics last night, I may have dropped some remarkable expression, a keen appreciation of some distinguished, an extraordinary prediction of some coming crisis? Maybe it is in question me more fully about my 'views' of the state of Europe." Now I am rather given to "views of the state of Europe." I like that game of patience, formed by shuffling up all the governments of the Continent, and then seeing who is to have the most "tricks," who's to win all the kings, and who the knaves. "Yes," thought I, "this is what he is at. These diplomatic people are consummately clever at pumping; their great skill consists in extracting information from others and adapting it to their own uses. Their social position confers the great advantage of intercourse with whatever is remarkable for station, influence, and ability; and I think I hear his excellency muttering to himself, 'Remarkable man, that—keen view—great reach of thought—wish I could see more of him; must try what polite attentions may accomplish.' Well," said I, with a half-sigh, "it is the old story, See you non nobis; and I suppose it is one of the curses on Irishmen that, from Edmund Burke to Potts, they should be doomed to cross purses. I will go. What signifies it to me? I am none the poorer in disposing my knowledge thus is the nightingale in discussing her sweet music to the night air, and flooding the groves with waves of melody like her, I am none the less affluence that never fails me." And so I set out for the legation.

As I walked along through the garden a trinly-dressed French maid passed me, turned, and passed, with a look that had a certain significance. "It was Monsieur dined here yesterday?" said she, interrogatively; and as I smiled assent, she hinted me a very small-sealed note, and disappeared.

It bore no address but the word Mr. —, a strange, and very ceremonious one. "Mr. —. But, poor girl," thought I, "she knows me not as Potts, but as Protector. I am not the Individual, but the representative of the wide-spread benevolence that succors the weak and consoles the afflicted. I wonder has she been touched by my devotion? has she imagined—oh, that she would!—that I have followed her hither, that I have woven a vow to rescue and to save her? or is this note the cry of a sorrow-struck spirit, saying, 'Come to my aid ere I perish?'"

My fingers trembled as I broke the seal; I had to wipe a tear from my eye ere I could begin to read. My agitation was great—it was soon to be greater. The note contained very few words; they were these:

"SIR,—I have not communicated to my brother, Sir Shalley Doubleton, my circumstance of your unaccountable conduct yesterday evening. I hope that my reserve will be appreciated by you, and "I am, your faithful servant,

"MARTHA KEATES."

I did not faint, but I sat down on the grass, sick and faint, and I felt the great drops of cold perspiration burst out over my forehead and temples. "So," muttered I, "the venerable person I have been lecturing is his excellency's own sister! My exhortations to a changed life have been addressed to a lady doubtless as rigid in morals as austere in manners." Though I could recall none of the words I employed, I remembered but too well the lesson I intended to convey, and I shuddered with disgust at my own conduct. Many times have I heard severest censure on the preacher who has from the pulpit scattered words of doubtful application to numbers beneath; but here was I making a direct and most odious attack upon the life and habits of a lady of unimpeachable behavior! Oh, it was too—too bad! A whole year of sackcloth and ashes would not be penance for my impropriety. How could she have forgiven it? What consummate charity enabled her to pardon an offense so gross and so gratuitous? Or is it that she foresaw consequences so grave, in the event of disclosure, that she dreaded to provoke them? My conduct is not an angry brother, in such a case, be warranted in doing? Would the world call any vengeance exorbitant? I studied her letter over and over, "I hope my reserve will be appreciated by you." This may mean, 'I reserve the charge—I shall let over you as a hold for the future: divorce ever so little from the straight road, I will say,' 'Pots, stand forward and listen to your indictment." She may have some terrible task in view for me, some perilous mission of which I can not or will refuse. This old woman may be to me as was the Old Man of the Sea to Sinbad. I may be fated to carry her forever on my back, and die dread of her be a living nightmare to me. At such a price existence has no value. "I will be desperate." "Worse even than the bondage is the feeling that I am no longer, to my own heart, the great creature I love to think myself. Instead of Potts the generous, the high-spirited, the confiding, the self-denying, I am Potts the timorous, the torture-stricken, and the base.

Out of my long and painful musings on the subject I bethought me of a course to take; I would go to her and say:

"Listen to this parable: I remember once, when a mere boy, a shrunken giant of a rapid brook just was played off upon the society by some one presenting us with the cast of a well-known murderer's face, as a cheap token for our contributions of its development. We gave them with every care and deliberation; we pointed out the fatal prominences of crime, and admired the depressions, which showed the absence of all prudential restraint; we demonstrated on the evidences of badness that were there, and proved that, with such a head, a man must have thought killing no murder. The rejoinder to our readiness was a small box that arrived by the mail, labeled, 'The original of the cast forwarded on the 14th.' We opened it, and found a plaster cast. The foolish jester fancied that he had cast an indelible quiz upon phrenology, and ignorant of the fact that his pumpkin had personated a skull which, had it ever existed, would have presented the characteristics we gave it." I would say, "Now, Madam, make the application, and say, do you not rather commend than condemn? are you not more ready to applaud than to upbraid me?"

Second thoughts rather deterred me from this plan; the figurative line is often dangerous with elderly people. It is just as likely she would mistake the whole force of my illustration, and bluntly say, "I'd beg to remark, Sir, I am not a pumpkin!"

"No. I will make adventure on this path; there is no need that I should ever meet her again, or, if I should, we may meet as utter strangers." The resolve made, I started up, and walked on toward the house.

His excellency, I learned, was at home, and had been for some time expecting me. I found him in his morning-room, in the same costume and much the same ease as on the day before.

"There's the Times," said he, as I entered; "I shall be ready for you presently," and worked away without raising his head.

Affecting to read, I set myself to regard him with attention. Vast piles of papers had arisen on him on every side; the whole table, and even the floor at his feet, was littered with them. "Would," thought I, "would that the writers for the Radical press, these scurrilous penny-a-liners who inveigh against a bloated and pampered aristocracy, could just witness the daily life of labor of one of these spoiled children of fortune. Here is this man, doubtless reared in ease and affluence, and see him how he toils away, from sundown to dawn, unraveling the schemes, tracing the wiles, and exposing the snares of these crafty foreigners. Mark! he is mustering over the subtle sentence he has just written: I am not grieved about Sharp's love for girl, but I hope she will escape being marked by the malady." A groan that broke from me here startled him, and he looked up:

"Ah! yes, by-the-way, I wants you, Paynter."

"I am not Paynter, your excellency. My name is—"

"Of course, you have your own name, for your own purposes, I dare say; but don't tease me, have a special service for you, and will put it in the 'extraordinary.' I have taken a little villa on the Lake of Como for my sister, but from the pressure of political events I am not able to accompany her there. She is a very timid traveler, and can not possibly go alone. You'll take charge of her, therefore, Paynter—there, don't be fussy—you'll take charge of her, and a young lady who is with her, and you'll see them housed and established there. I suppose she will prefer to travel slowly, some thirty miles or so a day, post-horses always, and strictly avoiding railroads; but you can talk it over together yourselves. There was a Bobus to have come out—"

"A Bobus!"

"I mean a doctor—I call every doctor Bobus —but something has detained him, or, indeed, I believe he was drowned at all events, he's not come, and you'll have to learn how to measure out either, and drop morphine; the 'companion' will help you. And keep an account of your expenses, Paynter—your own expenses for H.-O.—and don't let her fall sick at any out-of-the-way place. You know all that may be wise in doing; and, above all, don't telegraph on any account. Good-day, Paynter."

"If you will excuse me at dinner, I shall be obliged. I have a sort of half engagement."

"Come in your own time, then," said he, "for she'd like to talk over some matters. Look out for a carriage, too; I don't fancy giving mine if you can get another. Some of those great roomy German things with a cabriolet front, if possible, for Miss—I forget her name—would prefer a place outside. Kramm, the landlord, can help you to search for one; and let it be dusted, aired, and fumigated, and the dogs examined, and the axles greased—in a word, have your brains about you, Paynter. Good-by." Exit as before.

HOW TO MAKE AN ARMSTRONG GUN.

A VISITOR to the Woolwich Arsenal and works who has never seen an Armstrong gun, must, as he witnesses its successive stages of its construction, be sorely puzzled to conceive what it will look like when completed.

Imagine a very long thin bar of the finest iron, some 2 inches square, and 120 feet in length—that is 10 iron rods of 12-pounder size. In the course of the manufacture, this bore is divided into three pieces of about 40 feet in length. A 100-pounder requires three pieces each 20 feet long. Each of the manufacture commences in the forging-shop, a vast, dingy shed, where there is an incessant din of hammers and roaring of mighty furnaces, where blocks and bars of iron lie scattered in seeming confusion on every side—and, indeed, everything at white heat; there, glowing red-hot; in one corner, sending forth showers of sparks under the direction of a large steam-hammer; in another, rapidly rising and spattering under a stream of water; where stalwart, grimy men, with uprolled shirt-sleeves, vast, and leather aprons, are busily engaged, amid the smoke, or in the full glare of the fires, tossing steel rod-bars with the indifference of sailor seamen, and making the anvils ring with thirty Cyclops' power. We fix our eyes on a long narrow bar of iron, which is being rolled into a spiral as it spoke of. Suddenly the door is opened, and a fierce, bright gleam of light is cast through the shop. One of the men seizes the end of the bar with a pair of levers, drags it forth, and makes it fast to a roller which stands immediately before the furnace, and the diameter of which is exactly that of the interior tube of a 25-pounder when first rolled. The roller is put in motion by a steam-engine, and the iron, wound round it, just as one might wind a piece of thread round a reel. The roller being turned on end, the spiral is withdrawn from it. The operation is knocked off, restored to white heat in another furnace—for it has cooled somewhat in the rolling—and then flattened and welded together under one of the steam-hammers till only about half as long as it was. A 25-pounder, the length of the coil after this process is 25 feet; and three such coils are welded together to form the tube. Before that operation is performed, however, a small pin is inserted in the inside, and pared on the outside to within a very little of its proper diameter, so that the slightest blow due to the welding, if any there may be, is detected. Having passed this test, a couple of coils, brought to a proper heat by being placed end to end in a set of furnaces, blast-forced, are welded by violent blows from a huge iron battering-ram. A third coil is then added to the other two in the same manner, and the tube is complete. Over this a second tube, which has been prepared just in the same way, is passed, and similarly welded, except as it coils becomes tightly fastened. This is termed "shrinking on." Over this again is placed a third, massive tube of forged iron, to which the trunnions or handles of the gun are attached. The breech, which has now been added, is composed of several iron slabs, something like the staves of a barrel, which are beat into a cylindrical form, and welded at the end to the rod-bar under the steam-hammer. In the breech, the fibre of the metal runs in the direction of the length of the gun, while in the rest of the gun it runs round and round transversely. This is done to give greater strength to the breech in sustaining the whole backward thrust of the explosion. The breech thus formed is "shrunk on" to the rest of the gun; and to add still more to its strength, two double coils of wrought iron are rolled on with the fibre at right angles to that of the breech underneath.

So much for the iron to be used; we are now come to the finer and more delicate processes. Having been bored from end to end, and to the proper size, the gun passes to the reamers, who, with an instrument called a micrometer, measure within parts of a hundredth accuracy. The slightest deviation of any portion from its exact size, even to the fraction of a hair's breadth, is rigidly pointed out, and the error removed. The boring and rifling of the piece are next performed in a large, tidy, well-lighted room, where there is no noise, or smoke, or confusion, as in the forging-shop. The gun is placed erect in the boring-machine, and revolves gently round the big gimlet, which slowly but surely makes its way downward, scooping out the superfluous metal from the interior of the tube.

Where the touch-hole of an ordinary gun would be, a square hole is cut for the introduction of the rest-piece or stopper, which, with the breech-screw, completes the gun. The stopper is a circular piece of steel, faced with copper, which fits into the end of the rifled barrel with the most exact nicety. Upon this little piece of metal depends, in a great measure, the efficiency of the gun; because, unless it hermetically closed the cavity, a portion of the explosive force would escape, and the discharge would be weakened. The copper facing of the stopper is prepared with great care. It has to be sharpened with a file after it has so many rounds, and a duplicate accompanies every gun. The touch-hole runs through the vent-piece down into the chamber of the gun. The breech of the gun receives a powerful hollow screw, which presses against the ventpiece, and is easily tightened or loosened by means of a common wrighted handle. When the stopper is out, the gun is a hollow tube from end to end. We are now shown how the gun is used.

"When you want to fire the gun," says our attendant, "you must of course slacken the screw, and take out the stopper. You then thrust the shot, with a cartridge and a greased wad, through the hollow screw, into the bore, drop the vent-piece into its place, and make it tight with half a turn of the screw. You fire the gun with an ordinary friction-tube and string, as with any gun.

"How long does it take to turn out one of these pieces?"

"Why, taking the number of guns turned out within a certain period, and the number of working-hours in the same time, we find the rate of production at Woolwich is one gun for every 3½ working hours. Down at Elswick, Sir William's own factory, they are quite so quick. Takes little, individually, though, a single gun, from first to last, is a six or seven weeks' job."

"And what does it cost the cost of each gun?"

"An Armstrong 12-pounder costs about £250, only £50 more than an ordinary gun of the same weight; but then it is so much lighter (only eight cwt., while the old gun is nineteen cwt.), and can be worked so much more simply and quickly, and requires fewer men and horses than the other, it is really by far the cheaper of the two."

"Then as to the capabilities of the gun—is there any truth in the story of the wild goose being hit at five miles?"

"Why, no, our 100-pounder is expected to obtain a range of ten miles. The 13-pounder can take a target at about two and a quarter miles; and I've heard the gunners say that they undertake never to miss a man once at a mile. The longest range yet obtained has been 5000 yards, or over five miles, with a 32-pounder."

Length of range, however, becomes, beyond a certain point, of very little consequence. All practical artillerymen agree that usually the range in battle is limited to about 1500 yards, and under many circumstances, as not exceed 3000 yards, as any further point can not be seen, even with good glasses. The "smashing" power of the gun itself, that beyond a certain distance, range for general purposes has no practical value, and that artillerymen will prefer to fire at the moon as any object five miles off without any thing to guide them but the eye. The great question is, what effect has the gun till that time when it reaches its destination. Consequently, he has given as much thought to the construction of a projectile as of a gun, and has succeeded in inventing one of the most destructive character. It can be used either as a round shot, as a common shell, or as canister. It consists of a very thin cast-iron shell, filled with forty-two pieces of cast iron, which are built up so as to leave a space in the centre for the receptacle of the bursting charge. The exterior of the shell is thinly coated with lead, to make it take the rifling, and when the shell bursts, it spreads into a cloud of pieces, each of which flies forward at the same rate as that at which the shell was moving when it exploded. A shell was let off, by way of experiment, in a closed chamber, and burst into 212 pieces. In favor of an ingenious timed-fuse and oft-renewed engagements.

Burnett's Cocoaine.

BURNETT'S COCOAINE.—We had heard a great deal in reference to this article as a restorative and renovator of the human hair, but were never disposed at first to consider many of the statements exaggerated. A friend of ours who had lately been so ill as to have his head shaved, was induced, at our suggestion, to give it a trial. The result is, that in a week a very perceptible difference can be seen in the growth of the patient's hair. His manners us that he is thoroughly convinced of its beneficial effect from his own experience, and is fully determined to continue its use.—Westmoreland Times, N. B.

The following Extracts from a few of many Testimonials giving evidence of the efficiency of

Brown's Bronchial Troches,
OR COUGH LOZENGES,

may be read with interest by PUBLIC SPEAKERS, SINGERS, and others requiring the same article.

"A specific for that trouble in my throat which has often made me a whisperer."—N. P. Willis.

From Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, who has used the Troches for years.—"I have never changed my mind respecting them from the first, except to think yet better of that which I began in thinking well of. I do not believe to say that in so far as I have had an opportunity of comparison, your Troches are pre-eminently the best, and the first, of the great Lozenge School."

From Rev. E. H. Chapin, D.D., New York.—"I consider your Lozenges an excellent article for their purpose, and recommend their use to Public Speakers."

From Mr. C. H. Gardner, Principal of the Rutger's Female Institute, New York.—"I have been afflicted with Bronchitis during the past winter, and have found no relief until I found your Troches."

The Grover & Baker
Noiseless
Family Sewing Machine

Is rapidly acquainting all ashore for family use. The Noiseless Lock-Stitch invented by this Machine is found to be the only one which survives the wash-tub on linen seams, and, therefore, the only one permanently valuable for Family Sewing.

READ THE FOLLOWING TESTIMONY:

"MR. JEFFERSON DAVIS presents her compliments to Grover & Baker, and takes pleasure in saying that Mrs. Davis used one of their Machines for two years, and finds it still in good order, and does beautiful stitch, and does easily work of any kind."—Washington, D. C.

"I have used Grover & Baker's, that the Grover & Baker Sewing Machines have more than sustained my expectations. They are the most astonishing others. I have two of them in operation in my different places, and, after four years' hard use, they are as good as new."—H. Hammond, Senator, of South Carolina.

"My wife has used Grover & Baker's Family Sewing Machines for some time, and I am satisfied it is one of the best labor-saving machines that has been invented. I take much pleasure in recommending it to the public."—L. G. Harris, Governor of Tennessee.

"The Grover & Baker Sewing Machine has performed fully equal to representations. My own clothes were made with it last fall, and again this spring; and the clothes for Governor were also being made with it. The coarsest kersey, lowells, denims, etc., were used for the fabrics. It has sewn every variety of articles, such as calicoes, etc., for family wear. I am perfectly satisfied with it, and would not be without it on the first terms the cost of it."—Hon. Judge McGuire, Monroe, La.

"On the recommendation of a friend, I purchased, some months since, one of your Family Sewing Machines, which has given entire satisfaction from the start, without any accident or difficulty whatever in its management. My wife says it is a 'family blessing,' and could not be induced to exchange it for any other. In all of which I most heartily concur."—James Pollock, Ex-Governor of Pennsylvania.

Close of the Twenty-First Volume.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
For November, 1860.

The present Number completes the Twenty-first Volume of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE. The Publishers congratulate the public upon the character of the Magazine, and it is fully equal to any which has preceded it.

Special attention has been given to papers upon American History, Biography, Character, and Scenery. This department of the Magazine has met with such general approval that it will be maintained in the same spirit hereafter. Volumes of the Magazine, every part of our country shall be fully illustrated with the best artists.

The Publishers present their thanks to numerous Correspondents who, in suggesting subjects, have shown attention and hospitality to the Artists and Writers to whom the preparation of these articles was intrusted.

They also thank the thousands of Voluntary Correspondents by whose aid the "Editor's Drawer" is enabled to offer the largest collection of amusing anecdotes ever published.

The Publishers believe that the present Volume gives abundant evidence that the Magazine will still be found worthy of the liberal support which it has received for the last ten years.

A complete Set of HARPER'S MAGAZINE will be a desirable acquisition to any public or private library. Besides the Tales, Poems, and Essays which form the leading features of Periodical Literature, each Number of the Magazine has contained articles of permanent value. Nearly Two Hundred Papers, illustrated by more than Two Thousand Engravings, have been devoted to American History, Biography, Industry, Literature, and Scenery. Each of our great Agricultural States has been made the subject of elaborate articles. The results of the experiments of travelers in regions heretofore undescribed have been carefully recorded. The Fine Arts have received liberal encouragement of more than two thousand books, comprising almost every work of importance which has been issued from the American press during the last ten years. The "Monthly Record of Current Events," filling a valuable place in each Number, contains matter sufficient to fill several volumes of the ordinary size, and constitutes a History which furnishes a more complete history of the last ten years than is to be found in any other publication.

The Publishers of HARPER'S MAGAZINE, aware of its permanent value, have collected and published it. They can, therefore, supply any Number from the beginning upon the following terms:

HARPER'S MAGAZINE will be sent by Mail, post-paid, for One Cent, One Year, Volumes, comprising Six Numbers, neatly bound in Cloth, will be sent by Mail, or Express, to the United States within 3000 miles of New York, post-paid, for Two Dollars per Volume. Complete Sets will be sent by Express, the freight at the charge of the purchaser, at a Discount of Fifty Per Cent. from the above rates. Twenty-one Volumes, bound uniformly, extending from June, 1850, to November, 1860, are now ready.

HON. ABRAHAM LINCOLN, BORN IN KENTUCKY, FEBRUARY 12, 1809.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

SENT TO HEAVEN.

I had a message to send her,
To her whom my soul loved best;
But I had my task to finish,
And she had gone home to rest.

To rest in the far bright heaven—
Oh, so far away from here!
It was vain to speak to my darling,
For I knew she could not hear.

I had a message to send her,
So tender, and true, and sweet;
I longed for an angel to bear it,
And lay it down at her feet.

I placed it one summer evening
On a little white cloud's breast;
But it faded in golden splendor,
And died in the crimson west.

I gave it the lark, next morning,
And I watched it soar and soar;
But its pinions grew faint and weary,
And it fluttered to earth once more.

To the heart of a rose I told it;
And the perfume, sweet and rare,
Growing faint on the blue bright ether,
Was lost in the balmy air.

I laid it upon a censer,
And I saw the incense rise;
But its clouds of rolling silver
Could not reach the far blue skies.

I cried in my passionate longing:
"Has the earth no angel friend
Who will carry my love the message
That my heart desires to send?"

Then I heard a strain of music,
So mighty, so pure, so clear,
That my very sorrow was silent,
And my heart stood still to hear.

And I felt in my soul's deep yearning
At last the sure answer stir—
"The music will go to heaven,
And carry my thought to her."

It rose in harmonious rushing
Of mingled voices and strings,
And I tenderly laid my message
On the music's outspread wings.

I heard it float farther and farther,
In sound more perfect than speech—
Farther than sight can follow,
Farther than soul can reach.

And I know that at last my message
Has passed through the golden gate;
So my heart is no longer restless,
And I am content to wait.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1860.

THE PANIC IN WALL STREET.

WITHIN the past fortnight a panic has prevailed in Wall Street, and stocks of all descriptions have declined from 10 to 15 per cent. Such an event, occurring simultaneously with the most bountiful crops and the most remarkable development of material wealth this country has ever known, has naturally puzzled the public, and given rise to much surprise and conjecture.

On one side we hear that the panic was fictitious; that it was created by Democratic politicians, aided by influential Democratic presses, in the hope of preventing the State of New York from voting for Lincoln. In support of this view it is alleged that Mr. Cobb, the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Schell, the Collector of this port, and other leading politicians, appeared in Wall Street, and gave their personal assurance to the brokers that the Union could not survive Lincoln's election; that combinations were effected between politicians and stock-jobbers by which stocks were borrowed and sold for cash in unusual quantities, in order to depress prices; and that the "moral" of the panic, as deduced by its chief exponent, was that nothing but the success of Mr. Fusion ticket could save the Union. This is one theory.

On another hand, it is stated that the panic really grew out of the fears aroused by the movement in the Southern States. Though at New Orleans all is quiet, and every body seeks peace, throughout the States of Alabama, Mississippi, South Carolina, and Georgia, great excitement prevails; and if any reliance can be placed upon the statements of the politicians and the newspapers of those States, the election of Lincoln will not be tolerated without a struggle. What form that struggle may take remains to be seen. We know that, immediately after the election of Lincoln, popular conventions will be summoned by the Governors of Alabama, Mississippi, and South Carolina, to consider whether the crisis requires action on the part of those States; and we have every reason to believe that very decided ground will be taken by South Carolina, at all events. What will be the upshot of the whole no one can tell. We are led to believe that the feeling in South Carolina—as in Georgia and Alabama—is growing less favorable to separate action, and that, in all probability, each State will wait for the others. But in the mean time there can be no question but, pending the discussion, uneasiness will pervade the country, and all the markets will be feverish.

A variety of minor sources of anxiety are already contributing to produce this result. It is impossible to reflect upon the new attitude of Governor Wise, of Virginia, without alarm. His well-known energy, his want of prudence, his popularity, and the popularity of his scheme for making Virginia the manufacturing centre of a Southern Confederacy, insure great significance to his present hostility to submission, and to his antagonism with Governor Letcher. Again, the cotton crop will fall off considerably. It is quite likely that this is due in part to accident and the usual causes. The receipts last year were the largest which ever before are compared, were unusually heavy; but still there is the fact; and coupled with the rumored determination of the Southern States to withhold their cotton in order to create trouble at the North, it must be admitted that it is disquieting. The action of the Southern banks, though strictly legitimate, has been calculated to strengthen confidence. Business of a profitable character, growing out of the movements in cotton, has been created, which they have been declining long paper, or, in the words of the political journals, refusing all paper maturing after the election. This creates trouble at the South, and vague uneasiness at the North.

The theory of many persons is that these causes of distrust have been the sole source of the recent panic in Wall Street.

It is probable that there is some truth in both theories. The politicians could not have frightened people had there not been some cause for alarm; nor, on the other hand, would that alarm have been so quickly felt and so strongly expressed had it been left to find its own way to men's breasts.

The truth of this country is so largely dependent on the preservation of confidence, and each interest is so closely interwoven with every other, that the whole fabric is liable to succumb to the least blow in any quarter. Those who doubt that it is in the power of a few Southern politicians to produce a panic should look at that of 1857 display ignorance both of history and of the commerce of the country. Whether Southerners may choose to do so or not is another matter: that they have the power is beyond all question. The withholding of a few hundred thousand bales of cotton, and the cessation of purchases of goods, would cause the Northern markets, would not, of themselves, be fatal to commerce, though they could not but cause misfortune and loss. But the combination of these measures would probably create an alarm far greater than the late Wall Street panic, and possibly destructive of that confidence without which no mercantile business can be conducted for an hour. Nor is it safe to rely upon the disinterestedness of the South, the conservative tendencies of its commercial classes, for history teaches that, in times of political excitement, the appeals of trade are invariably disregarded, and money interests are forgotten. We do not probably never was a war that was not undertaken contrary to the wishes and in the teeth of the commercial interests of the country. Such contains no example of a popular excitement rising to boiling heat, and then listening to mercantile appeals for forbearance.

By the time these lines are read the election will be over, and we can not, therefore, be suspected of partisan purposes. We write in sober earnest, seeing no danger, and wishing that all good citizens, seeing it as we do, may not to the best of their ability to avert it while it is yet time.

THE LOUNGER.

PEEPING.

PEEPING into the next number of the Cornhill (it is not published in England yet), the Lounger gets a charming paper by the editor, "A Roundabout Journey." He ran away for a week from London. For a week he was in France and Holland. He saw famous cities and beautiful pictures, and had all the delightful feast of foreign travel for seven days. That is where the Britisher has us on the hip. They can run across the channel in an hour or two hours. We must expect two weeks. By the time we are fully recovered—they are looking at the Madonna and the rest, and hearing the sweet chimes of Antwerp and Bruges. It is a happy chance, for Europe seems quite near to Boston as to London as from New York.

The paper of Thackeray's from which the Lounger quotes copiously is in his ruliest and most genial vein:

"We must of us tell old stories in our families. The wife and children laugh for the hundredth time at the joke. The old servants though old servants are fewer every day) nod and smile a recognition at the well-known anecdote. 'Don't tell that story of Grouse in the gun-room,' says Dicgory to Mrs. Hardcastle in the play. 'I have heard it,' says Mrs. Hardcastle, and grow old and forgetful, we may tell an old story; so, out of mere benevolence, and a wish to amuse a friend when conversation is flagging, diddier a Joe Miller now and then; but the practice is bad, quite honest, and entails a certain necessity of hypocrisy on story hearers and tellers. It is a sad thing, to think that a man with whom you call a fund of anecdote is a tumbling, mirre or less amiable and pleasant. What right have I to tell my 'Cousine and the gun-room' over and over in the presence of my wife, husband, mother-in-law, sons, daughters, old fortunes, or perhaps small, confidential clerks, curates, or what not? I smirk and go through the history, grinning my stimulated recollection of the characters introduced: I mimic Jones's grin, Hicks's squint, Brown's stammer, Grady's brogue, Smith's South accent, to the best of my power; and the family part of my audience laughs good-humoredly. Perhaps the stranger, for whose amusement the story is told, laughs, too, in a manner but is, and laughs too. But this practice continued is not honest. Time changes on your party, my dear old friends, families, is weak, vain—not to say culpable. I can imagine that a young lady, with a pretty, arch, saucy look and lisp, says, and seems to the present sentence, lying back in his chair, thinking of that story which he has told innocently for fifty years, 'Papa, you've told that story quite enough.' Well, well, it is wrong: I have no right to call on my dear wife to laugh, my daughters to affect to be amused, that old, old jest of mine. And they would have gone on laughing, and they would have pretended to be amused, to their dying day, if this mask had not flung his danger over her blushes.' . . . They love the pun, and think, that there my old stories which I still tell myself in the bosom of my family? Here I say 'Grouse in my gun-room?' Why, I have said it in the presence my nursery tale: but because I want applause, and wantonly repeat myself. You see, as with the old stories with my wife and myself, we repeat the same story to the same individual; but they do them-selves as a matter of courtesy, the politeness of a man who can not help be honorably tried. I meet men walking the London street, hearing the best regardless of the wonderful pun-ers: I know such, who very likely will read this, and say, 'Hang the fellow, he means me.' And so I do. So—you see—as I do myself, and more than them. It is wrong, unless he is sure he is speaking only to give pleasure to his audience, to repeat a story. It is not a new story to the reader which makes him open his jaws.

"And is it not with writers as with raconteurs? Ought they not to have their ingenuum modesty? May authors tell old stories, and do their trainer ever? When I have looked at a place which I have visited any time these twenty or thirty years, I recall not the place merely, but the impression which I had on seeing it, and which was not different to my feelings to-day. This first day at Calais, the voices of the women crying fish about, as the vessel came alongside the pier; the supper at Quillacq's and the bed-keeper in the night-cap; the red-calico curtains over the which I slept; the tiled floor, and the fresh smell of the sheets; the sunshine coming in at the window; the ragout—all return with perfect clearness to my mind, and I am seeing them, and not the objects which are actually before me. . . . Memory is a strange faculty. I wonder is that commoner I know herein this score of years. Here are the two gendarmes standing at the door, and the baggage: the people at the passport-barrier who take your papers. My two people, I hardly see them. They have no interest on them a dozen orange women in Covent Garden, or a shop boy who keeps the door open. But you make me aware of a time when you were indeed wonderful to behold—when the little French soldiers were white cockades in their shako—when the fish-women were forty hours going to Paris; and the great-toothed postillion, as surveyed by the wonder-struck eyes of childhood, with his queue, his rose of rope for the harness, and his clubbed pigtail, was a wonderful object, the contemplation of endless amazement. You young folks don't remember the apple-stalls who used to follow the diligence to the end of Redgate, and sell you the delights of the jolly road? In making continental journeys with young folks, an elderly man by very quiet means, and without appearing melancholy, has really had the gone back to the days of his youth, and he is revelling in a spiritual repast of age on the economy box, and the amusing himself with all his might. He is noting the horses as they cross upon the road of post-house yard at midnight; he is enjoying the delicious meals at Beauvais and Amiens, and quaffing of bidetons the ale—Bass's Pale ale: he is half-fellow with the conductor, and alive to all the incidents of the road. A man can't do this and be a fool, and at the same time, don't you see? Bodily, I may be in 1860 years, silent, torpid; but in the spirit I am walking about in 1815, I say—in a blue dress coat and brass buttons, a sweet figured silk waistcoat, which I button under the cover with perfect neatness, looking at breakfast beings with glazed sleeves and tea-trays hats under the golden chestnuts of the Tuileries or round the Place Vendôme, where the drapeau blanc is floating from the statutes column. Shall we go and dine at Beauvais's, and see the Duke of Berri, or at the Café Anglais?—Away! Bombards's and the Hôtel Breteuil have been pulled down ever so long. They knocked down the poor old Virginia Coffee-house last year. My spirit goes back times time. . . . Why should not I tell over and over to many people in a railway carriage, and no wonder my companions fall asleep and grow silent. How you can remember Owen's 'Footsteps on the Confines of Another World?'—My dear Sir, it will make your hair stand quite perpendicular! Or Mr. Smith's work you will read that often gentlemen's or ladies' spirits travel off a few score of thousand miles from the body, and leave the body quite cold in a rapid state in their beds or in their arm-chairs. Why, I have been in a state of clairvoyance for a whole week away thirty years back into the past. I am looking out of the window of the Hôtel de Ville at Ghent, and hearing Byron's poems, and pretend that I like Wordsworth and think much better. Nothing I eat or drink can make me disagree with me. I know when I think to be the most lovely creatures in the world. Ah, dear maid of the many mansions (the commercial par'or), am I your wife or widow now?—are you dead?—are you thin and withered and old—or have you grown much stouter, with a false front? and so forth.

"CARLISLE.—I was awakened this morning with the Cathedral—Who Antony cathedral clock plays at half-hours, and tells the time has been on ever since, so I was told. You dress, eat, drink, walk, and talk to yourself to their tune: their incredible jingle accompanies you all day: it goes into your dreams, and the paper to their rhythm. I tried successfully to imitate the tune to the ladies of the house, by whom it was much admired. Is it a shadow dance of Dinorah? It may be so. I dimly remember that my self-same tune was performed on the performance of the bears, while my eyes were closed, and my intellectual faculties were engaged in the Land of Nod. Perhaps I have learned that shadow dance from hearing it pealing up over us high in the air, at night, morn, noon.

"Last night I was in bed at one, and left to the cheery peal: while the old city is asleep at midnight, or waking up by my watch, and thinking in noon, or noon, or the sounding rain which drives in gusts over the broad places, and the great shaking river; or sparkling in snow which dresses up a hundred thousand roofs, peaks, and towers; or wrapped round with thunder-cloud canopies, before which the white gables shine whiter; day and night the kind little carillon plays its fantastic melodies overhead. The bells go on ringing: Quod vivos vocant, mortuos plangunt, fulgura frangunt; on to the next and further, and further, and further, and further. . . . And so. While the French were pitching their palgues into Ghent's citadel, the bells went on ringing quite cheerfully. While the scaffolds were up and guarded by Alva's soldiery, and regiments of pointless, idiot, black, drab, grey, pouted out of churches and convents, dressing their ranks, and marching to the place of the Hôtel de Ville, where heretics and rebels were to meet their doom, the bells up yonder were chanting at their appointed half-hours and quarters, and sung the manuscrit quare d'heure for many a poor soul. This bell can also as far away as the towers and dikes of Rotterdam. This one can tell a greeting to St. Ursula's at Brussels, and toss a recognition to that one at the turn-bull of Culloden, and remember how, after a great struggle there a hundred and fifty years ago, the white plaid was carried with the dying French chivalry—Dugnesky, and Berri, and the Chevalier of St. George. Spring like to the last. What a time between those Outlands!" says another bell (Bob Major this one must be). "Be still, you impertinent old clapper! I can see over to Hougoumont and St. John, and the forty-five years since I rang all through one Sunday in June, when there was such a battle going. Back to the river! Soon as none of you others ever heard tell of. Yes, from morning service to evening service, with bells and English were all at it, ding-dong." And then calls of business intervene, and the bells have to give up their jangle, resume their professional duty, and sing their hourly chorus out of heaven.

"What a prodigious distance those bells can be heard! I was confounded this morning to their tune, I say. I have been hearing it continually ever since I was little brown whence I write, Murray says, is two hundred and ten miles from Antwerp. And it is a weak off, and there is the bell still jangling its shadow dance out of Dinorah. Ah, how sensitive you understand and an inviolable sound, but quite distinct; and a plague take the tune!

"Bruges.—But I submit, on chronicle to entertain to the Intrusion and impertinence of that, Swiss fellow with the knitter,—he officer who answers to the beadle of the British Museum, and who comes and looks at you with an eye on the compromise. Now the bunt of Cathleen I must have shelter and can open to all. The golden grass and churches there are exceptions. At Rome I have been back to the Antonine, and the Antonine are always open, the lamps are always burning, the faithful are forever coming and going, and the office of the Host always, and on. In the afternoon you can go to the church, and be entirely rested. But you must pay a franc at the side gate. In the forenoon the doors are open, by a sou, and there is no one to levy an entrance fee. I was standing there in still, almost empty, the great nave of the church at the twinkling lights, and listening to the distant chants of the priests performing the service: one heard the chant from the organ-loft broke out behind me overhead, and I began counting the pillars of the nave and transepts and was down upon me in a moment. 'I do not turn your back to the altar during divine service,' says I, in very good, simple English. I take the rebuke, and turn a cell-window about face, and listen a while as the service continues. Then I go out on the side and pay my franc, whereof. We are separated from them by a great screen and closed wood of iron, through which the congregation and the chant comes by gusts only. Seeing a score of children kneeling there at a table, I think I have found them. I am tired of looking at that hideous old pulpit with its gruesome ornaments of carved wood, and I go to the side aisle; but ring through the drum-major is instantly after me —silenced I thought he was going to lay hands on me. 'Monsieur,' says he, 'you must go from the church during the service.' I was moving as quietly as might be, and the children were keenly children kicking and chattering at their ease. I point them out to the Swiss. 'They are learning,' says he. 'They are catechising.' I say, 'Then I come to pay,' says I, 'I am welcome,' and with the wildest gestures I walk out of Bruges, as I said. It don't envy the feelings of that beadle after receiving point-blank such a stroke of wit.

who have said very sharp things will be justly excused upon the plea of peculiar excitement. It is very comfortable to reflect that a great deal of our electioneering eloquence is purely Pickwickian.

THE OTHER SIDE.

THAT is to say, Italy and the war there. Garibaldi is as great as he is brave. History does not often, in these latter European days, bring two men together upon the stage so adequate to noble actions as Garibaldi and Cavour. They differ, with much respect, honestly differing, they differ with much respect. Cavour, in the most generous, but dignified, manner, put himself and Garibaldi in judgment before the Italian people. The verdict effectively reads:

"You are both right." That is to say, they have an equal love of country, an equal willingness to serve her, and are both willing to mingle in a wise method to the division of country.

Cavour, like a true statesman, constantly consults the shifting barometer of circumstances. What seems unwise and impracticable to-day, tomorrow may show to be possible and easy. He wishes no cession of Italian territory. It can not be asked, he says, of a nation of twenty-five millions of people. Then he wishes Rome to be the metropolis of Italy: but how it may be so mode can not be at once categorically determined. Still further, Venetia must join Italy, as she longs to do. Yet Europe does not wish that Italy should make war upon Austria to free Venice, because Europe fears that they can not do the work alone. The union of Italy will show Europe that she is wrong, says Cavour, and when a united Italy marches to open the gates of Venice, white-coated Austria will retire; Europe will approve; and Italy, from the old, will ground to the new, will be one, great, indivisible.

This is a splendid programme, but who doubts that it will be fulfilled? And yet forty years ago the poet Shelley thought as we think. We can see why he was wrong, and why our wishes have a surer foundation—or we think we can. Here is what he wrote of Naples in 1820; would you not think it had been inspired by Garibaldi's deliverance of the city?

"Naples! thou heart of man, which ever pantest
Naked, beneath the lion's gory lair!
Elysian city! which to calm enchantest
The multitude air and sea; they round thee, even
As sleep round poets, are arrived
Metropolis of a ruined Paradise.
Long late, late woe, and yet but half regained!
Bright star of the bloodless sacrifice
Whose splendor flows o'er uplifts on untained
To Love, the fever-enkindled!
Thou which wert worn, and thou didst cease to be,
Nor art, and henceforth ever shalt be, free,
If Hope, and Truth, and Justice can avail.
Hail, hail, all hail!"

WORDS IN DISGRACE.

LADY FRANKLIN'S devotion to the memory of her husband, and her unwearied efforts to solve the mystery of his death, have made her known to the world, and associated her name with all those which illustrate the patient fidelity of women. It is mainly to her resolution that the mystery was cleared. The M'Clintock Expedition sailed especially under her auspices, and here is the honorable reward not only of answering a question of which her Government despaired, but of sealing the fame of her husband by the discovery of all that was in the way to have solved the great Arctic problem when jealous Death interposed.

She lately arrived in this country, with which the heroism of Dr. Kane and the liberality of Henry Grinnell had created for her peculiar and most interesting relations. She has been received long among us, and is every where received with that quiet respect which "To who believe in affection that hopes, and endures, and is patient, Yr who believe in the beauty and strength of woman's devotion," can not help feeling for the wife of Sir John Franklin.

The other day, in compliance with a very enthusiastic invitation, she went to the Woman's Library, recently started in this city. There was a crowd of ladies there. They had some pleasant talk; and after remaining for two hours, she left. The reporter adds: "After examining the books and pictures, she requested to be permitted to donate some books to the library." We have great respect for reporters—but we hope she requested to do no such thing. That Lady Franklin should wish to give books to the library is very proper, kind and natural; but how does she, or any body else, donate books?

What is the matter with that good old word give, that reporters and orators and writers of public letters are trying to suppress it? It is a sweet, sound word, and ought to be loved and respected. Another word is outlawed in the same manner and by the same person. What has the word "donate" done that it should be incontinently thrust out? Take up any morning paper, and if any body made a speech last evening, you will probably read that about eight o'clock he "commenced to speak." The procession "commenced to pass" a certain point, etc. Why didn't he "begin" to speak? Why didn't the procession "begin" to pass? Is it supposed to be more elegant to use "commence" for "begin," and "donate" for "give?" Does any body seriously think "donation" a nobler word than "gift?" Let us hope that the next valuable Lady Franklin does present books to the library, she will write in them "A Gift from Jane Franklin;" not "A Donation from Lady Franklin."

MORE TALK.

As the political orators close their mouths, the Lyceum lecturers open theirs. The lecture season, in fact, began before the campaign was fairly over. The papers had published their usual lists; the committees and the speakers had been put to arrange their evenings; the committees' lists are closed; the lecturers' books are full; nothing remains for them now but to stand and deliver.

There is a preliminary which does not concern the lecturers which is yet to be completed. That is, the usual announcement that the Lecture system has run out: that people will no longer tolerate second-hand philosophy dipped out of Cyclopedias and Reviews: that the fancy men of the Lyceum have used themselves up—and the Lyceum itself is an effete institution. Meanwhile the same agreeable facts are annually brought forward, but the Lyceum perversely refuses to stop; the committees continue to receive and invite; and the lecturers: and the lecturers themselves do still speak and empty pockets.

It is amusing to observe how a habit of skepticism leads not only to universal doubt but to unreasonable credulity. The secretary of a society, for instance, at the idea of any action from a purely disinterested and humane motive, he is constantly at fault in the results of his calculations. And so many people do constantly act not from selfishness but from the very opposite motive. And as with individuals, so of their aggregate called society. As a rule, the appeal of nobility and generosity does not fail upon any civilized people. Sometimes it will, but then the case is exceptional. If a man supposes, for instance, that he can accomplish more effectually by not giving to policed as to their pride, he is profoundly mistaken. If you want to protect the pocket, or if you want to protect the conscience, you will only be right by a principle.

So if our lobby supposes that the Lyceum is a mere whim of people who want somewhere to pass the evening, he will find that the facts are incontestably against him. Lecturing is not a whim. It is transient in its nature. The reason why the Lyceum remains so permanently is not that people like it, but they have something to say—a reason, but that they are interested in what they hear. Now, I do not think about, and have no care to talk about lest they should seem odd, are touched by the lecturer with his own responsibility, and he appeals directly to the audience. The committee may sometimes be alarmed, but it is all right with the people who hearers. They are not with the owners of their own souls, and prefer to hear before they strike. And so long as the Lyceum is maintained in that interest and on that basis, so long as it is credibly reported that Mr. George Francis Train, a vehement gentleman, who has been heard of in England occasionally as blowing the west loud for his country, is about to start running to America, not exactly in a Hansom cab but with a Hansom cab in his head. People who would not be had an express locomotive under full steam in it when he went away, may suppose that England has moderated his gait a little. But Mr. Train's undertaking is a proof of the contentiest steam. For it is in strict pursuance of his well-considered plan of "jumping" by days' light" that he intends to run Hansom cats in the city under charter.

The great difficulty with the London cats is their weight. The genius of light carriages has not yet smiled upon England. It is the last word in the old world, if the Englishmen had our light wagons how they would spin! (of course not faster than we do. In fact, spin is a word which they would be conscious of a new sensation). There is no reason why Mr. Train should not have his cats light. Nothing can be will save him from failure, as a man who is supposed to represent the peculiar spirit of his country, knows that that country spurns the heavy carriage, and will not buy so calm, elastic, convenient, cheap, and Hansom.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE ALLOCUTION.

"The following is a summary of the Allocution delivered by the Pope on the Consistory, on the 26th ult."—Paper.

Kiss Victor's a wretch and a horrible thief,
Blasphemous, chamber-robber, and liar;
And I'm happy to think he'll one day come to grief
If he takes my poor patrimony.

As touching the soldiers who died in my cause,
No fair reader be better aware
I certify all have escaped from the jaws
Of Old Nick and gone up to the sky.

Brooding the Kings that don't tend me a hand
To wipe out the stain of rebellion,
I beg that these monarchs will please understand
They're all in the road to perdition.

I specially hint to the Gallician Bubus,
That his acts are all futile and null, for
While he's making a capital look, as he thinks,
I've booked him for sojourn in religion.

So up to the aid of your father the Pope,
Who gives you these elegant wiggings.
Don't have him, as Tasker would call it, to stope.
And make tracks for emancipated diggings.
Save the Cardinal Prince, and the rest defied
By you "Particular Pollution!"
Draw the Pontiff's chair near, and don't draw it mild—
And this is your Pope's Allocution.

ÆSOP'S SELECT FABLES.

THE SEA-NYMPH AND THE OCEAN SWELL.

One morning, when there was a heavy Swell upon the main, a gentle Nymph walked forth, her blue eyes beaming with joy, her dewy tresses crystallized with dew. The Swell, struck by her beauty, and solicitous to win her admiration, paused, and proudly shook his crest long wavy curls. "Cease then not space, sweet Nymph," he said, "with that treasury of beauty one enjoys making love?"—"Where wouldst thou have a lack?" quoth she, "out on thy underhanding, thou confined enough already."—"Oh, cruel," cried the crest-fallen Swell, "thou knowest not what I intend!"—"I am sure I don't care a rush," she answered, "and a most wicked flatterer, for while thou art kissing the pale moon thou art treating of them down."—"One lock of thine," returned the Swell, "would rivet my devotion and banish all thoughts of the sky." The arch Nymph shook her laughing face, and said, "Oh, restless Swell! how can that thing which is always in motion would make thee constant, when thou art moved by every sportive air?"

The Swell, vexed at the rebuff, in his wildly flung themselves at bounty's feet, for what can be expected from such insane creatures but scornful pride?

THE SLOW COACH AND THE LITTLE DUCK.

A Slow Coach had often diverted by passing a little Duck who with her mother and sisters lived on a village green. "Some fine day," said the slow Coach, creeping and speaking the little Duck, with a dreary smile, "when I can get a license, you shall ride with me in a mail with me."—Thank you," returned the little Duck, proudly lifting up her bill; "but I would like to be allowed to get a license, perhaps I may wait till peace are out of season. I never encourage slow Coaches, and I wish to go to market I shall trust to express."

Proud. We here rest the error of procrastination. Dawdlers are always smitten. The little Duck, though somewhat given to her bow, was quite right in her principle. Coach that makes lumbering excuses for not being able to go quick, should be left to its own reflections and a pace.

THE YOUNG MONKEY AND THE ULLY MUG.

A Young Monkey, in the uniform of a Midshy, sat at the breakfast table of the Midshipmen's mess, engaged in an ugly mug belonging to the First Lieutenant. "What are you doing there, sir?" said the Lieutenant to the ugly Mug.—"Only Sister, Sir," replied the young Monkey, with increasing humility.—"Sister, indeed!" said the First Lieutenant, "is she pretty?"—"She is considered so, Sir," replied the young Monkey.—"Indeed, and what does she say?" inquired the Mug, looking fiercely at the young Monkey.—"She says, Sir," she says, Sir," repeated the latter, "that she would be exceedingly glad if you would not bow your portrait to put in a brush."—"Ha!" cried the ugly Mug, radiant with vanity, "I'll just speak to Mr. Jay; and I think you named leave of absence? You shall have it, Mr. Sly; fill your glass, Mr. Jay—here's to you."

Moral. A young Monkey who goes to sea should always have a good stock of flattery. Flattery is many little indulgences to excuse to a young Monkey as occasions, if he wishes to rise in the service, to the rank of Post Captain.

THE TRUE TEETOALER.—The Spirit-Rapper, for not one of them knows any thing about any Spirit whatever.

LAMORICIERE'S VOW, OR HE WOULD BE AN ALYA.

He would be an Alya, sword and awes
The red-hot Lamoricière;
Through blue, through grey, retired
Should be, with wasting fire and sword.

The towns which spurned the Pontiff's sway
Should lie in interior prey;
He'd turn his ruffians loose, to kill,
Burn, spoil, and lay their bastial will.

But ere he went on this crusade
The Frenchman coffed scheintal aid;
Then, kneeling at Loretto's shrine,
Invoked the female form divine:

"O spotless Queen! Celestial Rose!
Lend me thine aid to crush my foes;
Remembering that those foes are mine,
Because they are the Pope's and thine.

"Adorable and most adored,
Behold this ornament's sword;
Thine, if I succeed, shall be;
Here will I hang it up to thee!"

Unheard was the Crusader's prayer,
Which by wind carried in air;
Because, there's too much ground to fear,
Though God can hear, they can not hear.

Our Hero's doom was dire defeat,
As regarded for his wishes;
His army driven from the field,
And he himself obliged to yield.

Fulfill, though they have not the grace,
Thy vow, Crusader, all the same;
Thy Deity of wax, stone, wood,
Thy prayer had granted, if it could.

The will is equal to the deed,
And merit's the same in most;
So let thy sword, in spite of scorn,
The magic power of prayer.

For, now that weapon's work is o'er,
Thou shouldst resign it evermore:
Drawn against Heaven, it was drawn in vain—
Oh! never wear that Sword again.

ARETINA'S BEST WAY.—If Austria would do the honest thing and restore Venetia to Victor Emanuel, she would be the Venetian territory to its rightful owners, and pay over the proceeds into the hands of Rothschild.

WONDERFUL.—A teacher of penmanship in twelve lessons taught a lawyer to read his own writing.

A little man, having walked the streets with a lighted lantern, an acquaintance met him, and exclaimed, in some surprise,

"Why, what is the use of that light to you? You have only to look in a glass to see a fool, and I'm sure I can't see a bit the better."

"No," replied the small man; "I don't carry the light to make me see, but to prevent fools from running against me."

A Frenchman having heard the phrase, "I've got other fish to fry," very readily turned its application. One evening, after escorting a lady home, and being invited to walk in, he thought to display politeness, and excused himself by saying, "I thank you, Madame; I must cook some fish."

A man may generally expect a democratic "brozer" when his wife begins to put on "airs."

CAUSE AND EFFECT.—"Why, Hank, you have the most feminine cast of countenance I ever have seen."

"Oh, yah," replied Hiram, "I know de reason for dat—public meetin' was a womman."

The following is a copy of a will left by a man who chose to be his own lawyer: "This is the last will and testament of me, John Thomas: I give all my things to my relations, to be divided among them the best way they can. N.B.—If any body kicks up a row or makes any fuss about it, he isn't to have any thing. Signed by me, JOHN THOMAS."

Some things come by odd names. The most uncommon quality in a man is called "consistency;" a pipe of half a mile long is "clay;" and a melancholy ditty, described as "mournful music;" a "dirge."

A man who assisted to empty several bottles of wine, afterward took a walk. The pavements were quite icy, and he continually fell down. "Very single to-night, waiter," cried he, in a way that showed the slippery side up."

"How," said Mr. A. to a friend who wished to convey a piece of information relative to a lady without mentioning directly with her, "how can you be certain of her readiness to marry you when you have declined to be her husband?"

"Thus I have managed without the possibility of a failure," was the answer; "she will open it to a certainty, and then she will know that I am her husband."

EXPOSED AND TRANSPLANTED.—A gentleman recently married, was enjoying, with his fair one, an evening with a party of friends, when, suddenly, he was heard to say, hastily, "Excuse me, I must be off—I am exposed and transplanted!" At that moment a second bell rang, and the friends fell into a roar. "Were you, my love," entreated the gentleman, "aboard that vessel?" "No, you would be exported, and I, of course, transported."

"Well, George," asked a friend of a young lawyer, "how do you like your profession?"

"Also, Sir, my profession is better than my practice."

"Share an' I will," replied Mick; "but what will I tell him if I don't meet him?"

A distinguished friend of ours says that "poetry is every body's topic, and prose no man's forte." It is also afraid that it is generally a coin jingled most by those who have no other to jingle.

THE EMPEROR OF CHINA AND HIS CAPITAL.

As we may expect to hear by any mail of the march of the allied French and English upon the Chinese capital, we place on record, on the following pages, a Plan of the City of Peking, and a Plan of Peking.

We published in No. 94 of this Journal, bearing date October 16, 1858, two fine views of Peking, with a historical sketch of the city; in No. 104, dated December 25, 1858, an illustrated letter from our special correspondent who accompanied Mr. Ward on his journey to Peking the summer of that year; and in No. 160, bearing date August 25, 1860, a Large Map of the Province of Pechili, showing the Mouths of the Peiho, and The Seat of War in China. All these former publications we will only add here that, in consequence of the political disturbances which have been raging in China for the past few years, the supply of food on which Peking relies for the sustenance of its people has been greatly diminished, and the population has fallen off in consequence. It was once a city of 2,000,000 inhabitants; how many it contains now, no one can tell. It is not a handsome city—the houses being only one story high—in consequence of the prevalence of earthquakes. It is divided into two distinct portions, the Chinese town and the Tartar town: the one being the abode of the rich, the military, and men of leisure; the other, the home of the working-classes and the poor. It is surrounded by a high wall, and provided with strong fortifications; but the Europeans will probably have some fighting to do ere they take the place.

The Emperor of the Chinese Hien-Foo—a man of only twenty-nine years of age, having been born in 1831. He came to the throne ten years ago: his predecessor, contrary to custom, chose him out, and formally introduced him to the Mandarins as their future Emperor some time before his death. He is said to be a man of remarkable energy of character and resolution of purpose. He has never wavered in the hostility to the allies which he expected feet to approach the coast; and his wife, a fine handsome woman, he treats in every way as an equal. It is said that after any lady visits should occur at a period when, seemingly, the recuperation of the Chinese Empire is beyond hope.

THE LAST STUMP SPEECH.

UNDER THE SNOW.

IN TWO PORTIONS.

PORTION THE FIRST.

ALTHOUGH Switzerland is famous, all the world over, for its lofty mountains, still, in foreign countries, many lads of my age, and in my station of life, may not exactly know that the Jura is a chain of mountains formed by several parallel chains which extend from Basle, in Switzerland, quite up to France and a little way into it, running in the direction from northeast to southwest. The length of the Jura is about one hundred and seventy miles, and its breadth from thirty-five to forty miles. It contains a great number of deep valleys, and several mountains whose summits are very lofty.

I mention these dry details at the outset in order that you may better understand the language used to me; for it is, in great measure, the difference of the height of the mountains which renders them more or less habitable. The higher they are, the sharper is the cold there, the shorter is the summer, the scantier is the vegetation, and the earlier does the snow cover it. Some of these mountains are even so lofty that the snow on their tops is never entirely and completely melted, but remains in patches in the hollows. Nevertheless, all the mountains of the Jura less their upper garment of snow every year; some sort of incessant springs on the highest summits; at many points they are clothed with magnificent woods of beech, pine, and especially fir; while other parts afford excellent pasture-ground, on which they can feed cattle and goats. Notwithstanding which, these beautiful mountains are scarcely habitable more than five months in the year, from May or June until the beginning of October.

As soon as the snows are melted and the summits are clothed again with green, our villages (which are all built in the valleys or on the lower slopes, and their backs up the mountains. Then the departure is quite a holiday; and yet we herdsmen have to spend the whole summer away from our families, leading a half-savage life, with many privations. We live almost entirely on a milk-and-cheese diet, which we eat by a general name, having as having often nothing else to drink, by way of a change, but water from the spring. We spend our time in procuring our food, and in making those large and handsome cheeses which are known as Gruyère.

Every herdsman has, up in the mountain, a chalet, which is a wretched place for human habitation, although nearly built of stone. It is roofed with small slabs of so-called bardeaux : heavy stones, laid in rows upon them, press them down, and prevent the storms from stripping off the roof. The interior of a chalet is divided into three apartments; a well-closed stable or cow-house, to lodge the cattle at night; a narrow and cold cellar, where the milk is kept in broad wooden bowls; and a kitchen, which also serves as a bedroom, when the herdsman is not frequently sleep on a bed of straw. The kitchen is furnished with a vast chimney, in which we prepare an enormous fire for warming the milk and helping to convert it into cheese. As the chalet is our residence the whole summer long, and obliged to stir it about with many little articles of necessity, to save having to go down to the valley to fetch them when wanted unexpectedly.

Our season hardly finishes before St. Denis's day, the 9th of October. We then quit the mountain, again making a holiday, delighted to return to our families. But we do not lead an idle life in the village, any more than we did at the chalet. We are accustomed to depend upon ourselves, and are obliged to turn our hands to every thing. We make handsome baskets, tools, and furniture; we carve wood into fancy articles, which are afterward dispersed all over Europe. But, what is of the greatest importance, the winter affords us spare time for our education. If the path to the school is not always open, the children are sure to learn their lessons at home. The art of writing is not forgotten; and by reading aloud we amuse and instruct each other as well as ourselves. It was a good thing for me that I was so brought up. If I had not had these resources in my trouble, I know not what would have become of me. I was thing, at least, is clear: the journal which follows could not have existed. Although only a Swiss country lad, I have been able to write some sort of history. Here it is, as I was able to note it down from day to day.

November 22.—Since it is the will of God that I and my grandfather should be imprisoned in this chalet, I must set myself to writing whatever occurs to us. If we are destined to perish here, our relations will know all; will learn how our last days were spent; if we are delivered, this journal will preserve the recollection of our dangers and our sufferings. I begin who my grandfather's wish that I should undertake it.

The day before yesterday, in the village, we had been expecting my father for several weeks past. St. Denis's-day was over; all the herds had come down from the mountain, together with their keepers. My father alone failed to make his appearance; and we began to ask, "What can possibly detain him?" I lost my mother three years ago: but my uncles and aunts assured me that I need not make myself uneasy; that probably there remained some work to be eaten, and that was why my father kept the herd a little later up the mountain.

At last my grandfather became alarmed. He said, "I will go myself and see why François does not come. I shall not be sorry to see the chalet once more. Who knows whether I shall be able to visit it next summer? Will you like to come with me?"

It was the very request I was going to make; for, as I have no mother, we are almost always together. We were soon ready to start. We mounted slowly, sometimes following narrow gorges, sometimes skirting the sides of deep precipices. About a quarter of a league before we came to the chalet, I was attracted by curiosity to the edge of a very steep rock. My grandfather, who had told me more than once that he did not like my doing so, hastened forward to pull me back; but a large stone, rolling backward as he stepped upon it, caused him to sprain his foot, and put him to considerable pain. But in a few minutes he felt better, and we hoped that no bad consequences would ensue. With the help of his stout bolby stick, and by leaning on my shoulder, he was able to drag himself as far as this place.

My father was greatly surprised to see us. He was busy preparing for his departure; so that if we had quietly waited at home one day longer his arrival would have relieved us from our anxiety. That very same evening Pierre was to set off with the remainder of the cheeses.

After a short greeting, my grandfather asked me,

"Are you very tired, Louis?" The manner in which he made the inquiry seemed to betray some secret intention, and I felt as if I ought to have replied answer. "I was thinking," he added, "that it would be necessary to send on the boy with Pierre. The wind has changed during the last half-hour, and may perhaps bring us bad weather in the course of the night."

My father expressed the same fear, and urged me to follow that counsel.

"I had much rather wait for you," I said. "Grandfather, with his lame foot, stands in great need of a good night's rest."

There have been a little fire a boiler, which I regarded with greatly even. My father understood this signal, and, without appearing to notice my amuse-four and milk, which we ate, like soldiers, all out of one bowl. It was agreed that we should all go down together on the following Monday. After which I went to bed and fell asleep, without paying much attention to what was said by my father and grandfather as they had a long conversation in an undertone after their supper.

I was awakened by the sunshine, which to see the mountain all covered with white. The snow was still falling with unusual heaviness, being driven by a violent wind. This, however, did not greatly amused, and I not remarked my relations' anxiety. I was very unease myself when I saw my grandfather try to take a few steps, and drag himself along with great difficulty, supporting himself upon his stick, and leaning against the wall. The accident of the day before had caused his foot to swell, and made it very painful.

"Go," he said, "and away the child before the snow is deeper. You see it is impossible for me to accompany you."

"But do you suppose, father, I can abandon you in that way?"

"We speak a good portion of the day without seeing to a decision. We had still hopes that assistance would be sent to us from the village. I felt that I was really unable to undertake such a road to help my father to drive the herd. My representations were of no use; my grandfather persisted in his resolution. He was very much excited as to danger by becoming a burden on us.

My father insisted, almost angrily, wept while I was obstinate. My grandfather could not. last I contrived to put an end to it by saying, "Well, then, I will go." I added, "you will reach home all the sooner. You will come back with sufficient help to fetch us. Grandfather will have recovered from his fall, and will follow us more easily. We shall take care of one another, and Providence will take care of us both."

"That is the best," my grandfather said. "The snow is already so deep, and the storm so violent, that I apprehend more danger from his following you than from his staying here. Besides, François, take my stick, it is a strong one and pointed with iron. I can get on very comfortably without it, as it helped me up. Let the cows out of the stable; leave us the goat and all the provisions you can contain. I am more anxious about you than I am about myself."

We then my father was on the point of starting I gave him a hasty embrace, and set out with a heavier heart than I had ever known before. At the first door I met Pierre, who was busy harnessing his cows, and was about to follow that road. I entreated him to tell my grandfather that I had provided for my grandfather the day before. He pressed me in his arms.

We drove out the herd, which appeared much surprised to find the earth covered with snow. A sense of danger seemed to be felt, and their way, and kept running in circles round the chalet. At last they congregated in a body and set off in the right direction. At a very few paces' distance, both my father and the herd disappeared, being lost to sight in the whirl of snow. Then we saw them no longer, my grandfather appeared to follow them with his eyes. He leaned in silence against the window. We did not attempt to be articulating words; his hands were clasped and his eyes raised to heaven.

We were roused from serious thoughts by the increasing violence of the wind. We were wrapped round by a cloud of black and white, and the nightfall came almost suddenly. Nevertheless, our wooden clock hid only just struck three. We had not yet eaten our dinner, for we had never thought of taking food, and I was dying of hunger. At that moment I made grandfather listen how the storm was raging.

"Poor Blanchette!" he said. "She wants to be relieved of her milk. Go, my child, milk the cows and do it. Light the lamp; we will go and milk her, and then we will sup."

The wind roared loudly; it forced its way under the bardeaux of the roof, making them rattle; you would have fancied the whole roof was going to be carried away.

"Don't be alarmed," my grandfather said. "This house has resisted many a like attack. The bardeaux are laden with very heavy stones, and the roof, with its slight inclination, will carry little hold to the wind."

When the goat saw us she redoubled her bleating; she seemed as if she would burst her cage to get at us. How greedily she licked the fragrains of salt which I offered in my hand! She gave us a large pot of milk. I stood in need of it. My grandfather said, as we returned to the kitchen, "We must take good care not to forget Blanchette; we must feed her well, and milk her punctually morning and evening. Our life depends on her."

After supper we sat down by the fire; but the flakes of snow which fell down the chimney almost extinguished it. The draught of air also fell upon us, and we could only keep ourselves warm by going to bed, after commending ourselves, individually, to the divine protection.

This morning, on waking, I found myself in complete darkness, and at first supposed that sleep had left me earlier than usual; but hearing my grandfather groping his way about the room, I knew that it must be much later. I was aware for that. The snow had blocked up the window.

"The window is low," the old man remarked. "Besides, I perceive that the snow has been drifted into a heap on that particular spot; perhaps we should not find it more than a couple of feet deep a few paces from the wall."

"In that case they will come and help us out?" I said, in my turn, but supposing that we are to be detained here for any length of time, we must see what resources we have; when we have done this we shall perceive how we can best employ them. The day has dawned, there can be no doubt; for the hour-hand of the wooden clock points to seven. The pendulum has left off, forgot to wind it up last night. We must always be punctual with Blanchette, etc.

November 23.—Yesterday morning, when we discovered that we were more close prisoners than we were the day before, we were very much depressed and saddened; nevertheless, we did not forget our breakfast and the goat. While grandfather was preparing it, I watched him closely with great attention. He noticed it, and advised me to try and learn to milk, in order to replace him in case of need. I made an attempt, which was clumsy and unsuccessful at first, especially as Blanchette seemed to resent and shifting her position as if aware of my inexperience; but I improved greatly after three or four trials.

When we had taken stock of our provisions and utensils, we wished to know what sort of weather it was out of doors. I went under the chimney and looked up; that is the only outlet which remained open in the chilet. In a few minutes the snow which had fallen in the course of the night down in a considerable height.

I pointed out the circumstance to my grandfather. We could see that, owing to the thickness of the layer of snow, because the chimney does not rise outside above the roof. In fact, there is simply a hole in the roof, which chimney has been blown down in a storm.

"But I will climb," my grandfather said "you might get up and disengage a trap which your father lately fixed on the top of the chimney. It is very useful, and very convenient when it is required."

"Never mind the ladder," I replied. "I saw in the kitchen a broom, and that is all I want. I have often climbed up trees no thicker than that; and the pole has still its bark on, which makes it easier to climb."

I set to work, tying a string to my waistband, to hold up my clothes, and to the top. I managed so well with feet and hands, and by pressing against the walls of the chimney as the Savoyards do, that I "reached my goal" in a few minutes. I cleared away an open space, and found that there was about three feet of snow on the roof. Around the hole I discovered at once that there was a great deal more. In fact, the wind had swept it up into a heap; nevertheless, there must have fallen an enormous mass of snow in a very short space of time. Every thing round about the chilet is hidden under a pure white carpet; the forest of trees, which surrounds it in the direction of the valley, and which shuts in the prospect, is white like the rest, with the exception of the summits, which appear all black. Many trees are crushed by the weight; I saw large branches, and even trees, that were broken into fragments. At that moment there blew a strong and bitter cold wind from the north. I felt it cut my face. I descended before it opened at intervals. Gleams of sunshine flashed through the openings, and ran over the field of snow with a dazzling and intense light.

The cold began to lay hold of me. When I tried to describe to my grandfather what I saw, he heard that I was very much affected. He told me to make haste and clear the trap, and as far as I could reach around the aperture of the chimney. It took some time, and was hard work; but it warmed me. Following my grandfather's directions, I passed the string I had fastened through a pulley, in such a way that, by pulling from below, the trap would open, while its own weight would cause it to shut. When we had made a little manœuvre two or three times, to see that it worked properly, I descended again with the welcome tidings.

My clothes were all wet, and I had no others to put on. We lighted a bright fire of twigs and fir-cones; and when the trap had been open for only no more than the necessary space for the smoke to escape, we spent the greater part of the day by the chimney-corner, which was rather light than from the hearth; for our stock of oil was very small, and we thought that we must not expend it in quit our prison so soon. We did not light our lamp till it was time to milk the goat.

We find it a very unaccustomed and melancholy life, to have to drag through a whole day in this dull manner. Still I think that the hours would be less wearisome if we were not living in a constant state of expectation. It always seems as if some one were on the point of coming to rescue us. I mounted a second time upon the roof to look whether any body had arrived; I incessantly questioned grandpapa. He is in hopes, he says, that my father reached home safely; but perhaps the roads are completely choked by the drifted snow.

At last, after completely closing the chimney by means of the trap, we went to bed, hoping that somebody might come to our assistance to-day; but this morning we find that, for the present, the thing is almost impossible. As far as we can observe, it must have snowed all night. We had considerable difficulty in opening the trap to light our fire; I found two feet of fresh snow.

November 24.—The snow continues to fall abundantly. I have again had great difficulty in raising the trap. We think it prudent to clear the roof of a portion of the snow with which it is laden. It employed a great part of the day. I leave under the trap for the purpose, and carefully think to keep out the cold, and I throw off the rest.

It is some amusement to escape out of my dungeon for a little while; and very cold I to see in very sad. The inequalities of the ground around us are scarcely distinguishable; the whole landscape is most forlorn. The earth is white, the sky is black. I have read at school the narratives of Captain Cook, of Ley Sea and the Polar regions; I fancy we must be transported there. But since those wretched travellers, who suffered so much from cold and incurred such great dangers, have sometimes returned to their native land, I hope that we also shall see my father and our village again.

We are not deprived of every comfort in our sequestered habitation. We have plenty of straw and straw than Blanchette would consume in a whole twelvemonth for food and bedding. If she continues to give us milk, we have in her a valuable resource. But an accident might derive us of her; and we were very glad to find, in a corner of the stable, a stock of potatoes. We have been to cover them with straw, to protect them from the frosts. Blanchette had pushed her provisions also in the stable; but there is not enough to carry us through a long winter. We did right, therefore, in thinking of making the trap at the same time when we have no urgent need of fire; as we have reason to fear that our fuel may run short, it is a good thing that we can keep out the cold. Fortunately, the snow, which imprisons us, also shelters us. I am surprised that we do not feel it more. Indeed we as we are. "That is why," my grandfather observed, "the young wheat gets through the winter so well. We shall do nicely. We will lie snug and close all the winter, and in spring we will put our locks out of the window. But then a considerable quantity of snow will have to get through, and God grant that that may be all we have to suffer!

To make up for the wood we have a heap of fir-cones, which I partly collected myself, to turn at the village. It is a mere chance that we did not taken there. And, in short, if we are driven to it, we shall not hesitate to burn the hay-racks and the manger in the stable. What will become a question of life and death, we must not look too closely at trifles; we shall be acting like the navigators who, in winter carpenter into the sea.

Our people had already in part unfurnished the chilet. We found there a large iron kettle and caldron for making cheese. They have left us a few necessary kitchen utensils; and besides, a hatchet all jagged at the edge, and a saw that would hardly cut. We have each of us a pocket-knife. Although our housekeeping articles are very incomplete, we shall manage to get on with these. We much more regret the provisions: ours are but scanty. We have a pig we could only find three loaves, of the sort which are kept for a whole year in the mountain, and which are obliged at last to be chopped up with a hatchet. We also have found plenty of salt, a small quantity of ground coffee, five bottles of old white wine, a little oil, and a small stock of dried meat.

We have only one bed, but we sleep at our ease. According to our mountain custom, it is big enough to hold five or six persons. It stands in the corner of our only living-room, which is also the kitchen and the dormitory. Only one blanket has been left us; if it is not enough, we must make use of hay and straw. "I only wish," I said, "that I could do all the moments dull, and that we remain torpid until the return of spring."

November 26.—While examining the state of our furniture and our provisions, I have re-arched into every corner, to see if I could not find some books. I know that my father never went to the village chilet without taking with him a Bible and several religious books, which he read to his workmen on Sundays; he was fond, in some degree, of public service which they attend in the village. But, apparently, he had not left his library away.

We much regretted, in our present position, not having this means of sustaining and consoling ourselves during our long watches. I was having noticed, behind the old oak wardrobe, a plank which somebody had stuck there out of the way, I pulled it out, thinking that it might serve some useful purpose. With it there fell down an old dusty book, which must have been there for many years. It was a Bible.

November 27.—Continually snowing! It is rare to see so great a quantity fall even at this season, and on the mountains. In spite of that, I can not get over my surprise at my father's not coming to our assistance. Can any I fully comprehend it. Hitherto my grandfather has not allowed me to perceive his uneasiness; our conversation to-day has been than that I was less alarmed than myself.

"In fact," I said, "this immense fall of snow will not come on us twice in the first, the second, and even the third day of our captivity, they might, one would think, have cleared a path up to the chilet."

"I am certain," said my grandfather, "that François has done all he could; but perhaps he could not get our friends and neighbors to share his fears, and it was out of his power to rescue us without assistance."

"Do you believe that, if it had been possible to fetch us away, they would have left us here, at the risk of famine as dead in the spring? Can they be less humane than the persons of whom we read in the newspapers, who make the greatest exertions, often at the peril of their lives, to save some unfortunate fellow-creature who is buried in a mine, in digging a well, or under a vault which has fallen in?"

"I grant, my dear Louis, that our position is very sad; but, after all, they know that we are under shelter, and have some provisions."

We were for some time in this strain. When my grandfather was silent, I took his hands in mine, and said:

"Hide nothing from me, I entreat you. Tell me, are you not quite as uneasy as I am? Frankly, I am able to bow with resignation to the will of God; I therefore deserve your confidence. Acquaint me with your suppositions, and do not let me torment myself with my own alone. I had rather look misfortune full in the face, and know what you really think."

"Well, my poor boy, I can not deny that I fear some accident has happened to your father. Now it has come to this, I had better tell you so at once. Ought to, hum, hardly know what to think of it; because, in default of him, other persons ought to be borne us in mind."

At this, I could restrain my tears and sobs no longer. My grandfather allowed me to give way to my grief. The fire went out as we sat before it. We remained there in the dark till it was quite late. My grandfather kept out of sight of the fire, pressing it from time to time.

"I have told you my fears," he said, at last; "but do not forget that I still have hopes. We can not tell what unforeseen cause may have prevented your father's return. All may yet turn out well. Put your trust in Providence."

December 1.—I can not conquer the terror which seizes me at this date. If news of the 30th of November days appeared so long and wearisome, what will they be this month? At least I shall not be heralded in here more sure this were the last of our captivity. But I no longer dare fix my term to it. The snow has piled up to such a height that it looks as if it would take the whole summer long to melt it. It is now on a level with the roof; and if I did not clear away day by day a better thickness, we should soon be unable to open the trap or to light a fire.

It vexes me that my grandfather can not sometimes step out of this confined vault into the open air. I climbed on this morning with that object for the most, and he said, "A ray of sunshine, Nevertheless," he added, "our lot is much less wretched than that of many prisoners, a number of whom have not deserved imprisonment any more than we have. We enjoy a certain amount of liberty in our confinement, and we find means for amusement which are not attainable inside the four walls of a dungeon; we are not exposed day by day to suspicion or cruel or even an indifferent jailer. The evils which we suffer from the hand of God have not the bitterness of those which we believe we may attribute to the injustice of men; and lastly, my boy, we are not in solitary confinement; and if your presence has ceased to be a regret for your sake, which I make no attempt to conceal, it also sustains me, and is always dear to our captivity, and I assure you it is not merely for her milk's sake that I feel attached to her."

These last words set me thinking. I proposed to let the poor creature live more in our company. "She is unconfortable all alone in the stable," I said; "she bleats frequently, and that may do us harm, and us also. What is there to hinder us from letting her have a corner here? There is plenty of room for all of us. She will be much obliged to us for the honor we do her." I smiled a little more against the wall, in a corner where she would be the least in our way, fixing it firmly with a couple of stakes; and, without further delay, introduced Blanchette into our entire room.

How delighted she is at the change! She does nothing but thank us, in her way. If it went on so, she would become fatiguing; but when she is accustomed to her new position she will be quieter. At this very moment, while I am committing these details to paper, she is lying on some fresh litter, where she has quite peacefully gazing at me so contentedly that she seems to guess I am writing her history. Hitherto, she has wanted for nothing, and at least there is one happy being inside the chilet.

December 3.—The sunshine to-day attracted me out on the roof. Cold dry weather has succeeded to the continual snow-storms. How my eyes were dazzled by the bright white expanse, and how beautiful the forest looked! I hardly dared mention to grandfather the delight it gave me; but it suggested that I might dig away the snow in front of the door, and make a sloping path upward from it to the surface of the snow-drift. He has already set to work, and my grandfather will soon enjoy what he has long been wishing for, a ray of sunshine.

December 4.—My task progresses; I labor at it as long as my grandfather will allow me. It is hard and straining labor if occurred to me, and I have recited him for not communicating it. He was afraid also of exercise and the moisture to my feet might do me harm.

December 9.—We can step out of our house; the path is made. I have had the pleasure of leading my grandfather along it, supporting him on one side. We remained several minutes at the end of our path. The air is not long; but the day was gloomy, and it made us very sad to see the black forest, the cloudy sky, and the snow surrounding us with the silence of death. We beheld only one living creature—a bird of prey—which passed at a distance with a hoarse scream. It flew down toward the valley in the direction of our village. The pagoda would have derived some omen from it, but we have no such superstition.

December 9.—What a dreadful day! I had yet to learn what a hurricane up in the mountains was like. I can hardly describe what passed out of doors. We heard a frightful noise. When we tried to open the door ajar, the chalet was filled with a whirlwind of snow; the wind rushed in with such fury that we had great difficulty in closing the door again. We were obliged to drop the trap of the chimney; and, besides, it was impossible to light a fire, because the smoke was continually driven down again. We ate our milk without boiling it. My grandfather says that the damage by it is slow but sure, as well as by his grave and pious words. At the time when one would say that the work of God was hanging over us, he speaks to me of His compassion and His mercy. On trying a second time to open the door, we found a mass of snow had fallen upon it, so that we are completely imprisoned, as before. What I most regret is my sketch of the Schreckhorn, which I had begun at the west; if permits, I will make a fresh attempt to regain a little light and liberty.

December 11.—The cold is much sharper. Although we are buried under the snow, which perhaps prevents our hearing the avalanches, the crashes to our very bones. My grandfather says that, to be felt so keenly inside the chalet, to the point to set to shivering, the temperature must be very low indeed. The wind has changed to the north.

December 12.—I was writing the goat, while my grandfather lighted the fire. Suddenly she pricked up her ears, as if she heard some extraordinary noise. She bleated violently, and ran to the door.

"What is the matter, Blanchette?" I asked, caressing her. I could now hear the noises; they were low and distant. Blanchette's fear of them grew louder and louder. We then heard hundreds of feet pattering on the crisp snow—evidently on board a trail in the valley—and a struggle above us, mingled with horrid cries that made my blood run cold.

"What is that?" I asked, though I knew what it must be, without asking.

"Hush! The wolf!" said my grandfather in a whisper, blowing out the light and extinguishing the fire. "Keep Blanchette quiet, my boy, and I will open a very little the salt to it, to keep her from bleating."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

VIEWS OF COLONEL ORR ON SECESSION.

We learn from the Greenville (South Carolina) Patriot that on Tuesday of last week Colonels Orr and Ashmore addressed the citizens of that district in the Court-house. Colonel Orr had no hope of the defeat of Lincoln, but would counsel the people to submit to his election. The South Carolina should not withdraw alone. He differed from a call for a convention. He would not counsel such a step for a Convention of the people as soon as it was ascertained that Lincoln was elected. He thought it would be wiser and more prudent that Commissioners should be appointed by the several States to apply to the Northern States, and ascertain the course they intended to pursue under the circumstances; and then apply to Congress for redress.

South Carolina has tried the experiment of sending a Commissioner to Washington under Buchanan's rule, and he thought advisable to secure in some way so much consent of action as possible.

GOVERNOR MOORE IS FOR A SOUTHERN CONFERENCE.

The New Orleans Bulletin contains a long letter from Governor Moore, in reply to a note sent him by a number of prominent citizens, requesting an expression of the policy for the South to pursue in the event of the success of the Republican party. The letter is a calm, cool, and elaborate discussion of the question at issue, but those with the following are the reply to the inquiries:

It is asked, if Lincoln be elected President what should the South do? To this I answer, that it would be useless if as wise or prudent to consult myself, either as a citizen or as Governor, to express an opinion now as to anything for myself, and for myself alone, I am free to say that the success of the Republicans would be to me a strong motive in withdrawing from the Union. But I do not advise, or counsel, that course to others. I think it would be unwise to come. I think the day of separation will be much more favorable to our success, and we do not believe we can be disunited, that a general disgust, and a strong movement in favor of secession movements, they may grow between now and then. I believe they will. They are greatly improved. Douglas is to be in Georgia on the 10th inst. He will hoist the flag which he has heretofore held, and get a single electoral vote. Should the Government survive, the presidency in 1864.

SECESSION UNPOPULAR AT NEW ORLEANS.

The New Orleans Commercial Bulletin of the 25th talks plainly of the secession movement:

"What have the Secessionists done for the South? Can any one tell? Which have they done more except to foment agitation, to make politics a trade, and to rule or ruin everything? Have they ever suggested any measure which would make her really independent? We appeal to every honest intelligent man in the country. The Union men of the South have not always been the persistent and unscrupulous agitators. They have not resorted to the sources, of internal improvement, of all those measures whose importance is felt by every State, to make rich, independent, and impregnable ground. They have advocated conservative principles, and a conservative government; these economic instrumentalities that never fail to make a people prosperous and happy. These are the men to raise their own liberties, and to repel all attacks from them. Are these principles which you wish to support have they ever been the great body of Southern reformers in this last week?

"What have the latter been about all the while? Why, trading in politics, abusing the North, republishing Abolition insults and slang, raving the South by passing frothy, truculent, and cheap resolutions; threatening secession and disunion, and at the same time sending millions of dollars to the North to enrich and build it up. This is what they have been doing, and every honest man knows it. The advocates of Southern independence, prosperity, and wealth have not only had no support worth speaking of from the sectionalists, but they have had unscrupulous opposition from the latter. The sectionalists have often ridiculed the efforts of the industrials of the South to make her really independent of the North. Their motive has been to keep the south by sheer impudence and windy speeches ever since we can remember. Their game is now played out, and upon their own ground. With secession as an issue, the resolutions have worn Northern clothes, have cut upon Northern cloth, in a word, have been giving the North the very kind of aid and comfort which, in such desires, while fulminating wordy resolves against it which have only excited contempt. The people are now asked to secede with confidence this same old ding-dong, slum-banging, shamming spirit of vaporing and bluster. The very men who for the party that has been really making the South contemptibly poor, and keeping her back in her natural industrial development, moral power, and political influence."

MR. EVERETT NOT IN FAVOR OF THE EQUALITY OF THE RACES.

Mr. McCrae, one of the Democratic electors in Alabama, withdrew from their ticket and went over to Mr. Breckinridge because he declined that a man of sense like Mr. Everett, a Nationalist, that Mr. Everett was in favor of the equality of the races, when he had declared that he is entitled which is colored boys was a member. This correspondence was forwarded to the Democratic candidates of Montgomery, and he telegraphed back immediately as follows:

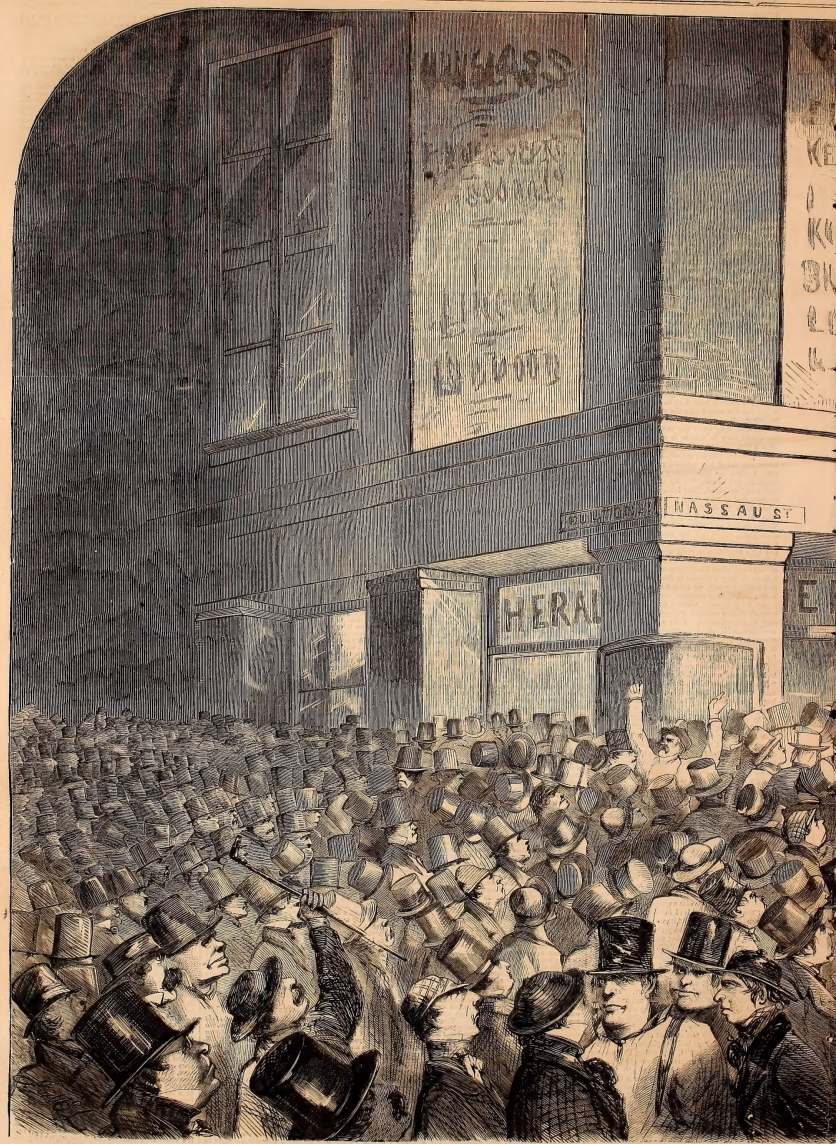
"Mr. Everett is not in favor of the slightest foundation for the charges of Judge Rice, or the inferences of Mr. McCrae. EDWARD LIVERMORE."

NEW LINE-OF-BATTLE STEAMSHIPS.

The board of officers appointed by the Secretary of the Navy to examine and report upon the feasibility of converting our sailing vessels of the line into steamers, have completed their labors, and the Evening Post says that Commissioner Dimmick, of the Navy Department, has received the report from the members of the first class. The expense will, it is estimated, amount to $3,000,000.

DEATH OF OLD GRIZZLY ADAMS.

The telegraph has announced the mere fact that Jones Adams, known as "Grizzly Adams," or "California Adams," is dead. Born in the very eastern woods of Maine, Adams was a hunter from his youth up, and when a boy ready to shoot him, he passed naturally through a rough youth into a wild and adventurous sacrificial manhood. In 1848, he being then forty-three years old, he went to California, and there for a time he found abundant occupation of that coast. His tastes led him to cultivate the society of bears, and he had, as a natural result, but with a remarkable success, using them as pack-horses by day, as blankets by night, and as companions always. Such a collection of them, he came to the East, arriving in this city about two years ago, and was stationed for some time on Thirteenth Street, and few of our city readers have not seen him. Almost for the last year he has spent the closing hours of his pilgrimage in the quiet repose of a retired country living with his family.



DISASTER AT SEA.

We read in the Boston Journal: "A Gloucester correspondent informs us that a conspiracy has been revived at that port of the loss of on the mackerel catchers which left the bay of seven vessels in a single gale with a fare. When just outside of Cape Cross, during the night, a sail was seen to drift down by a steamer, which passed away her bow-sprit and fore-mast, and steering for her own. When daylight came the vessel in sight of the steamer had passed on without offering any assistance to the sufferers. The wind subsided in the course of the morning, and it impossible to reach the boats. Seattle shore, and Captain Lewis, of the vessel, headed for the Western Islands, but had not proceeded far when a terrific storm arose, which tossed the waves together and unmanageable. Seven of the crew were washed overboard in the morning, and the remaining nine took to the land. They were in the boat two days and a half, and suffered much from cold and hunger. Eighteen men were destroyed by sharks. By this misfortune the families of seven widows, wives, and sisters, this condition they floated about for four days, during which time two men died from starvation. One of the bodies was thrown overboard, and the other was kept to satisfy the hunger of the survivors consuming them; but as they were about to partake of his horrid meal, a sail was seen in sight, and they were taken on board. Some more dead than alive.

"The vessel which rescued them was a Portuguese. She carried them to St. Domingo, where they were kindly treated and sent home by the American consul. The name of the schooner is not given, neither the names of the captain nor crew. The disappearance was probably one very ward bound, as no intelligence of such a collision has been received on this side of the ocean."

A DAY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

By CHARLES LEVER.

AUTHOR OF "CHARLES O'MALLEY," "HARRY LORREQUER," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER XVI.

THERE is no denying it, I have led a life of far more than ordinary happiness. The white squares in the checker of my existence have certainly equaled the black ones, and it is not every man can say as much. I suspect I owe a great share of this enjoyment to temperament, to a disposition not so much remarkable for opposing difficulties as for deriving all the possible pleasure from any fortunate conjuncture. This gift I know I possess. I am not one of those strong natures which, by their intrinsic force, are ever impressing their own image on the society they live in. I am a weak, frail, yielding creature; but my very pliancy has given me many a partnership in emotions which, with a more rugged temperament, I had not partaken of. When one has wept over a friend's misfortunes, and awakes to the consciousness that no ill has befallen himself, he feels as some great millionaire might feel when he has bestowed a thousand pounds in charity and not missed it. It is never the poorest with the proud consciousness of this fresh title to men's admiration, he has the secret satisfaction of knowing that he will go clothed in purple before, and fare to-day as sumptuously as yesterday. Do not, my generous race of readers, call this selfishness. It is the very reverse. It is the grand culminating point of human sympathy.

I have a great deal more to say about myself. It is a theme I am really fond of; but I am not exactly sure that you are like-minded, or that this is the fittest place for it. I return to events.

It was on a bright, breezy morning of the early autumn that a heavy old German traveling carriage—a wagon !—rattled over the uneven pavement of Kalkbratenstadt, and soon gaining one of the long forest alleys, rolled noiselessly over the smooth sward. Within sat an elderly lady with a due allowance of air-cushions, toy terriers, and guide-books; in the rumble were a man and a maid; and in the cabriolet in front were a pale but placid girl, with large gray eyes and long lashes, and he who now writes these lines beside her. They who had only known me a few months back as a freshman of Trinity would not have recognized me now, as I sat with a long-peaked traveling-cap, a courier's belt and bag at my side, and the opening promise of a small, furry mustache on my upper lip; not to say that I had got up a sort of supercilious air of consequence to play for the foreigner, which I had observed to be much in favor with the English abroad. It cost me dear to do this, and nothing but the consciousness that it was one of the requirements of my station could have made me assume it, for in my heart of hearts I reveled in enjoyment of all around me. I like the soft, breezy, balmy air, the silver-birch wood, the gray turf overgrown with violets, the wild notes of the frightened wood-pigeon, the very tramp-tramp of the mounted horses, with their erect heads and their jingling bells, all pleased and interested me. Not to speak of her who, at my side, felt a very child's delight at every variety of the way.

"What would I have said to any one who, only a fortnight ago, had promised me such happiness as this?" said I to my companion, as we drew along while the light horsemen reached pleasantly over the roof of the carriage, darkening the shade around us, or occasionally defiguring up the house as we passed it.

"And are you, then, so very happy?" asked she, with a pleasant smile.

"Can you doubt it? or rather is it that, as the emotion does not extend to yourself, you do doubt it?"

"Oh, as for me," cried she, joyfully, "it is very different. I have never traveled till now —seen anything remarkable. My whole very commonplaces of the road, the peasants' costumes, their wayside cottages, the little shrines they kneel at, are all objects of picturesque interest to me, and I am ready to exclaim at each moment, 'Oh! why can not we stop here? shall we ever see any thing so beautiful again as this?'

"And hearing you talk thus, you can ask me am I so very happy?' said I, reproachfully.

"What I meant was, is it not stupid to have no companion over one's shoulder, some friend with whom you could talk without consecrating to a tone beneath you, just as every day we are reduced to words of one syllable for little children?"

"Mademoiselle is given to sarcasm, I see," said I, half pevishly.

"Nothing of the kind," said she, blushing slightly, "I am in perfect good faith, I wished you a more suitable companion. Indeed, after what I had heard from his excellency about you, I was terrified at the thought of my own insufficiency."

"And pray, what did he say of me?" asked I, in a flutter of delight.

"Are you very fond of flattery?"

"Immensely!"

"Is it not possible that praise of you could be so exaggerated as to make you feel ashamed?"

"I should say, perfectly impossible; that is, to a mind regulated as mine over-elation could never happen. Tell me, therefore, what he said."

"I can't remember one half of it; he remarked how few men in the career—I conclude he meant diplomacy—could compare with you; that you had such just views about the state of Europe, such an accurate appreciation of public men. I can't say how many opportunities you mustn't have had, and what mistakes you have not put them to. In a word, I felt that I was about to travel with a great statesman and a consummate man of the world, and was terrified accordingly."

"And now that the delusion is dispelled, how do you feel?"

"But is it dispelled? Am I not shocked with my own ignorance in daring to talk thus lightly with one so learned?"

"If so," said I, "you conceal your embarrassment wonderfully."

And then we both laughed, but I am not quite sure it was at the same joke.

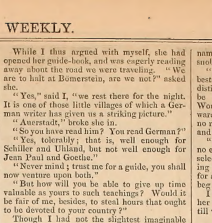
"Do you know where you are going?" said I, taking out a traveling map as a means of diverting our conversation into some higher channel.

"Not in the least."

"Nor care?"

"Nor care."

"Well, I must say, it is a most independent frame of mind. Perhaps you could extend this to philosophy, and add, 'Nor with whom?'"



I was not at all conscious of what an impertinence I had uttered till I was out; nor, indeed, even then, till I remarked how the cheek that I became scarlet, and her eyes double as dark as ever before.

"Yes," said she; "there is one condition for which I should certainly stipulate—not to travel with any one who could recklessly offend me."

I could have cried with shame; I could have held my hand in the flame of a fire to expiate my rude speech. And so I told her; while I assured her at the same time, with marvelous consistency, that it was my habit at all times to have entirely misconception on her part; that nous autres diplomatues—Heaven forgive me the lying assumption!—had a way of saying little smartnesses that don't mean much. And we often made our coin ring on the table, though it turned out bad money when it came to be looked at. But Tollerund did it, and Walewsky did it, and I did it—we all did it!

Now there was one most unlucky feature in all this. It was only a few minutes before this passage occured that I said to myself, "Potts, here is one whose frank, fresh, generous nature claims all your respect and confidence. No pretense of your being this, that, and t'other here. Be truthful and be honest; neither pretend to be man of fortune nor man of fashion; own fairly to her by what chances you adventured upon this strange life; tell her, in a word, you are the son of Potts—Potts, the 'potheary—and neither a hero nor a plenipotentiary!"

I have no doubt, most charitable of readers, that nothing can seem possibly more easy than to have done all this. You deem it the natural and the ordinary course; just as, for instance, a merchant in good credit and repute would feel no repugnance in calling all his creditors together to consult his books, and see that, though apparently solvent, he was in truth utterly bankrupt. And yet I have some difficulty in doing this. Does not the law of England expressly declare that no man need criminate himself? Who accuses you, then, Potts? What is the charge against you? And then I bethought me of the worldly old alchemist who, on learning that Robinson Crusoe was a fiction, exclaimed, "It may be so; but I have lost the greatest pleasure of my life in believing it." What a profound philosophy was there in that simple avowal! With what illusions are we not cheered on through life; how unreal the joys that delight and the triumphs that elate us! for we are all hypochondriacs, and are only cured with bread pills as with bold remedies. "Yes," thought I, "this young girl is happy in the thought that her companion is a person of rank, station, and influence; she feels a sort of selfelation in being associated with one endowed with all worldly advantages. Shall I rob her of this illusion? Shall I rudely deprive her of what imparts a charm to her existence, and gives a sort of romantic interest to her daily life? Harsh and needless would be the cruelty!"

"IS THE MOSQUITO THE HAPPIER FOR HAVING STUNG ONE'S NOSE?"

While I thus argued with myself, she had opened her guide-book, and was eagerly reading away about the road we were traveling. "We are to halt at Bomerstein, are we not?" asked she.

"Yes," said I, "we rest there for the night. It is one of those little villages of which a German writer has given us a striking picture."

"Austrian," broke she in.

"So you have read him? You read German?"

"Yes, tolerably; that is, well enough for Schiller and Uhland, but not well enough for Jean Paul and Goethe."

"Never mind, trust me for a guide, you shall now venture upon both."

"But how will you be able to give up time valuable as yours to such teachings? Would it be fair of me, besides, to steal hours that ought to be devoted to your country?"

Though I had not the slightest imaginable ground to suspect any secret scenario in this speech, my guilty conscience made me look on it as a perfect torture. "She knows me," thought I, "and this saucer at my pretended importance is intended for my confusion!"

"As to my country's claims," said I, haughtily, "I make light of them. All that I have seen of life only shows me the shallowness of what is called the public service. I am resolved to leave it, and for ever."

"And for what?"

"A life of retirement—obscurity if you will."

"It is what I should do if I were a man."

"Indeed!"

"Yes. I have often reflected over the delight I have felt in walking through some man's domesne, reveling in the enjoyment of its leafy solitude, its dreary shade, its sunlit vistas; and I have thought, 'If all these things, not one of which are mine, can bring such pleasure to my heart, why should I not adopt the same philosophy in life, and be satisfied with enjoying without possessing? A very humble lot would suffice for one, nothing but great success could relieve the monotony.'

"What becomes, then, of that great stimulus to good they call labor?"

"Oh, I should labor too. I'd work at whatever I was equal to. I'd sew, and knit, and till my garden, and be as useful as possible."

"And I would write," said I, enthusiastically, as though I were plotting out my share in this garden of Eden. "I would write all sorts of things—reviews, and histories, and essays, and short poems, and, last of all, the Confessions of Agnes Sydney Potts."

"Oh, what a shocking title! How could such names have met together? That shocking genius Potts would vulgarize it all?"

"I really can not agree with you," said I, angrily.

"Without," continued she, "you meant it for a sort of quiz; and that Potts was to be a creature of absurdity and folly, a pretender and a snob."

I felt as if I was choking with passion; but I tried to laugh, and say, "Yes, of course."

"That would be good fun enough," went she on. "I'd like, if I could, to contribute to that. You could invent the situations, and leave me occasionally to supply the reflective parts."

"And your charming, quite delightful."

"Shall we do it, then? Let us try it by all means. We might begin by imagining Potts in search of this, that, or t'other—love, happiness, solitude, climate, scenery, any thing, in short. And as fancy turns up in scenery, try and resonate him, that would be the real way. Do you, for instance, take the label of the next cask I hang it round the neck of the claret decanter; have I changed the quality of the vintage? how I brought Bordeaux to the medium of Oporto? Not a bit of it. And yet a man is to be more the victim of an accident than a bottle of wine, and his intrinsic qualities—strength, flavor, and richness—are not to be tested, but simply implied from the label round his neck! CHAPTER XVII.

I AM forced to the conclusion, Mrs. Keates was not well received as a popularly called an agreeable old lady. She spoke seldom, she smiled never, and she had a way of looking at you, a sort of cold, astonishment, seeming to say, "Now is this? Explain yourself," that kept me in a perpetual terror.

My morning's tiff with Miss Herbert had neither been condoned nor expiated when we sat down to dinner; and the whiff of water-cress can well be imagined: scarcely a word was interchanged as we ate.

"Take some wine, Sir, pray order it," said Mrs. Keates to me, in a voice that might have emanated in answer to Prussic acid.

"This little wine of the country is very pleasant, Madam," said I, courteously, "and I can even venture to recommend it."

"Not to me, Sir. I drink water."

"Perhaps Miss Herbert will allow me?"

"Excuse me, I also drink water."

After a very dreary and painful pause, I dared to express a fear lest that Mrs. Keates had not been fatigued by the day's journey.

She looked at me for a second or two before replying, and then said: "I am totally not aware, Sir, that I have manifested any such signs of weariness as would warrant your inquiry. If I should have, however—"

"Oh, I beg you will pardon me, Madam," broke I in, apologetically; "my question was not one whit more than a mere conventionalness, a matter-of-course expression of my solicitude."

"It will save us both some trouble in future, Sir, if I remark that I am no friend to matter-of-course civilities, and never was."

I felt as if my head and face had been passed across the open door of a blast furnace. I was in a perfect flame, and dared not raise my eyes from my plate.

"The waiter is asking if you will take coffee, Sir," said the inexorable old lady to me, as I sat almost stunned and stupid.

"I will trouble you for a glass of brandy in it," cried I, in the half-despair of one who knew not how to rally himself.

"I think my retire, Miss H.," said Mrs. Keates, rising with a severe dignity that seemed to say, "We are not bound to sit at table-a-tete." And with a stern stare and a defiant little bow she moved toward the door. I was so awestruck that I never moved from my place, but stood resting my hand on my chair, till she said,

"Do you mean to open the door, Sir, or am I to do it for myself?"

I sprang forward at once, and flung it wide, my face all scarlet with shame.

She passed out, and Miss Herbert followed her. Her dress, however, catching in the doorway, she turned back to courteously aid; I raised the moment to stoop down and say, "Do let me see you for one moment this evening—one only moment."

She shook her head in silent negative, and went away.

I sat down at the table and filled myself a large goblet of wine: I drank it off, and replenished it. I did not like morning, a few brief hours ago, and I would not have changed fortunes with the Emperor of France. I loosened my cravat, and looked like some bandit out in a garden, with a glorious vista in the distance. I would not have entered the place in that attitude for the proudest throne in Europe. She was there beside me, listening in rapt attention, as I discovered words, marvels, memories, poetry, and personal adventures. With every changeful expression of lovely sympathy did she follow me through all. I was a hero to her both, myself as much captivated as she was; and now the brief drama was over, the lights were put out, and the curtain dropped. How had I destroyed this golden delusion—why had I quarreled with her, and for what? For a certain Potts—a nonentity, that is to say, who had no existence! "For who is Potts?" said I. "Potts is no more a reality than Child Williams or Peregrine Pickle; Potts is the lay figure that the artist dresses in any costume he requires—a Ranchero to-day, a Bedouin to-morrow. No character of authenticity in the importance we lend to mere names! Here, for instance, I take the label off the next cask I hang it round the neck of the claret decanter: have I changed the quality of the vintage? how I brought Bordeaux to the medium of Oporto? Not a bit of it. And yet a man is to be more the victim of an accident than a bottle of wine, and his intrinsic qualities—strength, flavor, and richness—are not to be tested, but simply implied from the label round his neck! How narrow-minded, after all, of her, who ought to have known better! It is thus, however, we educate our women; this is part and parcel of the false system by which we fancy we make them companionable. The November Action, Indians are far in advance of us in all this: they assign them their proper places and fitting duties: they feel that, in this life of ours, order and happiness depend on the due distribution of burdens, and the Snapping Alligator never feels his square more truly his helpmate than when she is skinning eels for his dinner."

How I hated that old woman! I don't think I ever detested a human creature so much at that. I have often speculated as to whether venomous reptiles have any gratification imparted to them when they inflict a poisonous wound. Is the antipathy thus propelled at length mind one's nose? And, in the same spirit, I should like to know, do the disagreeable people of this world obtain the better from the consciousness of having offended us? Is there that great consoling sense of a mission fulfilled for every cruelty they act and speak? Is every heart they depress? and do they quench hope and extinguish ambition with the same zest that the Sea or the Phœnix put out a fire?

"If you drink wine, Sir, pray order it," said I, mimicking her imperious tone. "Yes, Madam, I do drink wine, and I mean to order it, and liberally. I travel at the expense of that noble old paymaster who only wags his tail the more the more he has to pay—the British Lion. I go down in the extraordinaries. No one who is called a special service, 'Keep an account of your expenses, Paynter!' Confound his insolence, by-the-way, Paynter! Oh, by-the-by, I have never looked how he calls me in my passport. I'm curious to see if I be Paynter there." I had left my passport in putting up that money in my room, and I rang the bell, and told the waiter to fetch it.

The passport set forth in due terms all the dignities, honors, and decorations of the great man who possessed it, and who besought for the little man who travelled by it all aid and assistance possible, and to let him pass freely, etc. "Mr. Paynter," was the subject. "Mr. Paynter! What an outrage! This comes of a man making his mistress a lady, and marrying her. The papal Freedom Pinsky has converted me into a waiter dog. This may explain a good deal of the old lady's insolence. Now could she be expected to be even ordinarily civil to a man called Paynter? She'd say at once, 'His valet was an Italian, and not a born courier, or a valet's or he was a foundling, and called after a favorite spaniel.' I'll rectify this without loss of time. If she has the cue to discover the man of education and breeding by the qualities he displays in travelling, she shall be hanged to her tail mit them by the demands of his self-respect."

I opened my writing-desk and wrote just two lines—a long request for a few moments of interview, signed "A. S. Pottinger." I wrote the name in a fine text hand, as though to say, "No more blunders, Madam, this is large as print."

"Take this to your mistress, François," said I to the courier.

"Gone to bed, Sir."

"Gone to bed—why, it's only eight o'clock."

A shrug and a smile were all he replied.

"And Miss Herbert—can I speak to her?"

"Miss Herbert, she went to her room, and told Clementain not to disturb her."

"It is of consequence, however, that I should see her. I want to speak of our arrangements for to-morrow—the hour we are to start—"

"Oh! but we are to stop here over to-morrow—I thought Monsieur knew that," said the fellow, with the insolent grin of a menial at knowing more than his betters.

"Oh, to be sure we are," said I, laughingly, but affecting to have suddenly remembered it. "I forget all about it, François; you are quite right. Take a glass of wine, François—or take the whole bottle, if you like it." And I handed him a flask of Hochheimer of eight florins' price, right glad to get rid of his presence and escape further temptation from his perjured eye.

How relieved I felt when the fellow closed the door after him, and left me to "blow off the steam" of my indignation all alone! And was I not indignant? Only to fancy this insolent old woman giving her orders without so much as condescending to communicate with me! I am left to learn her whim by a mere accident, or not learn it at all, and exhibit myself only to depart at the inn door, and then hear, for the first time, that I may unpack again.

This was unquestionably a studied rudeness, and demanded an equally studied reprisal. She means to be insolent, and I must disappoint by my influence: how shall I reply to her? A vast variety of expedients offered themselves to my mind: I wrote off, leaving a hurried letter behind me—a document that would cut her to the very soul with the sarcastic bitterness of its tone; but then I knew without a consultation with Miss Herbert—without the fond hope of our meeting as friends? I meant a great deal more, though I wouldn't trust myself to say so. Besides, were I to go away, there were financial considerations to be entertained. I could not, of course, carry off that crimson bag with its gold and silver contents, and yet it was very hard to tear myself from such a treasure.

I say it under conviction, for I have never been rich, and, consequently, never in the position to assert it positively, but I declare my firm conviction to be that no man has ever tasted the unalloyed pleasure of an excellent liberality on a journey who has not traveled at some other person's expense. Be as wealthy as you like, let your portmanteau be stuffed full of circular notes, and there will still be present at moments of payment the thought, "If I do not suffer myself to be cheated here, I shall have so much the more to squander there." But, drawing from the bag of another, no such mean reflection obtrudes. You might as well defraud your lungs of a long inspiration out of the fear of taking more than your share of the atmosphere. There is enough, and will be enough there when you are dust and ashes.

In fact, if I had on one side the "three sources" of the great statesman, I had on the other full thirty reasons against each, and, therefore, I resolved to suspend action and do nothing. And let me here passingly remark that, much as we hear every day about the merits of promptitude and quick-wittedness, in nine cases out of ten in life, I'd rather "give the move than take it." The waiting policy is a rare one: it is the secret of success in love, and of winning an heiress's heart. And so I determined I'd wait and see when should come of it. I appealed to myself thus: "Potts, you are eminently a man of the world, one who accepts life as it is, with all its crosses and untoward accidents, one who knows that the best play had cards even oftener than good ones. No impatience, therefore, no rashness; give at least twenty-four hours' thought to your present decision, and let a night's sleep intervene between your first conception of a plan and its adoption." Oh, if the people who are fretting themselves about what is to happen this day ten years, would only remember that the very time it is—that is, counting by the number of events that will occur between this and to-morrow what incidents are occurring at the antipodes that will yet bring joy or sorrow to their hearts—they would keep more of their sympathies for present use, and perhaps be the happier for the doing it.

THE ICEBERG.

"You're bean a whaler, Ben?"

"Ay, Sir, I have; many long years ago, tho'."

"Now, what do you call the most remarkable peaks of your enterprises?"

"Do D'you mean what I think most difficult—dreffull-like?"

I nodded.

"Well, Sir, I've been pitched out of a boat many a time; once, I recollect, that I was pitched out and got a touch with his tail as well. Lord bless you! it gave me a headache for a month, to say nothing of the ducking."

"Ever seen any ice?"

"Ice! I should think I had. There's a note-book in that corner drawer—no; that one under the further one—that's your Scotchman's recipe ice is it. Ay! that's it, pictures and all. Why I drawed these five-and-twenty year ago. Hardly seams like it, tho' it's a rare mess. I'm sort of Robinson Crusoe like. You've read that?"

"A good many times. Did you ever know any body who lived on ice?"

"I never knew a youngster that hadn't. I believe that's what they call scurvy, or some big going to sea than any that was ever written."

"Suppose we look over your note-book; I should like to see pictures."

"Oh! it isn't written so that you could understand it; but I'll look at it, and tell you the story. If you like—and I must say that I like inquiring, as they say. You must know I once fell a kind of liking for a girl; call her Esther Youngman—that's my trial's real names, but that'll do. She didn't care much for me, and I was only second-mate then. I thought a bit about it, and I said a firm mate's berth as soon as I came home from a short voyage I'd agreed to go to make up my time to the owners. She said she'd wait for me, and so on as one till I came back. With that I went off. When I came home I went there and she was gone they didn't know where. I was off again in a month another. After I left, there had been a handsome seller-fellow after her, and she was sitting with him rather much. I'd been gone about eight months. I talked to mother about it, and after a little I found that she thought so too, and that I was done by by this chap, Montague Fitzjames, as he called himself. In short, she was ruined, and had run away. I went nearly mad at this, and set off after her. Ay, and after about three months I found her at Manchester. I thought to go into the factory; but I asked some questions about her in the neighborhood, and found she'd got a child—a boy—and was working at weaving for a living. And was quite a decent woman. I knew she'd have died rather than be what some would have turned to in her case. So I went up to her door. She was dreadfully thin, and her eyes bright and far back. I went nearly mad at this, and set off again. And Sands. 'Anyhow we'd best stop and make a long day of it to-morrow.'

"I thought this was a good plan; so we went down again, expecting to find Sam.

"He was gone—clean gone! not a trace of him any where. We shouted and fired our guns, but could hear nothing in return.

"'Must stay now,' said the boy; 'it's getting dark, and we sha'n't do any good stumbling over the hummocks to-night.'

"So we staid.

"'Best get up on the berg again,' said Sands. 'He'll stand more chance of seeing us, and we him.'

"We got a few sticks and lit a fire again; and I said I'd watch for the first spell. Sands and the youngster lay down, and I watched.

"I never rightly know how it was, but I was waked up by falling right on my face. I crawled up, and found that the berg was adrift from the pack, and had risen at least ten feet higher, and all on one side.

"Sands and the boy woke up as soon as I did, and says they,

"'She's adrift, Stevens!'

"He looked awful pale, he did; for we could see it was past morning. True enough, she was adrift, and knocking about in the small ice in a way that made us hold on fast to any thing to keep our feet.

"She kept slowly drifting to the east'ard along the edge of the pack, breaking it up as she went; so that there was no chance of our getting off it on to the main fast ice to reach the ship.

"About an hour or two after she started the youngster says to me,

"'Jim Stevens,—'

"Drop the "Mr.," says I; 'it don't sound natural.'

"'Well, Stevens, then; there's Sam!'

"True enough, there he was, running along the edge of the pack like a race-horse; but he soon stopped. We signalled him that it was no use, and motioned him to go back to the ship for help, though there was small chance of his finding his way there in time to do us any good.

"So he went back; and it made us feel queer, I can tell you, to see his back get smaller and smaller, till he was nothing but a little black mark the size of your finger on the ice; and then, 'worst of all, he went over a hummock that quite hid him.

"All this while, till nightfall, we were drifting to the east'ard; whether it was the current or the wind I can't tell, but away we went, jerking and shaking now and then fit to shake us off.

"'Cheer up!' says I to the youngster; 'there's many a man been adrift before. It'll make something to tell the grewer when you get home.'

"'How are we to get home?' says he, quite mournful-like, almost crying; that 'home' of his didn't sound common-like when he said it.

"'Oh!' says Sands, 'all right. Make ourselves jolly till we're taken off it. She'll lodge down against a bit there—look, Stevens!'

"He pointed out a bit of a bay, with a long piece of ice to the main, right athwart our bows as she was then going.

"'We'd best get down there,' says I, 'so as to be ready.'

"So we got down on the nearest point, as we thought, ready. She kept squeezed up the small ice as she neared it; so that we were obliged to get up higher.

"But we could have reached the floe, and got to the ship, when the youngster slipped down, and called out:

"'Stevens,' says he, 'I'm gone!'

"And, sure enough, he would have gone slap down into the open water if his gun hadn't stuck in a crack.

"He was so badly bruised—for he'd slipped over a dozen block—that he couldn't walk.

"'What's to be done now?'

"Done! says Sands, quite savage. 'Why the devil didn't you look to your feet, you young fool?' and he picked him up, and we might almost have done it, when I sung out,

"'Hold on! she's adrift again!'

"She was, too; the floe piece had parted from the main, and was going on before us; and it swung us round right into the stream again.

"'There now,' says he, 'that's your damned clumsiness has done that job; we should have been at it if it hadn't been for you, and I could do it now if I was by myself.'

"And I think he could, for the end of the piece was still touching the pack about a quarter of a mile off.

"'Well,' says I, 'it's no use growling; he didn't mean to fall, I suppose.'

"'Came, you shut,' never could see the good of blaming a fellow when he'd got to suffer for himself.

"'All right!' says Sands, 'I was a little out, but it's all over. Let's make ourselves comfortable for this night—it's no use grumbling, Stevens, as you say.'

"So we got the grub and ate it. Of course we had no fire, and felt precious cold as the wind blew. We all went to sleep, and in the morning I woke first.

"'Sands,' says I, 'here's a go.'

"'We've got in the north current,' says he.

"So we had. There was not a bit of ice within a hundred yards of us; we could just see the blink in the distance.

"'No getting back to the ship now, Sands.'

"'No,' says he; 'ship must come to us—we're in for it—it's infernally cold, tho'; let's get round to the wind'ard.'

"We took the youngster's arm, for he could walk a little now, and got round to wind'ard. Here it was better—not quite so cold. We had breakfast; no fire again tho', and sucking a bit of ice is a poor make-up for a cup of hot coffee, let alone the flavor, even.

"'Now,' says I, 'look here, boys; we're likely to be here a goodish bit, we may as well see what we've got.'"

Here Ben took the note-book from the table, and turned over the pages, muttering "Lost fore-topsail sheet—block," "Monk sprained his ankle," "spoke the Mary Anne," "ice seen," "left ship," "adrift," "Oh! here, that's it."

"You see," said Ben, addressing me, "I always had to keep the log, and I used to keep a log of my own at the same time, till at last it got such a way with me that I felt as if I hadn't done my duty if there was no log kept—got to be a regular thing with me. Lord, Sir! there's in that bottom cupboard the log-book I started on the back: I call 'em logs—of all I've done since I left the sea. I do it every day after tea, and can't quite be happy when I've forgotten it. I'm minister say some pretty about that kind of thing—

"Uo doth breed a habit in a man,'

I think it was.

"Now this here, as I said, is the log of my voyage in 'the floating island,' as I called it in joke once to the mission. She said it was so good a name that it's always been called so since.

"'Well,' said I, "what had you got when you came to count up?'

"Three guns—one was rifled—that was the boy's—line handsome stock it had, too, very light, tho'; but, Lord! they let these only sons have any thing. Two hatchets—short handles—the boy hadn't got one. Then there was three blankets and our clothes we'd got on. There was in the three bags about twelve pounds of fat pork, cooked, and about the same of biscuit. Sands had some tea, but Sleepy Sam had got all the coffee in his bag, so we'd none with us. I'd got a bit of lanyard in my jacket pocket. Also large fishhook—that was the queerest thing. Sands says to the boy:

"'What's that in the corner of your bag?'

"'Oh! it's a hook to catch shark with. Aunt Nelly gave it me.'

"Sore enough it was a big barbed hook with a

"SHE WAS DREADFULLY THIN, AND HER EYES BRIGHT AND FAR BACK IN HER HEAD."

cork on the end—he was a careful boy that—and a bit of chain to it, about two feet.

"'And what did you bring it here for?' says I. "'Expect to catch sharks?'

"'Lord!' how Sands laughed.

"'No,' says the boy; 'only the Captain said we'd most likely shoot some seals, so I thought that would stick into them to drag them along over the ice.'

"It wasn't such a bad notion, you see; so Sands gave over laughing. I think that was about all we'd got with us, and a poor look out it was, too. There was food enough, on short allowance, to last us about five days. By that time, we thought, if we had got into what they call the Arctic cold-current, we should get down to about 61° or so, and fall in with some whalers. So we made up our minds to it, and set about getting a little to rights. The first point was to get warm, because the cold is not only unpleasant, but makes you eat more, if you've got it, and want more if you haven't.

"The wind still kept south, and soon we could see nothing but our own bit of ice all round. When we got to wind'ard it felt warm, so we took all the things round to wind'ard, and cut a hole in the ice to put them in, with a small gutter leading from it so as to keep 'em from the wet. Then we ran a sort of platform level to stand on, but it was dreadfully sloppy; the ice was melting as fast as it could—running down in streams from the top, as the sun shone on it, and making the air quite warm and damp.

"Next morning we resolved on a search of 'the island,' as we called it. Sands and I, with the two guns, went; the boy staid on the platform to look out."

"How large was it, Stevens, altogether?"

"I should say about three times as big as a thousand-ton vessel—of course, of a different shape. Here's the sketch I made of it [see above]; it's as near as I could remember. You see there were two peaks and a bit of floe at the bottom. It wasn't so big, by a long chalk, as some I've seen, you know.

"Let's see—where was I? Oh, I know. Sands and I went down to the floe-piece, and says I to Sands, 'That'll break off soon; it can't stand the wash;' for it was only about six feet through, quite new ice. So we went round the base of the pyramid, keeping as close in as possible, and holding on every step, for it was sloppy and slippy as possible.

"'Hist!' says Sands; 'listen.'

"I listened, and heard something different to the plash of the waves—more splash and splutter-like.

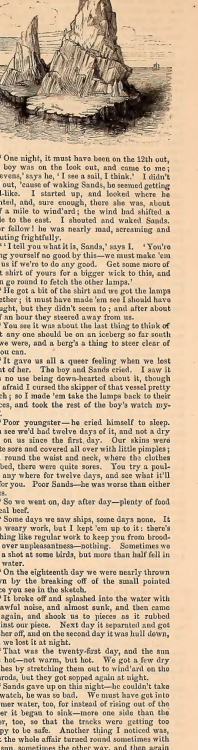
"'Seals,' says Sands.

"And it was, too—three fine ones; they'd been regularly trapped like us. Their holes were up five or eight feet above them; they'd come through the holes and lay on the edges before the bit broke off the main ice and carried them off. Sands and I still they stopped where the berg began, in a place like the angle of the letter V. They stared at us, and we stared at them; but we soon gave over that; for we knocked 'em on the head.

"But the job was, what to do with them; so Sands and I went back, and got the boy's hook; and with the bit of cord I'd got, we got 'em all three on the platform over the bay we was.

"It got dark by this time, and we put off skinning them and cutting them up till next day.

"Next day we set to work and skinned 'em.



"'I say, Stevens,' says the youngster, 'can't you make some shoes out of the skin with the hair a better hold on the ice—and you can cut them into strips crossways, like this—see?' And he scratched on the ice with his knife like this.

"We made them to go over the boot, and soon found we could walk about as easily again. The flesh we put in our 'ice-chest,' as Sands called it, for he laughed at every thing now the boy was well.

"We made some oil, too, tho' it was a tedious job, for we'd only got three pannikins; however,

"One night, it must have been on the 12th out, the boy was on the look out, and came to me; 'Stevens,' says he, 'I see a sail, I think.' I didn't call out, 'cause of waking Sands, he seemed getting on dull like. I started up, and looked where he pointed, and, sure enough, there she was, about half a mile to wind'ard; the wind had shifted a little to the east. I shouted and waked Sands. Poor fellow! he was nearly mad, screaming and shouting frightfully.

"'I tell you what it is, Sands,' says I. 'You're doing yourself no good by this—we must make 'em see us if we're to do any good. Get some more of that shirt of yours for a bigger wick to this, and then go round to fetch the other lamps.'

"He got a bit of the shirt and we got the lamps together; it must have made 'em see I should have thought, but they didn't seem to; and after about half an hour they steered away from us.

"You see it was about the last thing to think of that any one should be on an iceberg so far south as we were, and a berg's a thing to steer clear of if you can.

"It gave us all a queer feeling when we lost sight of her. The boy and Sands cried. I saw it was no use being down-hearted about it, though I'm afraid I cursed the skipper of that vessel pretty much; so I made 'em take the lamps back to their places, and took the rest of the boy's watch myself.

"Poor youngster—he cried himself to sleep. You see we'd had twelve days of it, and not a dry rag on us since the first day. Our skins were quite sore and covered all over with little pimples; and round the wrists and ankles, where the cuffs rubbed, there were quite sores. You try a poultice any where for twelve days, and see what it'll do for you. Poor Sands—he was worse than either of us.

"So we went on, day after day—plenty of food—seal beef.

"Some days we saw ships, some days none. It was weary work, but I kept 'em up to it—there's nothing like regular work to keep you from brooding over unpleasantness—nothing. Sometimes we got a shot at some birds, but more than half fell in the water.

"On the eighteenth day we were nearly blown down by the breaking off of the small pointed piece you see in the sketch.

"It broke off and splashed into the water with an awful noise, and almost sunk, and then came up again, and shook us to pieces as it rubbed against our bows. Sands and the youngster and got farther off, and on the second day it was hull down, and we lost it at night.

"That was the twenty-first day, and the sun was hot—not warm, but hot. We got a few dry clothes by stretching them out to wind'ard on the ramrods, but they got sopped again at night.

"Sands gave up on this night—he couldn't take his watch, he was so bad. We must have got into warmer water, too, for instead of rising out of the water it began to sink—more one side than the other, too, so that the tracks were getting too slippy to be safe. Another thing I noticed was, that the whole affair turned round sometimes with the sun, sometimes the other way, and then again was quite still for a day at a time.

"On the twenty-fourth night—the boy was gone to light the lamps. Sands says to me, 'How long will he be gone?'

"'A half an hour,' says I.

"'Stevens,' says he.

"I told him to try Ben.

"'Ben, then,' says he, 'I'm not going to last much longer. I feel it here, somehow—sort of warning.'

"He did look awful bad, but I told him to cheer up; we might get taken off any time, for we were just in the track now.

"'No, no,' says he, 'it's all over with me, I feel it here;' and he put his hand on his breast. Lord, how thin he was! I came to what I first knew I'd had an lean, and the bones making the skin look shiny over them. Soft, too, it was.

"'There's a thing I want you to do, Ben, if you get off this at all.'

"I told him I'd do any thing for him I could.

"'Now listen, Ben,' says he, 'for I ain't got much wind left.'

"The voyage before last I came home with a lot of money, and made up my mind for a spree; went down below and got a flashy suit of clothes. Well, I didn't like the name of Sands, so I took another, and had a regular game. I'm very sorry now for it, when a fellow's been three years among the coolies it seems as though he ought to have a little freedom when he gets among white people again. Well, I went down to the seaside to a village I knew, and there I saw a girl at church. She seemed took with me, so I struck up an acquaintance with her for a lark. She took it quite serious, and was regularly in love with me, and I got at last to be in love with her. Well, I didn't mean no harm to the girl, I meant to marry her. I did, as true as God,' says he. 'Well, we went wrong; and one night she said I had been cruel to her—and got cross—and then told me we must be found out soon. I was savage at that and at her being cross—poor girl, she'd cause to be. So I said I'd never see her again, and went off in a huff.

"I meant to come back, I did, Ben. I swear it. Instead of that, I met a messmate of mine, and he got me drunk, and shipped me on a West India trader, and when I came to myself I was too far from shore to get back, so I sulked, and shirked duty. The Captain says to me:

"'My man, it's no use—you're here, and you'll be paid. You can't get back any quicker than with me; so do your work like a man, and we shall be back in a couple of months or so, at least.'

"So I did my work. When we got to Kingston I took the fever, and was in the hospital near two months, and he left me there, paying me for the voyage out; and then I came home, and heard that she'd gone away, nobody knew where.

"Well, I set to work to find her, and tried all ways till the money was gone, and then had to ship in the Belle of Aberdeen, for I'm pretty good at whaling, and knew I could get money; and I wished to go back and find her, and get married to her.

"Here he was took with spasms, so bad that I brought out my case-bottle of brandy and gave him a little. I'd just put in the cork, when the boy come running to me and fell down all of a heap like you do.

"What's the matter?' says I.

"He opened his mouth once or twice, and at last got out:

"'A sail! It's close by—I can see 'em on the deck,' and he fainted right dead off.

"I told Sands.

"'A hail!' says he, and tried to get up. Lord! he'd no more strength than a baby, and fell down directly, looking as dead as could be. I wanted to know more about him, so I gave him some more brandy, and asked him the girl's name.

"'The sail,' says the boy, for he'd come to, and would say nothing else. 'Oh, the sail!'

"'What's her name?' says I to Sands. He stared at me as if he didn't hear.

"'The sail!' screamed the boy; 'you'll miss it, and we shall die.'

"I gave him some more brandy, and asked him again as loud as I could:

"'What's her name? What's the girl's name?'

"'Esther Th——,' and he couldn't finish.

"I gave him all that was left now, and asked him again.

"'Esther Thompson,' says he.

"Esther Thompson! Then this was Fitzjames. This chap, Sir, that I'd loved as if he'd been my brother, and loved him still—by G—d, Sir!' said Ben, striking his table with his fist, 'for he never was my greatest enemy—had been the seducer of Esther—and yet I couldn't hate him.

"The boy kept screaming, 'Sail! Sail!' and I was half mad.

"'Ben,' says he, 'do you know her?'

"'Know her! She's all that's dear to me, you d—d villain.'

"'No, no,' says he, quite strong again, 'not villain. I meant no harm to the girl. I meant—I swear I did—to marry her, and nobody would have known any thing about it, if I hadn't been for that drink, Ben;' and all the while the boy kept crying, 'Sail! Sail!'

"'If you ever see her again, tell her that I didn't mean to be a villain. I didn't mean to wrong her. Promise me that.'

"I saw he was going fast, and I promised him I'd tell her.

"'One more thing,' says he. 'Ben, here's something sown in my flannel—cut it out.'

"I cut it out—it was half a six-pence, all crooked and bent.

"'She gave me that,' says he, looking at it as fond as if it was her, and kissing it. 'Give it her back, and tell her I meant to marry her.'

"'I will, 'says I, 'Sands, I will; and may God forgive you, as I do.'

"The boy kept on screaming; so, seeing Sands quiet, I went round to the other side to look at the sail. I was a fool; she was out of all chance of making her hear or see.

"When I came back Sands was gone: one bit of the sticking-plaster was in his hand, I took it out, and took care of it, and then went to the boy. He was almost as far gone as Sands. It was awful night to see them both lying so still—Sands quite dead, and the boy so near it that you could hardly believe he wasn't. Not a drop of brandy either—Sands had it all.

"I don't know how it was, but I never could feel to drink Sands—not when I knew he'd saved it; and I don't believe, now, he meant to act the villain, and have her. As he said, it didn't look it out, for the drink, he might have been alive and happy now. It's a bad thing for a man not to be able to regulate his self; causes him lots of unhappiness. Chaps like him ought to leave it off altogether; still it's a hard thing to see fellows jolly, and not join; makes a fellow feel like a wet blanket to messmates—they're so jolly and merry, and he drinking his lemonade or water. It's rather hard, I should think.

"The boy, he kept on saying, 'A sail! A sail!' He was gone sensaky, you see—didn't know where he was, and weak as an infant—couldn't eat; so I was obliged to boil the seal-beef, and give him the gravy by spoonfuls. Just like a child he was, and, when he hadn't got the spoon to his lips, kept saying, 'A sail! A sail!' as if he hadn't said it five hundred times before.

"It was hard work, for I was getting weak, and so sore round the waist, ankles, and neck, I could hardly bear to move; and you see I couldn't let Sands lie there right in the boy's sight, so I took him round to the other side. It took me about three hours to get him there. I might have thrown him off altogether, but I didn't want any suspicion of foul-play, and there might have been half-a-dozen missing when we were found.

"This I carried on for some five days or so—eating and feeding the boy was all I could do.

"I let the lamps alone, for I was too bad to get to trim them, and lay all day in a sort of stupid fit, half-asleep, half not.

"It kept getting hotter over head all the time, and it was enough to frighten one to see how the ice melted, pouring down in streams like a waterfall all day and all night. I could almost tell the time of day by the sound of the falling water. Mid-day it was a regular roar, and midnight still. About six o'clock in the morning it was almost still. You could almost see it melt. Two or three days after this the boy still kept muttering: 'A sail!—a sail!' I began to get dizzy and queer like—couldn't see now and then. I thought it would soon be all up with me.

"At last I seemed to grow blind—couldn't open my eyes nor move at all. Still I could tell it was getting toward evening, for the sound of the fall was less; but I couldn't move to give the boy any thing nor to get any thing myself; indeed I didn't seem to care about it, nor about him neither, for that matter.

"I was in pain—rather the other; very pleasant sort of feeling, for I was lying on Sands's coat and my own. Then I fell asleep.

"I didn't know any more till I came to, as the women call it.

"I was in a trunk of a small bark, I could tell that by the short pitch she made. Long ships always pitch slower. I heard somebody say: 'He's all right, doctor.'

"So I was in a little while—sat up and asked for food. Lord bless you, Sir, how good it was; I never tasted any thing half as sweet as that beef-tea the doctor gave me. Nice!—I can't tell how nice it was. You see I'd been getting up an appetite for it. Whether I should like to go to the same school again to learn how nice beef-tea could be, I don't know—rather think not.

"In a few days I was well—rather thin and pale, I think, to what I am now—and then I asked them how they found me.

"'Esther' marked on the arm in blue points with red capitals. Two flags and a half moon under, with a part of a head on it—may be the picture of half a coin of some kind—no other marks on the body. Doctor read prayers.

"Wind shifted, and blew rather heavy from S.W. Took in the main royal.

"June 23.—Man better; boy still muttering when I was being fed, can't eat yet; man got up at four o'clock and came on deck; said his name was Stevens; that they got on the berg in May from the Belle of Aberdeen. Out twenty-nine days when he went off. We found him next day, the 20th out we expect. Doctor says another day would have killed them both. The man, Sands, died the 24th day out, at night.

"'There, that's the log,' said Ben, 'and now I can tell you the rest, for I was well on the fourth day, though not strong—could walk about the deck. The doctor gave me some ointment for my throat and waist, and I was all right in about a week.

"The boy, too, got better, and left off muttering. Doctor read to him, made him work about the ship, and tried all sorts of ways to make him think of something else.

"In another fortnight I said good-by to the Esmeralda's people, and started for the north in a steamer, taking the boy with me.

"We saw the owner, and found that the Captain of the Belle of Aberdeen had written home, and that they'd given us up for lost. Sleepy Sam reached the ship the day after he left us.

"The owner was so pleased with me that he gave me £500 for taking care of his son. I said I'd only done my duty, but he would have me take it, so at last I did.

"'And,' says he, 'Ben, my boy' (they always call us boys), 'Ben, my boy,' says he, 'if ever you want a friend, you know where to come for one. I should have been a broken-hearted man, Ben, if it hadn't been for you taking care of him. God bless you, Ben!' says he, 'and may you get on as if there wasn't other names—and asking me, too, just as if I cared as much about it as she did; but Lord, Sir, they don't think any body's a right to think of any body but their 'him.'

"'Yes,' says I, 'I have seen him, Esther.'

"Where is he? Take me to him!' She looked at me a minute. 'No, Ben,' says she, 'he's dead! I know he is. I see he is! Oh, my God! my own Fitzjames is dead!' And she gripped my hand so hard, and sank back in the chair and shut her eyes.

"After a little she says, 'Ben, tell me all about it. Poor fellow! dead!'

"I told her as much as I could about it; and then I told her about the six-pence.

"'Give it me,' she said; 'give it me, Ben. It's the last thing I gave him before—give it me.'

"I gave it her, and she kissed it quite solemn like, just as tho' it had been his dead forehead.

"Then I told her what he said about his not meaning to leave her.

"'Did he say that?'

"'He did, Esther—he swore it; and I believe it.'

"She looked hard at me for a little, and then said,

"'Thank you, Ben, for that; I'm so glad you believe it. I knew he didn't mean to leave me; and she got up and called her father, and says,

"'Father, he didn't mean to leave me. Ask Ben here: he said so with his dying breath. He swore it, Ben, didn't he? and you believes it himself, don't you, Ben? Tell father, do.'

"I told the old man.

"'Ah,' says he, 'poor fellow! Dead too! He's rightly punished.'

"'And you, Ben,' says she, 'he told Ben he didn't mean to wrong me—he did;' and she seemed as if she was quite glad. 'I knew he never did.'

"'I do, too,' said the Esther that makes much difference whether he did or not. He did it, and you've got your good name—and ours too, for that matter, Esther.'

"'I know it, I know it; but still he told Ben that he didn't mean to leave me. God bless him! And she fell to kissing the bit of six-pence like mad.

"I saw she was going off into hysterics, so I called her mother, and left; for it's no use a man's fussing about at them times: you can't do any good, and get in the way a good deal.

"Next day she came down to mother's.

"'Ben,' says she, 'thank you for the good I owe you; it's the first I've saved out of the shirts. The curate's been very good to me, and so has his wife. She always makes hands with me; and one day I was crying when she came, for baby was so ill, and she kissed me, Ben, on the forehead, and said, 'Poor child!' It just like as if she was my mother, Ben, she's been so good to me.'

"I took the pound, and gave her the paper, and I didn't see any more of her for some week or so.

"One day I had a letter from the owner's wife, asking me if she could do any thing for Sands's relations; for the boy, you see, had told her about Sands. So I went down to Esther, and showed her the letter, and asked her what I should say.

"'Did the young gentleman see much of him, Ben?'

"'Of course,' says I, 'was there all the time—took his turn of lighting the lamps when Sands was bad.'

"'Was "Sands" his real name, not Fitzjames?'

"'Yes, Sands.'

"'I should like, Ben, to go and live with the lady, so as to be near this young gentleman who's seen so much of him.'

"'You see, she might have lived with us, only I couldn't say that, and she didn't seem to think of it.'

"'I don't know that she'd like that, either. If you'd been his wife, you see, it would have been different.'

"But he did mean that I should be, didn't he, Ben?'

"'That's true, but then you're not; but still, I'll write and ask her.'

"And so I try and get me to go, Ben?'

"'Esther,' says I, 'I'd lay down my life to serve you any time, and I promised Sands I'd do any thing I could for him; but with this there's no luck.'

"She took my hand into both hers, and kissed it hard, but it took me it was time, and I touched his. She'd a kissed any thing that had touched him, she would; and though she was kissing my hand, I knew I'd have had to have it here then, anyhow. I should have choked if I'd tried.

"Well, I wrote and told the lady all about it, and she wrote back, and her and the doctor asked me to come down.

"Esther wouldn't give me back the letter with that in though it was written for me; but I didn't care so long as she was happy.

"I was to go down by land, and the way down she did nothing but cry and talk about Sands. I took her to the owner's house, and she saw the lady and the doctor, and I left her there, for the next mother voyage—not north though, you may guess, I'd had enough of ice for some time—and money enough to keep me for a bit. I never felt quite easy about it, so I settled some of the money upon mother, and the rest upon Esther, without her knowing it, and went off.

"I got a letter from—the owner's son—I suppose I ought to call him a gentleman now, instead of 'the boy,' seeing he was quite the gentleman in the counting-house now.

"I have him in the pocket of this book."

He took the letter, old, creased, and yellow, from the pocket, handed it me, and with his leave I copied it afterward. It ran thus:

"CLARENDON, —— STREET, Aug. —, 18—.

"DR. BEN,—I told you I'd write soon, so I'm now going to fulfil my promise. I'm in the counting-house—got the drudgery to go through. Governor says that no boy's fit for any thing as a clerk until he's done the lowest work of the office. You and he think alike: I recollect telling you the same. Don't forget your other side. I've spent pocket-money, still enough, you know, Ben; and Aunt Nelly has given me a couple of pounds. I can lick a cad six times out of ten, at twenty paces.

"I left the lamps alone, for I was too bad to get to trim them, and lay all day in a sort of stupid fit, half-asleep, half not.

"It kept getting hotter over head all the time, and it was enough to frighten one to see how the ice melted, pouring down in streams like a waterfall all day and all night. * "I FELT AS IF I WAS OUT OF MY MIND WHEN I FOUND ESTHER'S HANDS GROW COLD."

"'Mate 'll tell you,' says the Captain, 'give you his log, you can copy it if you like.'

"I did, and here it is, a fair copy—it looks nice, you see, by the side of these others, cause they were written when the paper was sticky with water, and my fingers were numbed with cold, and written with pencil, too. This I wrote in the Captain's cabin with a pen. I kept it in the same book, tho' the paper was bad, so as to have it all together.'

I took the book, and, with Ben's permission, copied the log again:

"'Barque 'Esmeralda,' June 21.—Wind S.W. 8.—rather heavy; got sun long. 62° 10′, lat. 44° 15′. Wind steady—relieve clock—sighted a sail three points starboard bow—couldn't see name—carpenter finished new spanker-boom—opened hatches, took up 3 casks beef and 1 kettle porter. About two o'clock sighted an iceberg right a-head —passenger wanted to see it nearer—Captain ordered to steer accordingly. About four could make out shape. Mr. Burton said he could see two black and white birds on it with the glass—was quite near; half past four saw that they were a man and a boy—lowered quarter-boat starboard, and went to their assist off; they lying on a small ice-floe out of the water—some difficulty to get at them—sent up three men and lowered them into the boat. They seemed dead—went round and found another man—lowered him into the boat—took off three seal-skulls with black wicks in them; been used as lamps; plenty of seal-flesh there. Brought them all aboard. Doctor said one man—the one found alone—was quite dead—the others not dead. Put baths in the Captain's cabin. Doy came to and said, 'A sail! a sail!' and kept on saying it: the man seemed mostly dead. After four hours—about half past eight—he came to and said, 'Where's the boy?' Told him he was all right—took in studsails—wind shifted two points—iceberg hull down at ten—lost sight of it at twelve.

"June 22.—Wind S.S.W.—Heavy rain—man better—boy still keeps saying, 'A sail! a sail!' Doctor says he's quite mad—man not allowed to talk—lies still—doing well—gave him beef-tea. Sands,' clothing good, but much worn and sodden.

"'Have you seen him?'—'him,' you know, as if there wasn't other names—and asking me, too, just as if I cared as much about it as she did; but Lord, Sir, they don't think any body's a right to think of any body but their 'him.'

"She took my hand into both hers, and kissed it hard, but it took me it was time, and I touched his. She'd a kissed any thing that had touched him, she would; and though she was kissing my hand, I knew I'd have had to have it here then, anyhow. I should have choked if I'd tried.

"Well, I wrote and told the lady all about it, and she wrote back, and her and the doctor asked me to come down.

"Esther wouldn't give me back the letter with that in though it was written for me; but I didn't care so long as she was happy.

"I was to go down by land, and the way down she did nothing but cry and talk about Sands. I took her to the owner's house, and she saw the lady and the doctor, and I left her there, for the next mother voyage—not north though, you may guess, I'd had enough of ice for some time, and money enough to keep me for a bit. I never felt quite easy about it, so I settled some of the money upon mother, and the rest upon Esther, without her knowing it, and went off.

"I got a letter from—the owner's son—I suppose I ought to call him a gentleman now, instead of 'the boy,' seeing he was quite the gentleman in the counting-house now.

"I have him in the pocket of this book."

He took the letter, old, creased, and yellow, from the pocket, handed it me, and with his leave I copied it afterward. It ran thus:

"CLARENDON, —— STREET, Aug. —, 18—.

"DR. BEN,—I told you I'd write soon, so I'm now going to fulfil my promise. I'm in the counting-house—got the drudgery to go through. Governor says that no boy's fit for any thing as a clerk until he's done the lowest work of the office. You and he think alike: I recollect telling you the same. Don't forget your other side. I've spent pocket-money, still enough, you know, Ben; and Aunt Nelly has given me a couple of pounds. I can lick a cad six times out of ten, at twenty paces.

"I haven't got much more to say. My neck has got all right, except a scar; and there's a scar on the left leg, which I hit it that day I fell on the blocks.

"That puts me in mind of Mrs. Sands. I say, Ben, was she Mrs. Sands, after all? You know what I mean. 'The boy,' as you used to call me, it quite out of mother's good books, and Mrs. Sands's too, because he won't tell for the ten thousandth time the story of being on the ice.

"I've had to tell so many people, I'm sick of it, and mother wants me to tell it over and over again: and as for Mrs. Sands, she's always harboring me to have her lie dished. I liked Sands well enough, you know, but I didn't see him die, and so you said after I saw the sell, so I could tell her very little. She's marked in her prayer-book the prayer the doctor read over him when he was buried.

"Every time you're next door to a fed for going to see again, but I suppose you know best. Mrs. Sands is, after all, a nice woman, and mother takes to her amazingly—treats her more like a daughter than a servant, and sets more like one, too. I know many girls that she'd half as hobylike as she is, spite of their silks. I've got my clothes mended, and I haven't had a button off for weeks. I used always to go about with a bit of string or cotton somewhere for a button. I say, Ben, if you were able up to her she'd have you. I know. I saw her cry over your hot letter, in her room."

"I'd understood Sands in it," said Ben, by way of explanation.

"She's only a widow, after all, and any one might be proud of having Sands, he's such a jolly little man. Very strong as possible—we're quite friends. He seems to like me, and Mrs. Sands is never happier than when we're having him. She says I've been near him, and he would have moved her. She means breath.

"Good-by, old whom. Thanks for feeding me with a bone spoon. Mother keeps it in her pocket, I think. If you want a friend, Ben, or money, or any thing, you know where to find your own boy. He ain't a boy now, though.

"Your own

"FRED TRELAWNEY."

"I had one or two more letters that voyage, but nothing in them that's about my story." How did he mean to write about himself: boys mostly do, I think. Sometimes he mentioned Esther—not often much about her, and that she was well, sent her love: that's something of that kind.

"I was gone about a twelvemonth; and of course when I got back I went to see them at Glasgow.

"The owner's wife, she shook my hand, and Esther kissed me as cool as could be, just as if I'd been her brother, while I could have held her, and never let her go, if I'd not been cured of all such stuff. She was going away from there to take care of the old people at home, so we went together; and all the time she was with Sands, till I was sent off to sea of it; still I didn't show it, because I liked to hear her talk; and I got a pleasure in every with him that made you feel happy, no matter what she said, and you never would have made her see that Sands wasn't the pleasantest subject to talk to me about.

"We got home—I lived with mother, and she with the old folks. I got a berth at a ship-yard, as foreman, you know, and I didn't care to go to sea again.

"I went to see her every day and nursed the youngster; he soon got to know me, and called me 'Fa.' She didn't mind a bit—rather liked it, I think.

"One day, after I'd been at home about six months, mother says to me:

"'Ben, you might as well go and ask Esther to live with you; you spend so much of your time there that people talk about it.'

"'I will, mother,' says I—quite red, I know I was—'that people would mind their own concerns.'

"'Ah, well!' says she, 'they won't, and never will.'

"That evening I went down to Esther, and I said to her:

"'Esther, I can't live like this much longer; Esther, I'm getting ill, and the river looks too pleasant to me when I want to make me feel safe. I shall do something desperate: I'm not quite my own master at times. Esther, I want you to be my wife.'

"'I couldn't make you happy if I was, Ben—I can never forget poor Sands.'

"'Esther,' says I, 'if you'll marry me I shall be happier than I am now. I want a companion, and I'm always up here after you, and people talk about it—not men, you know,' says I, 'for I'd soon find a way to stop their mouths.' (Ben's clenched fist certainly looked at this moment a very effectual remedy for a fast tongue in an unwise head.) 'But it is the women, Esther, and I can't stop them saying what they like. They're so kind always to one of their own sex, too, that's had a misfortune.'

"So they talk, do they, Ben?'

"'Yes, they do,' and it's latter, unless I'm to go to sea, or away again, that we should be married.'

"'Ben,' says she, 'it isn't every man that would make that offer to a woman like me with no good name, and a baby.'

"'I do though, Esther.'

"'Well, then, Ben, I will be your wife. I can't give you the same kind of love that poor John had, but I'll do my duty to you as a good wife, and I'm sure you'll be a father to my boy, Ben, dear.'

"She said this as calm as if I'd asked her to take a walk, or any thing else as simple.

"I went down home, and told mother: she seemed glad of it: I suppose she saw it must be anyhow.

"Next night, as I was leaving, Esther put a letter in my hand. 'Read that when you get home,' says she; 'it may alter your mind, Ben, about this.'

"I recollect well the feeling it gave me when I took it.

"When I got home I read it—there it is—heart-ways that's a copy of it."

I read:

"DEAR BEN,—When I was at Manchester, when little Johnny was born, the doctor told me I should never be a mother again. I don't understand these things, but that's what he said. I couldn't tell you this, because it's not the sort of thing I could talk about to you; but I didn't think it right to marry you without telling you how it was.

"Yours very affectionately,

"ESTHER SAUER."

"Now you know it was rather dumping to me, 'cause I'm fond of children; I'm makes you feel good to have the little ones crawling about you, and going to sleep in your arms. Them French women wouldn't be half as bad if they nursed their own babies, to my mind. But still I didn't feel like giving it up, 'cause of that; but I thought it was what many women wouldn't have done in her case, and I thought all the more of her for it.

"Well, we were married by the curate, and his wife came to the wedding and kissed her. There are some good Christian women in the world, and that grey-eyed wife of the curate's was one.

"We took this little house near the old people, and there we lived as happy as could be. She did her duty's duty, and more than that. She used to twice about any thing—the moment I expressed a wish for any thing, she seemed to do her best to get it for me. My word was always best. I used for her, she said; but I don't know how it was, I wasn't quite myself. She seemed to like me, and something more wanted to make me quite happy. She did all I wanted, and yet, somehow, it wasn't quite what I wanted. I'm sure she loved me all but not, as she told me at first, with the same love she had felt for Sands.

"We used to talk about him, and it made me high mad at times to see her eyes sparkle and her face glow when I praised him. She was always more fond of me after I'd been talking of Sands.

"She couldn't see a fault in him. I've heard a good deal in my time about love, and second love, and that sort of thing, but my opinion is this, that a woman can only love once with that kind of love that see no faults—that kind of love that takes up all de opinions, his views—so that if you know one you know hers.

"Well, if they do get married in this state of mind, they don't wake out of it for a long time—mostly they don't, for I've known the love last much after twenty; it's like a fever—they have it, and they're safe then. Other things weigh with them—I may say, with us, for I was one of 'em. They get more set then, criticize (don't you call it?) a man, know his faults, admit them to others, but then they do their duty, whether they love in the one case than the other; still a man feels somewhere which kind of love he has got, and I was quite satisfied without the first kind—at least I think so. I remember one night, about three months after our marriage, I'd been talking of Sands a good deal to somebody who'd been to supper with us, and she was quite alive, I could see outside me about it, and I thought, 'Ah, though she'd never heard it all before. We locked up the house and went to bed—Esther always first into bed, was our bedroom—she fell asleep almost directly with one hand under my neck, and her face in mine. I was awake, I'd been talking and getting and got excited a little. It was a moonlight night, and the light came in between the blind and the side of the window, and I saw Sands.

"I was looking at her, as I said, half on my back and half on my side; presently she put her other hand to her face, and I could see it trembling as if I'd been a baby, and murmured, 'John, dear John,' and then drew my head down and kissed me. She was dead asleep, too; but, by G—d, Sir, it was a thing I shall never forget! Don't I felt mean! I'd got what I'd sought it was her say 'John, dearest John,' and my name Ben. She was dreaming of him, and he was dead; and I didn't sleep a wink after that. Early in the morning she told me she'd been dreaming of him, and that he had called him. I didn't tell her I knew it before, though, for she was always as kind as could be to me when awake; still, you know, it gave me a turn, and I thought I'd the kind of love for me that I wanted, and I couldn't make her feel any different if I spoke ever so much, so I never told her.

"After this, it happened once or twice; but I used to wake her up by touching her, or some way or another. I couldn't bear it, you know, by G—d, I couldn't, Sir!) You fancy your wife whispering John, dearest John,' and your name Ben all the while.

"So we lived on for about ten years; she's been dead fifteen. She was taken ill on Sunday, 23rd September she died, in that room where I sleep now. I don't know what she died of; but she kept getting paler and thinner and weaker, and in the daytime for years; then took to her bed, and was barely again upon six months. Some women, you do, she made me tell her all about how Sands died, and what he said; and she took the two bits of the sixpence in her hand, and kept them, and I told me she'd like to be buried with 'em there.

"'There's one thing,' she says, 'I should like, too, Ben dear, if you don't mind; you won't be angry with me?' 'Angry with her,' and she lay dying! I told her I'd do any thing that she asked me.

"'Can't you put poor John's name on the tombstone, Ben?'

"'I don't know how, Esther; it isn't as if you'd been his wife.'

"'I didn't mean this unkind, and she knew it, for we always talked that way about it.

"'But he meant to make me his wife; didn't he, Ben?'

"'He did, Esther, I'm sure.'

"'Can't you say that, then, on it?'

"'I don't see how. I'll speak to the curate about it, so as to make it look proper.'

"'Thank you, Ben. You've been a good husband to me, Ben—better than I deserved; but I think sometimes you did, Ben? I told you at first I couldn't feel for you like I did for poor John; didn't I, Ben?'

"'You did, Esther, and I know it, and I have felt it; but you've been a good wife to me, you've done your duty to me, and thank you for it.' You see I never could say much, if I felt ever so.

"The curate's wife came in just then, and Esther's eyes looked bright; that little gray-eyed woman made every body look better for being with her.

"'Esther, can I do any thing for you?'

"'My boy will want a mother; be one to him, will you?'

"'That I will, Esther;' and she came round to the bedside and kissed her.

"Ben, take my hand, and hold it in yours, dear.'

"I took her hand, and held it till she died. Just before she died, she said,

"'God bless you, Ben. I'm sorry to leave you, dear, but I'm going to him. I'll tell him you kept your promise. Be as kind to his boy as you've been to me, Ben. God bless you!'

"She never spoke again; but late quite still for an hour or more with her eyes shut, and I only knew she was dead when her hand felt cold.

"'Come, Ben,' says the curate's wife, 'you mustn't stay here now, it will do you no good. Come, Ben.'

"She took my hand, and I took hers, and she led me down stairs to this room, and put me in the chair you're sitting in. She gave her orders to the servant about getting something to come, I couldn't let go her hand; it seemed to keep me alive; and she let it stay there. I seemed to fancy that Esther was not dead when I held that hand. I don't know how long she staid. Esther died at eight; and they told me afterward that the curate had been, and seen me holding his wife's hand, and left her there till I fell asleep, about nine o'clock; so it was mortal hours did she sit beside me. It was the kindest thing I ever knew from a woman to do. Some people might think it foolish. I think it saved my reason, for I felt as if I was out of my mind when I found Esther's hand got cold.

"I went to the funeral, and we had a stone put up; and you can see it in the church-yard there. That's all, Sir."

"Sacred to the memory of Esther, the intended wife of John Sands, and wife of Benjamin Stevens."

"It would make no difference to her whether I put it on or not, Sir, but I seem to keep my word, you know; can't feel it right to break it to any but mad people, when you've made them a promise to keep them sacred. I don't know that it's right then?"

"And the son?"

"Oh, he's captain of the Clara, now gone to Melbourne. He was away when she died. He didn't write to her much, Sir, as I told him, his mother's story would be sure to leak out, and he'd find afore that he'd have hard lines on account of it; so he was at sea, and he's been captain this last three years, and a thorough good seaman too."

"I see you don't wear your wife's wedding-ring."

"No; I couldn't get it over any of my fingers, it's so small; but it's not colder now than it was when she had it on her finger."

"Well, Ben, yours is a strange story."

"Perhaps it is; but there's many a stranger stowed away in some men's hearts; ay, and many a big ship, overboard, would make men stare a little."

Perhaps you'll let me look at what you call your 'land-logs' some day."

"Oh yes. It's no use living if you don't do some good; and perhaps some might might be happier for knowing what Ben Stevens had seen in his sixty years' voyage."

I went down the church-yard home, and looked at the tombstone, and felt a respect for the old sailor who goes about with his wife's wedding-ring on a piece of string, and rather because his fingers had been made too large by toil for the ring to fit them. I thought it possible that a hard hand and a soft heart may exist together. I felt satisfied that they are united in my friend Ben Stevens.

THE LEGEND OF LITTLE PEARL.

"Poor little Pearl, good little Pearl!"
Sighed every kindly neighbor;
It was so sad to see a girl
So tender, doomed to labor.

A wee bird fluttered from its nest
Too soon, with weak neck creature—
Just fit to rest in mother's breast,
The darling of fond Nature.

God shield poor little ones, where all
Must help to be bread-bringers!
For once afoot, there's none too small
To ply their tiny fingers.

Poor Pearl, she had no time to play
The merry games of childhood;
From dawn to dark she worked all day,
A wooding in the wild wood.

When others played, she stole apart
In palo and shadowy quiet,
Too full of care was her child heart
For laughter running riot.

Hard lot for such a tender life,
And miserable garden;
But like a womanly wee wife,
She bravely bore her burden.

One wintry day they wanted wood
When need was at the sorest;
Poor Pearl, without a bit of food,
Must up and to the forest.

But there she sank down in the snow,
All over numbed and aching:
Poor little Pearl, she cried as though
Her very heart was breaking.

The blinding snow shut out the house
From little Pearl so weary;
The lonesome wind among the boughs
Moaned with its warnings eerie.

To little Pearl a Child-Christ came,
With footfall light as fairy;
He took her hand, he called her name,
His voice was sweet and airy.

His gentle eyes filled tenderly
With mystical wet brightness:
"And would you like to come with me,
And wear this robe of whiteness?"

He bore her bundle to the door,
Gave her a flower when going:
"My darling, I shall come once more,
When the little bud is blowing."

Home very wan came little Pearl,
But on her face strange glory:
They only thought, "What ails the girl?"
And laughed to hear her story.

Next morning mother sought her child,
And clasped it to her bosom;
Poor little Pearl, in death she smiled
And in the rose was full in bloom.

THACKERAY ON TRUE GENTLEMEN.

THE London Saturday Review lately sneered at Thackeray for not being a "true gentleman." The great novelist replies in the new number of the Cornhill, as follows:

"MINE EASE IS MINE INN.—Do you object to talk about inns? I always seem to use to be very good talk. Walter Scott is full of inns. In 'Don Quixote' and 'Gil Blas' there is plenty of inn-talk. Fielding, and Smollett immortally speak about them; and, in their travels, the last two tot up the bill, and describe the dinner quite minutely while Sterne and Goldsmith never mention over a cab, and weeps generous tears over a donkey; but then you know the Superfine Review says that Sterne is not a true gentleman.

"I wonder whether my Superfine friend ever heard of Boswell's Memoirs. I remember every about the true gentleman there narrated, and in which Lawrence appears amusing, lively, and lyrical.

"I was seated at dinner,' says Dutens, 'between my Lord Berkeley and the famous Sterne, author of "Tristram Shandy".' Lucian was also the English Rabelais. The dinner was very gay: it was the day of England's birthday, and we drank after the English fashion, and according to the day. The conversation happening to fall on Turin, Mr. Sterne asked me if I knew Mr. Peters, especially myself. All the company began to laugh, and Sterne, who did not know I was so near, supposed this gentleman must at least be a relation, or at the mention of his mere name set every one laughing. "He is a very singular man, is he not?" says Sterne. "Quite an original," said I. "So I supposed," continued Sterne; "I have heard of him." And Sterne went to set to work to make a portrait of me while I pretended acquiescence in all he said. Seeing that the subject amused the company, out of the fertility of his imagination he invented several stories, which lasted, to the general diversion, until it was time to take leave. I was the first to go, and was scarcely out of the house when Sterne told him who I was, adding, that out of respect for Lord Tyrconnel, I had restrained myself, but that I was a not very tractable person, and he might be sure that on the morrow I should call him to account for his statements of me. He thought himself that he had carried the raillery too far, for he was a little gay: and next day he came to see me, and found my garden for one thing he had said which might displease me, excusing himself from the circumstance and the fact that he had to amuse the company, which he saw was so diverted the moment my name was mentioned. I stopped him short, assuring him that I knew him so much amused as any body, that he had said nothing to offend me, and that if he had known the person of whom he spoke as well as I did, he might have said a great deal more harm of him. He was enchanted with my reply, embraced me, begged my friendship, and quitted me very much pleased with me.'

"Ah, dear Lawrence! You are lucky in having such a true gentleman as my friend to appreciate you! You see he was lying, but then he was amusing the whole company. When Lawrence found they were amused, he told more lies. Your true gentleman always does. Do you like to laugh at the company at a strange table, perhaps you and I would not tell lies: but then we are not true gentlemen, are we in what a gentlemanlike-like way Lawrence carries off the lies! A man who wasn't accustomed to lying might be a little disconcerted at meeting with a person to whose face he had been uttering above and falsehood. Not so Lawrence. He goes to Dutens:—it is true he had heard the other was pen treviable—a rough customer (if my Superfine friend will pardon the vulgarity of the expression); he goes to Dutens, embraces him, and asks for his friendship! Heaven bless him! Who would not be honored by the friendship of a true gentleman, who had told such lies about you to your face?

"Several years ago, when I was preparing some lectures in which Sterne was mentioned, a gentleman from Bath sent me Sterne's own journal to Eliza, another gentleman's wife, whom our revered friend was courting a good deal. Now, in Sterne's published letters there are indications of three or four wives at least to whom our gentleman made love—his own not included. Among the objects of the affection of that noble heart is a certain Lady P., to whom the divine makes the fiercest avowals of love—as a true gentleman, of course, should. This letter to Lady P. in the printed collection bears no date but Tuesday, and appears among the early letters of 1757. After making hot love to her ladyship, the noble creature says if she won't see him that evening, he will go to Miss ——'s benefit, for which he has a box-ticket.

"What actress had a benefit on a Tuesday in 1757? On Tuesday, 21st April, Miss Pope and Miss Politer had benefits respectively at Drury Lane and Covent Garden; and unless Lady P. gave her reverend friend, the true gentleman, the assignation which he wanted, it is probable Yorick went to the theatre.

"Did he note this little fact in his journal to his dear Eliza in India? Not one word did the true fellow whisper about the circumstance. Would I stab thy true heart, my Eliza, by confessing frailties which are trivial in true gentlemen? No, tender and confiding creature! I will lie to thee. That is much easier. And accordingly Lawrence says not one word about the play or Lady P. to Eliza, but tells her how he is very ill, how the doctors have been with him, and how he is sorry for this wicked world; in fact, he departed in the next year. Ah! Mr. Saturday Reviewer, next time you go out of your way to sneer at living and bepraise dead gentlemen, pick a better specimen than this wretched old sinner. I may not be good enough for a person of your lordship's fine taste, and you feel justly indignant at my familiarity: but Mr. Sterne?—Come, come. I thought this was to be a chapter about inns! Oh, yes! I stopped to have a ride on Sterne's dead donkey.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Burnett's Cocoaine.

This is an article which we can heartily recommend, and that from knowing its great virtues. One particular case in our family of its efficacy we will mention. The person had suffered with a sore fever, which was most tedious, and which left her with a terrible neuralgia in the head. The effect of these complaints was to cause much of the hair to fall off, and there seemed to be no power in the skin to give life to what remained. After she had tried some other preparations with no good results, we procured for her a bottle of Cocoaine, and the change which its use soon made was truly remarkable. The roots of the hair at once received new life, and before a bottle had been used the large spot upon the top of the head, which appeared to be bald, was covered with what seemed a new growth of hair. And now she has as fine and healthy a head of hair as before her sickness. This Cocoaine is also a valuable article for children's hair, which is very apt to be dry. A very small quantity will keep their hair moist and their heads clean.

What we say of this article we say from our own actual knowledge, and for the sake of puffing for no one, and because we think others may be benefited by our experience.—Boston Christian Freeman.

Bronchitis.

The following testimonial from Rev. E. R. RYCKMAN, MONTREAL, gives evidence of the efficacy of BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES, or Cough Lozenges.

Montreal, Oct. 24th, 1859.

MR. S. J. LYMAN, Place d'Armes.

DEAR SIR:—I am very happy to inform you of the benefit I have received from the use of "Brown's Bronchial Troches." Two or three times I have been attacked by Bronchitis, or some such trouble of the Throat, in such a way as to make me greatly fear, that with the very best of general health, and after only three years' labor in the ministry, I would be compelled ere long to desist from ministerial labor through disorder of the throat and lungs. But a moderate use of the "Troches" has driven all my fears away, and I now find myself able to preach frightful, for weeks together, without the slightest inconvenience. I have had the pleasure of recommending them to others, and know that they have been used with similar happy results.

Yours gratefully,

E. B. RYCKMAN, A.B.,

Wesleyan Minister, Montreal.

"When we first recommended the Troches to Mr. Ryckman, he was contemplating removal from town on account of his health—the Troches are among the very few patent number of Patent remedies we ever recommend."

Fuel Saving and Comfort Producing

LARGE OVEN

Summer and Winter Air-tight

COOKING STOVE!

FOR WOOD AND ANTHRACITE OR BITUMINOUS COAL.

Improved in 1859,

With New and Extra Large Flues, and by the addition of the Celebrated Patent Double Sheet-Bottom Flue.

Attention is invited to the following Points of Superiority:

1st. DURABILITY.—Lasting, with proper care, at least 20 years. Stoves are now in use that were set up in 1838.

2d. MANUFACTURE.—Every portion of the Stove is thoroughly tested/tried. Each stove is submitted to a critical test, and none leave our works unless completely and perfectly finished.

3d. CAPACITY.—Baking, broiling, boiling, roasting, and all other culinary operations performed at the same time. A barrel of flour baked into bread with a single fire.

4th. ECONOMY.—Saving the cost of the stove in 2 or 3 years in the item of fuel.

5th. VENTILATORS OF OVEN.—In the SIDDUP STOVE alone the front doors open directly into the oven (secured by letters patent) securing a direct draft through the top of the oven, by means of perforated holes in the doors and back flues, it will be borne in mind that, as the heated air always rises, this method of ventilation is the best in use of any value whatever.

6th. ECONOMY OF MEDIUM OF HEAT.—The heat generated by the stove may be held therein and used, or thrown into the room at pleasure.

7th. THE DOUBLE SHEET-BOTTOM FLUE.—By which a compressing and investing action of heat is obtained, and the oven more evenly and effectually heated than by any other known invention.

8th. BROILING.—Performed on the top, and without the possibility of smoke entering the room.

GIUSEPPE GARIBALDI.

We present our readers this week with the latest and most authentic Portrait in existence of General Garibaldi, the Washington of Italy. The original was painted from life by Biglione, one of the first artists of Milan, in the spring of the present year, for Lorenzo Valerio, the Governor of Como, and represents Commissioner Cucchiniof the King Victor Emanuel for the Marches, an illustrate friend and distinguished co-worker with Garibaldi in the cause of liberty, freedom and unity. We are indebted to his brother, who, during the campaign, commanded a volunteer force of four hundred men from Genoa, for a photograph of the picture. The figure on the right, from a photograph taken by the same gentleman, is that of young Sicilian, Occhipinti, who started with Garibaldi's twelve hundred on the first expedition to Sicily, and for his bravery and distinguished services at the battle of Calatafimi, and the taking of Palermo, rose from the ranks to a Captaincy. (He received the public acknowledgments of General Bosco, the commander of the Neapolitan troops, for his humanity at the evacuation of Palermo, in protecting a body of four hundred Neapolitans, with their officers, on their way from the convent of Monreale to the boats, from the fury of the populace at the risk of his own life.) He has followed the fortunes of his leader in his triumphal march through Southern Italy, and is now serving on his staff. The dress is that of the heroic volunteers who landed on the beach, and have, in the incredibly short space of three months, liberated the Two Sicilies from the terrible tyranny of the Bourbon King of Naples.

Guiseppe Garibaldi was born at Nice, in the year 1808. His family was noble. Since he became famous, numerous ancestors antiquarian has found ancestors for him as far back as the sixth century. It is certain that at the institution of the Golden Book, in 1528, the Garibaldi family were recorded as belonging to the ancient nobility. A Garibaldi was Consul of Nice in 1683 as the result of Louis XIV. for Genoa: a Guiseppe Garibaldi, born in 1729, is recorded as the last member of the family: he was living, living in the most democratic times, having originally neglected to have themselves registered. The present Guiseppe Garibaldi's father was the son of a respectable father; he entered the naval service of the King of Sardinia at the age of nine, and served many years with credit and honor. In 1834 his first scrape befell him. A rev lutionary movement was organized by some officers of the fleet at Genoa; Garibaldi's part it, failed of course, and was glad to find a refuge in Tunis. Louis Philippe was one of the worst of revolutionaries, being, in fact, oversupplied with the article at home; so the young sailor crossed the Mediterranean, and offered his services to the Bey of Tunis, who gladly accepted them. He was then twenty-six years old. Some of his adventures did not in the least accord with the chivalrous ideas of the young Italian; and at the first opportunity he threw up his commission, and crossed the ocean to South America.

For the next ten years Garibaldi was a prominent leader in the never-ending struggles which darken the history of the States on the La Plata. It would be tedious to decribe at length the part in the many operations in which he was engaged, and we will simply say that he was the ablest chief Uruguay ever possessed, and the most formidable foe Rosas ever encountered. It was in South America that he developed the astonishing fertility of resource which at once stood him in such stead. When, on behalf of their commerce, the English and French fleets interfered and forcibly his bombardment of Buenos Ayres, Garibaldi instantly designed the command of the fleet to the second in command, landed, raised a body of 500 partisans, and continued the war as vigorously as ever. At one time he believed that the contest was over. He bought him an estate, married a wife, and settled down quietly on the bank of a noble South American River. It is recorded of him that his agricultural triumphs were as conspicuous as his military successes had been, and that he did more than any one except Rosas to develop the extraordinary resources of that wonderful country.

He was there, peacefully tilling his farm, when Pius the Ninth called Italy from her deep sleep in January, 1848. The cry crossed the sea and reached Garibaldi's ear. He was in Italy as soon as his ship could carry him, and to Charles Albert—then, as now his successor, il re galantuomo—he offered his sword. Throughout the campaign of 1848–9, Garibaldi fought loyally for the cause of Italian independence. When at last the apathy of Venice, and the want of a naval force under Cavour in the Piedmontese Council, ruined the cause for the time, Garibaldi was one of the last to lay down his arms.

After a brief Parliamentary experience in the chambers at Turin, the expulsion of the Pope from Rome, and the desperate efforts of the Roman Republicans to reorganize society, summoned Garibaldi to the central city. He took the command of the Republican army, beat the Neapolitans in several engagements, and defended Rome during the memorable siege by the French. His last campaign on noble episode than his resistance to the invading army, and the Emperor was, it is said, hardly able himself with fury at so unexpected an obstacle.

When it became certain at last that the city must fall, he proposed to his colleagues to blow up the bridges, abandon the city, and take to the hills. This desperate counsel was not followed, and he then resolved to fly with his legion. His speech on that occasion would have done no dishonor to Brutus or the Grachi: "Soldiers," he said, "in recognence of the love you may show your country I offer you hunger, thirst, cold, war, and death; who accepts the terms let him follow me." The enthusiastic band followed him to a man. The day before the surrender, Garibaldi, at the head of his faithful partisans, cut his way through the enemy's lines, and made good his escape to the little Republic of San Marino. There he dismissed his comrades, and with two hundred men, embarked for Genoa.

During the interval of nine years which elapsed between the Reaction of 1849 and the Revival of 1859 most of the European patriots of 1848 contrived to lose what little glory they had acquired. Many of them became vagabonds, and subsisted by the contributions of their friends, trading on the sacrifices they said they had made for liberty. Not so Garibaldi. After a brief stay in New York, during which he refused the proposed honest labor in a candle factory on Staten Island, he again betook himself to his old profession, and commanded sailing craft on trading voyages. He used often to come here in command of his ships; and though he was always treated with enthusiasm by the true patrymen, he never allowed the recollections of the past or his hopes of the future to beguile him from the practical duties of the present. He was esteemed as reliable a captain as sailed out of this port.

At last, the hour sounded again. Sardinia prepared for war with Austria; Napoleon proclaimed that Italy should be free from the Adriatic to the Alps. A few weeks after the war had become inevitable, Garibaldi had obtained permission from Victor Emanuel to operate with a partisan force on the northern frontier of Lombardy. It is doing no discredit to the skill or the courage of the French to say that Garibaldi's exploits, with his cacciatori dei Alpi, were not the least brilliant feats in the campaign. He was the first to cross the Ticino, sheer power of his name and the justice of his cause. Without money, with no men, without a single chest, a train, or any of the other supplies of warfare, he drove the Austrians from post to post, and from city to city, and so narrowed them in that, when Milan fell the fighting army had not the least concern about their flanks. But for Garibaldi's victories the taking of Milan might have been only half the battle.

He was dissatisfied with the peace. All Italians were. They all now looked to him as the man who freed Venetia, Naples, and Rome; and they did not see the reasons why the Emperor could not afford to accomplish the work he had begun. Garibaldi was especially incensed, and with his usual impetuosity gave vent to his anger in a furious speech in the Turin House of Deputies, which did his head no credit, and changed his prestige. His new career is that of the Dictator of Sicily.

A winter of angry discontent, caused partly by political dis-pointment and partly by domestic annoyances, enabled him to organize and equip his complete the work which Napoleon had left unfinished. Venetia, which is the key-stone of the King of Iturbidia, remains a secret: certain it is that, on 5th May, 1860, he sailed for Genoa with the well appointed force of the thousand heroes to invade Sicily. On 11th he landed successfully at Marsala, and stated the Neapolitans sent to oppose him. On 27th he entered Palermo. The city capitulated on 30th June, the Neapolitans having bombarded for several hours. On 19th July he entered Messina, and suffered the Neapolitan garrison to withdraw; thus uniting the whole of Sicily under his sway. On 19th August he was in August he began to land men in Calabria; and, overwhelming all opposition, by the 7th September he march northward, meeting with scarcely any resistance. The popular feeling was so decidedly in his favor that the King of Naples fled and sued for peace, and evacuated his capital on 6th, one day before Garibaldi entered. Since then he has been engaged in settling up the affairs of the Neapolitan Peninsula in the direction of Capua and Gaeta.

Garibaldi is a good-looking man. His first wife, a South American lady, was a worthy helpmate for him. She accompanied him to Italy in 1848, and met with him on many occasions during the active and the terrible retreat to Arezzo. The fatigue and exposure of this retreat killed her. She died before Garibaldi sailed for Genoa. After Garibaldi's second wife, from whom he is now separated, much mystery exists. She is the daughter of a Marquis of Raimondi, is wealthy noblesse, and is said to have attracted Garibaldi's attention by offering to carry dispatches to him during the Roman campaign of Italy's hero. Why he left her, the public can only conjecture; the following story from a Paris letter may be true, however, pro tempore:

> "The wife of Garibaldi, about whom so many strange reports have been circulated, is now at Marseilles, intending to join her husband at Naples. She is a daughter of the Marquis Raymond, an Italian nobleman of great wealth, and married Garibaldi in opposition to her family. Some reports state that before the marriage was consummated such damning evidence was placed in Garibaldi's hands that he immediately quitted her. Others say that, about three months after the marriage, she was caught intriguing with a courtier. There is evidently some strange mystery with which the world is not generally acquainted, and the latest intelligence from Naples may settle it. Italy may not be so indicative of a reconciliation or refutation of calumny as is generally supposed. If the evil reports be true, what a glorious position has this city woman to command. Who would not be a king, a queen, and all—if only for one hour—on the throne of Naples?"

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

AT least half the returns of the popular vote for President and Vice-President have come in, and a reliable statement of the work of 6th November can yet be made. It is certain, however, that Abraham Lincoln, of Illinois, and Hannibal Hamlin, of Maine, have been elected by the people President and Vice-President of the United States respectively.

At the last Presidential election 4,054,510 votes were cast—1,838,232 for Mr. Buchanan, 1,341,514 for Mr. Frémont, and 874,707 for Mr. Fillmore. This was exclusive of the vote of South Carolina, in which State the Presidential electors are elected by the Legislature.

Since then two new States have been admitted to the Union, Minnesota and Oregon. Adding these to the previous thirty, and allowing for the natural increase of population, it seems probable that the vote of last Tuesday will exceed that of 1856 by several hundred thousand.

According to the returns which have thus far come to hand, Lincoln has carried fifteen States: to wit, Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Michigan, and Minnesota, casting together 160 out of the 303 votes which will make up the electoral college. Breckinridge seems to have carried twelve States; to wit, Maryland, Delaware, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Louisiana, Alabama, Virginia, Georgia, Arkansas, Texas, and Florida, casting 92 votes in the electoral college. Bell is supposed to have carried Missouri, which casts nine votes; and his partisans hope that he has carried Oregon and California, which cast seven more between them. It is believed that Mr. Bell has carried Kentucky, which casts twelve votes. New Jersey, casting seven votes, has gone for fusion: the choice of her vote for Douglas, Breckinridge, or Bell, as they deem fit.

The changes in public sentiment since 1856, as shown by a comparison of the Electoral vote of that year with the result on Tuesday, are sufficiently remarkable. In 1856 Mr. Buchanan carried Pennsylvania, Illinois, and Indiana. Now, the Democrats have lost those States. In 1856 the vote stood:

States.	Buchanan.	Frémont and Fillmore.
Pennsylvania	230,771	259,906
Indiana	118,670	116,701
Illinois	105,348	129,610

We have not received the exact returns for this year; but it seems pretty certain that Lincoln's majority in Pennsylvania will not be less than 50,000; in Illinois, than 15,000; in Indiana, than 10,000.

In 1856 the money gave 71,058 for Buchanan and Fillmore, and only 28,338 for Frémont; in 1860 the majority for the Fusion candidates for Governor is about 4000.

In the Southern States the vote for Bell has proved unexpectedly large. It was long doubtful whether he had not carried Virginia and Georgia; Tennessee gave him a large vote, and so did Tennessee. This is the more noteworthy as Mr. Bell was identified throughout the Southern States with the "Union" party, while his chief opponent was charged with disunion tendencies.

The complexion of the next Congress will be Democratic. There is a majority of from 12 to 20—the exact figures can not be given as yet —against the Administration. In every State, including Massachusetts and New York, there have been Democratic gains among the Congressmen. The defeat of Burlingame and Pennington, two of the most prominent Republican leaders, embitters the triumph of the party. In this city the Democrats have to deplore the loss of John Cochrane, one of the ablest men on the floor, late Chairman of the Committee on Commerce.

OUR BILL OF FARE.

A POLITICAL campaign blights nothing more than literature. Lives of candidates, speeches, circulars, song-books, and party pamphlets are the only literature which can thrive upon that turbulent stream. But when it has roared itself by, the waits are of a more permanent and attractive character. The great novelists have been for some time silent—waiting and resting, and making ready. Mr. Dickens's "Female Parsonage" has been coursing through the Cornhill, and Mr. Lever's "Day's Ride" has been laid before our readers in this number. But in the winter coney, and the long evenings and leisure days begin—the peculiar season of novels—the great story-tellers have begin again; and by a felicitous fortune, which we mean always to secure, it is in our columns that these stories will be first told in America. Mr. Dickens's new tale of "GREAT EXPECTATIONS" will begin in Harper's Weekly next week, and its brilliant opening gives us all that the great delight of the author was never happier in its play. For a novel in Dickens seems to be the exuberant play of intellectual creative power. There is no effort, no creak of any kind; and if the humor has sometimes degenerated into farce, it is never overdone. His last tale published in these columns, "A Tale of Two Cities," was entirely unique. It showed a new and most hitherto worked; and it will hold its place in our literature as one of the most vivid and impressive of all literary illustrations of history. It combined the romance, the terror, the pathos of the French Revolution as no other book, perhaps, in Carlyle's History. The new tale will doubtless strike a livelier key. Dickens is one of the most sagacious as well as fertile of novelists, and we understand how to vary his strain. The readers of "Great Expectations" may depend upon a rare delight.

Thackeray, too, is preparing another work. He has been peculiarly roused and stimulated by the recent attacks upon him in the London Saturday Review and other journals, and we may look for some resounding blows. He feels himself to be put upon his mettle. He is a man who delights to justify his reputation—and he will do it. No living writer holds a more trenchant pen than he. No more luminous and racy English than his was ever written. He has a supreme scorn of humbug, whether of the "Vanity Fair" or the Saturday Review kind, and he will not spare it. It is only fair to him to say that he claims nothing for himself. His assumes no authorship. He does not write "goody" books and point "goody" morals. If humbug shows its head in church, state, or society, he hits it; and if you wish to call "Vanity" you?" he replies, "Only an observer: and if you see differently say so; but don't grimace about it, and don't try to hide your talents by crying stop thief."

The new novel of Thackeray's will be published and illustrated in Harper's Monthly; and in that Magazine also will appear a new tale by the author of "Adam Bede" and the "Mill on the Floss" —one of the tenderest, truest, and most fascinating of story-tellers.

So our friends will not want the best reading that contemporary genius affords; and the proprietors of this journal may be pardoned the pride they feel in re-enjoying their readers for their faithful friendship. By such means they intend to maintain the Union between the Weekly and the Monthly and their hosts of friends; and so continue to deserve the enthusiastic regard of a Mississippi correspondent who says: "Harper's is known all around us, in hauds, hearts, and book-cases."

So may it long be! So shall it long be, if care and thought and money can make it so.

RUIN.

LET us call up a scene—a rude square surrounded With wine, and with brandy, and all that's fast, And rollicking talk, and agreeable men That only come out when the sun goes again; Oysters and partridge, and blue-winged teal, And any amount of verdant sal—

So the curtain lifts to the gambler's bell;
The scene of the drama—a gambling hell.

Enter a young man modest of mien,
In fact, in the slang of the day, he's green;
The specials he bought his son and his niece,
With its gorgeous epergne and gleaming lights;
And the goblets cream with the rich Champagne,
The subtle enchanter of heart and brain,
And he hears the exciting clink of chips,
And Commissions out of the issuers grips.

Have you ever sat upon Lofoden cliff
When the tides were high and the breeze was stiff,
And seen in the ocean a mighty curl,
Where the spheric walls of the waters whirl
And watched how a pine-tree's floating limb
Was caught on the whirlpool's outer rim,
Till, lessening in circles, the speeding plank
Down through the funnel of ocean sank?

So in the whirl of the gaming hell
The young man floats to the midst as well.
That central table with cloth of green,
And its dealers silent, sly, and serene,
And its board of prettily-painted cards,
Its fate box with the silver guards,
And the pallid faces that here and there
Flush with the triumph or frown with care;

Then does the spell-bound young man think
As he hears the ivory balls click,
"Gambling is terrible wrong; I know—
I will take but a single chance and go—
'Tis true the money is not my own,
But I'll set a little by way of loan.
I have always heard that beginners win;
So where's the harm if I go in?"

And he "goes in" where others have gone;
But what of the misfortune will swerve on,
He sinks and rises with loss or gain—
Fierce excitement usurps his brain—
The brandy is tasteless—the lights grow dim—
This deal is neck or nothing with him,
The cloth is blank, the dealer has dealt the game,
His heart is like ice and his head like flame.

He's what is facetiously called "cleaned out"—
I don't see the joke, though it floats about.
Cleaned out! To lose, implies what sort of what?
Cleaned out of honor and truth, it's not?
Cleaned out of peace, and that mother's love
That brooded above him like some pure dove;
Cleaned out of that grand interior pride
That, lost, can never be more supplied.

Do you think that the picture is overdrawn?
Go follow his steps in the sinful days;
The sneaking steps as he nears the door
Of the home he will blacken in future years,
And the agonized hours next day he spends,
When he tries to be gay with his business friends,
Though he knows that the gambler last night will tell
The secret of fraud and the gambling hell.

THE LOWER.

THE DAY AFTER.

THE great Presidential campaign is over, and over quietly. It is only another proof of the truth that while the great mass of the people are concerned quite enough to exercise the elective, or of any political event whatever, is merely temporary and superficial. The political orators and all their have been very clamorous for the Union. They have all agreed upon that, if upon nothing else. They all claimed to be the true Union men; and this is much too politic a Lounger to betray which he thinks really was so.

But one thing was clear enough all the time. If a system like ours could suddenly collapse and dissolve merely upon a change of political power effected in the constitutional way, it was high time that the experiment were tried that every body might perceive by what a frail thread it secures the Union held. That feeling undoubtedly controlled many votes at the late election. Men with the kindest feeling for all parts of the country, and in full sympathy with the party lately dominant in the Government, felt that it was only justice to themselves and to all others, that they should know precisely the quality of the tool. And what is that bond? What must it always be?

It is a bond of common welfare, of a common history and destiny. It is a bond of sympathy and brotherhood, but also of individual self-respect. It is a bond of the sacred will and the general common sense. So long as a people is busy and progressive, so long they will be contented and at peace. People don't fight upon abstractions. If the English Parliament had not tried to tax the Colonists it might have legislated at large and in general as they have for a hundred years. But when it came to taking money out of the pocket without even a "By leave," the people clapped their hands into their pockets and upon their swords. In like manner, the Union of these States rests upon the general prosperity; and whenever the prosperity of any part of the people is seriously attacked, and all other means of redress fail, they will take to revolution. There are but two methods of collecting redress, one is peaceful and the other forcible; and when lawful redress is to the latter, only as the last, solemn, and sad alternative.

Every thing in our history, and in the history and experience of the world, shows how far we are from any such dire event. The union of the American States is the grandest instrument ever put into human hands to work out the progressive civilization of the world; and it is not the least of its virtues that it will work out the cure of its own defects. People shake their heads gravely over a speech, and speculate upon the probable end of our experiment. But they forget the constantly new conditions. They forget that education and invention keep pace with political enfranchisement, and that the common sense and conscience of the multitude will often correct the wiles of demagogues who are leaders.

The country has been profoundly stirred, as it always must be by a Presidential election. But all the stir and the hard tone of excitement have not seriously disturbed the faith of any patriot in that Union which is the massive chain of links, always increasing in number and brightness and splendor, by which mankind are to be drawn up to a loftier and nobler height. Once more, as the breath of the popular will fills her sails, we sing with Longfellow:

"Thou, too, sail on, O ship of state!
Sail on, O Union, strong and great!
Humanity with all its fears,
With all the hopes of future years,
Is hanging breathless on thy fate!
We know what master laid thy keel,
What workmen wrought thy ribs of steel,
Who made each mast, and sail, and rope;
What anvils rang, what hammers beat,
In what a forge and what a heat,
Were shaped the anchors of thy hope!

In spite of rock and tempest's roar,
In spite of false lights on the shore,
Sail on, nor fear to breast the sea!
Our hearts, our hopes are all with thee—
Our hearts, our hopes, our prayers our tears,
Our faith triumphant o'er our fears,
Are all with thee—are all with thee!"

POPULAR GOOD-HUMOR.

One of the striking facts on election day was the universal good-humor. Apparently, we had had the largest and bitterest of all political campaigns—there was some doleful mistrust of the conduct at the polls—and yet, comparatively speaking, there was no trouble whatever. The days of "the bloody Sixth" have long gone by. The system of really uniting districts as one of the securities of the ballot-b x and of the public peace. Even what little rows there were were rather indicrous than threatening. I saw several, and the characteristic of all was an unwilling to strike.

At one poll a belligerent voter stepped at the window and said, in a loud voice, that he would like to cut the —— who would not take up the challenge him. No sooner was the glove down than it was up. The voter was promptly challenged. He gave his vote, and then came turned to grapple with hi. fellow-countryman. Down they went, all in a heap, into the street—scratching, cutting, clawing, swearing, shouting, hats off, coats and collars awry—pell-mell, scratch, cuff, curse and struggle! A crowd speedily and considerately rushed to the combatants—squealing, scolding, shaking fingers and fists, threatening, jeering—but meanwhile only the original infants quarrelled engaged. You would have thought a serious riot must necessarily take place; but the gigantic and clucking certified peace, like the cackle of a barn-yard. What noises they called each other —how they gave the lie—how they defied each other to the most frightful fates—how they scowled and shouted themselves hoarse, and how they brandished their fists and surged hither and thither, was worthy the best stage in the city. Abroad—eater eye, thoroughstage and terror, was the stage direction which suited the case precisely.

There was another sudden gust of row at another poll. A yell, and a general rush with closing together of the crowd; a hubbub and shrieking and commingled din of oaths and snarls; and over the whole a loud voter in the middle of the press, brandishing a shillalah by the middle, and storming tremendous threats above the riotous yelp, and with a skill truly marvelous and phenomenalic, so guiding his ugly weapon that not a solitary hair upon any head was touched; and finally, after rushing this way and that, jamming here and there, and pushing as if they were all boosting their candidates into office, the crowd suddenly scattered, and one poor gentleman, who had no part or interest in the row, emerged with a bloody nose.

Again the loud, sharp, scolding contest of words began, and the crowd gathered closely around the disputants, who roared more furiously until they were quite sure they should be held back, and then one brandished his arms and fists, and invited the other to come on. The other began immediately an answering brandishment, and when both were effectually and securely held from behind, each made the most heroic demonstrations to the detriment of the adversary, swearing that if he could only be let go, he would straightway send the other to innumerable uncomfortable places. The fight was purely fictitious, but very brief—and the result in every case was the same—dead, none, wounded, none; missing, none. Except in one case, when an overwary actually put his two thumbs into the mouth of the other, and was doing some damage, when the other "worked my mouth," as he said, "open and shut with them together, and then I chewed away." That fight lasted seconds.

These things were not insignificant, although they were at rural polls. The people who hang around such polls are all more or less ignorant and imbruted kind. The sots are there—wretched caricatures of men—hoping to be treated. The hucksters and rabbles are there. All are naturally not brave men. The gaping crowd is there, as it is around the tent of a circus. The few leaders of the district are there—the important politicians—the treaters on behalf of the parties—the fire whips, the "shakers" and most disheartening sight of his fellow-men and fellow-citizens that the voter is likely to meet any where. And yet, without order, but with the most perfect peace, in which the votes were deposited with almost free drinks for every body, and with nothing but the original liquor and common sense of the people, there was no disturbance more important than the fists.

An observer may take heart for our institutions even at the worst polls.

THE PUBLIC EXPRESS.

The greatest disgrace of the city of New York is its Post-office. There isn't a one-horse town in the land which has no more sense of its duties, requirements and mortifying an office as the complacent metropolis of the country. The inclosures upon Nassau Street are a disgrace to civilization, and they are the favorite deposits of old rags, old boots old bottle-glass, and dead cats. The pavements are all wet and uneven and disgraceful. The [illegible] of the delivery-boxes is so dark and sad that the most cheerful letter seems instantly saddened as it disperse the gloom; and as for the narrow, nasty, outer corridor, where advertised letters are delivered and already thought, why, it was given the characteristic vestibule as the great and characteristic building in which the Government houses one of its principal works, the transmission of documents.

For there is no denying that the building is a good — Government in the public service which Secretary Holt justly deserves. The Post-office might be immediately abolished and private enterprise would do the work a thousand-fold better than it is done now.

It is one of the traditions from which we might wisely emancipate our system that the expressbusiness should be performed by the Government machinery. The Government. Why should the Government carry a man's letter more than his carpet-bag or bundle? Nothing is more absurd than the most important packages by private expresses, because the public express is subject to delay, nor so swift, nor so convenient. In a day and century of private effort, like ours, the postal service could be accomplished by the same means and agents as that of any Package-Express Company now. Money would be made by the companies, and instead of paying enormous sums to losing Departments which serves us badly, we should pay moderately for being well served.

And we might be very sure that no private company, which undertook to carry letters and to deliver them, would ever allow the business to be managed in such a hole as the Post-office of the great commercial metropolis of the country. There is no Express Company upon the continent or in the city that has not buildings as much more convenient and proper as the work they do is better done.

THE LAST TOURNAMENT.

The Chess Tournament of two or three years ago was pleasant, but the Billiard Tournament is more intelligible. The game requires less of the operator who is not an adept. The excellence of a move in chess is entirely lost upon a man who does not understand the game. But a good stroke or shot in billiards can be appreciated by any body who has eyes and common sense. While every body was, or ought to be, interested in the game, they could think of nothing but the election, you had only to mention billiards to command the ear of the most all a great mistake, and that the real interest, the real excitement of life was to be found in Fourteen-Inch Balk-Line. The fact is that the knights of the cue were brandishing their instruments There the magnificent mystery of the compound angle was solved by the most profound intellectual minds. There, with the devotion of students to their books, of saints to their cells, of candidates to their constituents, the billiard-players were leaning over a table and striking an ivory ball, while a crowd of admiring and intelligent spectators hung upon every stroke as politicians hung upon the election returns.

Then there was such cooking, and potting, or mooching, or wrenching off door-knockers, or smashing Chubrys—isn't it? Billiards is a beautiful, simple, active game. When Berger plays it becomes poetic, if we may trust the ecstatic reporters and the possibilities of the game. Mr Phelan was already the accredited champion, the Paul Morphy, the Benicia Boy of billiards. It was not surprising that he conquered the victor of the other knights who took part in the tournament. But he has to be victor for sixty points only in a game of seven hundred and ty. The player, then, who is only second to Mr. Phelan is Dudley Kavanagh. The name is romantic enough for the Spingler Institute. And why should he not be admitted to the course of instruction in that institution, in a day when physical culture is of such importance, and officiate as Professor of Calisthenics? Calisthenics is understood to be the feminine of gymnastics. In fact, as nine-pins are to billiards, so are gymnastics to calisthenics.

The Spingler will hardly smile upon the suggestion, and yet it would. Some how well ladies often play billiards; yes, and perhaps it knows how well they look while they are playing, and how admirable an exercise it is for them. Some authorities exhort them to use the mace and shoot the ball, instead of pushing it with the cue and driving it. But there is all the difference in the two between playing billiards and not playing. What do you suppose Berger could do with a mace? The touch of the cue is electrical.

There must be constant and general public assessments and re-assessments. Billiard-rooms and bowling-alleys have a bad name, because they are so closely associated with bar-rooms. But for the present the billiard is a necessary vice upon the amusement, whatever it may be, and is ought to be so considered. The most important point after that is, what kind of recreation is—minus the sodden must healthful? Certainly nothing sedentary—nothing confined—nothing that moves the person and gives the muscles play—something that exhilarates and interests, and is yet simple and manl,—is one word—billiards.

HUMOR OF THE DAY.

THE WAKE OF THE IRISH BRIGADE.

BEING A LAMENT FOR SEVERAL COLLEGE STUDENTS.

Sing not to the south or the west the woes of Erin,
The Banner of Faith 'gainst the heathen who bore
Their glorious standard to battle and conquered for dartin',
But ah! now the Irish Brigade is no more.

Repeal and the Pope they have left for to die elsewhere,
And hallowed the spot where their creed remains hid
That Church persecuted by unnatural mothers.
They would not surrender, preferring to die.

They fell in the forest borne with terrific slaughter,
Not sank under wounds, and exhausted with toil,
And the blood of their brave hills have poured out like water,
To such an extent that it purpled the soil.

They stood while the Colonels and corporals there was dying,
At last as the leaves of the storm shaken tree;
At last they were left to the battle-dead lying,
Six hundred—of whom there survived only three.

Och! Tare of Londinde; talk of the Spartans!
Sure they're not to be named with the boys by no name!
On the knees of their breeches, the kilt that's not tartans)
They fell in full battle array, hung out at the same.

Their bodies, interred at the lanky's quarters,
Will be found by the future historians and giver,
Their spirits have now joined the Army of Martyrs,
Where wars will remain—also honors increases.

THE LAMB OF IRE.—The rabid invective which the Ultramontane Press is constantly launching against England and Sardinia, confirms the opinion of the world. Like a wounded animal, the Papal Church, some young ladies may require to be reminded, was the lamb of a Fury.

COUSINS FOR KINGS AND QUEENS.

A Law which Nature contravenes,
A rule of Right and Duties,
Forbids our Princes, Kings, and Queens,
With British spouse to make.
The safety of the Realm commands
These Protestants to wed,
And therefore is their choice of hands
Extremely limited.

Their Cousins are our Royal race
Confined, and they
Who, by the nature of the case,
Are German as can be.
Now German Cousins fair removed
All very well may be,
But Cousins German oft have proved
Too near for safety.

Near cousins o'er the German tide,
What arms remain to seek
Now stunted and now dwarfish side,
Almost within a week!
Of Yonder Land the Beauty pales
All Continental Fair!
Might not a Princess find her mates
A distant Cousin there?

MOTHER JOPE'S MAUNDERINGS.

Ah! there's the bonnet, and the petticoats, trousers, earrings, and plutoons.

Thieves! Inquisition! Inquisition! Help! Robbery! What next, I wonder?

My heart will be hot with rage and fury, Wenzers-ble Brothers.

I don't know which on 'em is worst; the ones is just as bad as t'others.

To take and go and climb my pales, and jump into my own premises!

Without so much as By your leave, and not to say I've no reserved rights.

And there is paint Savoys, and root my carrots up, and trample on my graves.

Out upon that rampagious crew of fishbreasters, rogues, and vagabones!

To let loose all my ducks and geese, and fowls which eggs was formed to lay me,

And all the pigs which I intended to love and honor and obey me!

The hypocrites! And which I hatter none more than them my shes as knows.

And makes believe to discard my house, in which they won't let me be Missis.

They've cut my trifle crop in half, my ground of stats they've trimmed off one third.

The ribbies! Oh, that I may live to see 'em swinging on an gibbets.

Insolent, impudent, unjust, the nasty good for nothing varmints!

I call stich nobbings only fit to burn like filthy bones and rubbish!

Himpious, wicked, cruel, wile, profane, detestable, strongminded!

Abominable, execrable, blindfurious, foul, false, feginous, Owdacious, regardless, depraved, lean, brutal, barbarous, perfidious,

Wicious, disgusting, treacherous, perjured, monstrous, frightful, horrid, hideous,

Assassins, robbers, trailers, felons, villains, miscreants, deceivers,

Apostates, blackguards, pirates, cut-throats, infidels, and unbelievers,

Cuticlis and scoundrels, vagabones, scamps, rascagnes and sich like!

Get out, I say—don't talk to me about your union of Italians.

And then confound their politics, which I've no patiences while I mention,

That there dangerous and pernicious principle, Non-Intervention!

I do declare, I do abhor, detest in and protests again it, that principle as is opposed to; hang all that's pure and parfect in it!

Ah! they'll repent on it one day, when there have liberal On them there Sovereign their own selves shall bring the long of their desertion.

Oh! then they'll long and pray in vain their neighbors for to help them Stuffers!

Then they will down their wickedness and their wiles down revolves.

Help! Hemmets, Spain, and Portigee, all you as holds the true persuasion,

And the rest of every pious Princes and communices each faithful nation,

For to defend my sacred rights from this here ejus wicketice.

Drat all them brigands, buccaneers, riff-raff, and rips, and rapscallions,

Rascals, rag-rag-and-bobtail, mob scum, refuge, rabble-rout, and Mazzinis.

Wus gags of criminates ne'er walked unhanged, or died with less leathers,

Drat them, drat all and every thing, drat every body already spotted!

"SAVOIR PARLER" AND "SAVOIR ECOUTER."

[BY OUR SUNDAY CONTRIBUTOR.]

ANY fool can make a Woman talk, but it requires a very clever man to make her listen.

"I'M FOR AN UNDER A—BSTANDIN'—" This" Points" doth present too much, methinks."

Scottie, the Rapid Reporter, who is as much a man of the world as churchman, has entered a solemn protest against the coupling "compactness," and a charming woman was lately heard to ask "if quakers on the 'tother side" were "All Right?" She replied out to the Nubia, "may relieve me from my mother! I can see that she is going to ask questions; they have such a way of 'what is it, then?'—'Where's my child?' 'Where's my husband?' 'What's the matter?' and so on," embarrassing to Madam. Tell them that in friendship, as in crinoline, opposites are attractive.

Young folks tell what they do, and was, what they have done and both, what they will do.

A little four-year-old the other day perplexed us by asking the following question: "If Mr Fillmore is a mister, ain't a woman a mystery?"

The man who buys a herring and then nires a cab, is a fish out of water man.

"Although you cross yourself a brighter fellow than I am, yet I can come round you," as the earth said to the sun.

In the other than the same sort. Now, you take him at what he is, and not what he is worth, and you won't find half that number of fools.

The bellman of Waterloo, announcing a testatel meeting, requests to be addressed by all females "who had never spoken before."

A guest at the Duke of Wellington's table blurted out the question, "Pray, my lord, were you ever drunk in your life?" With what a neat and easy turn of the wrist he ran the unhappy man through!—So, but I am now."

THE HARBOR OF CHARLESTON.

We publish on the following page a fine engraving of the Bay and Harbor of Charleston, South Carolina, showing Fort Moultrie, on Sullivan's Island, and the entrance to the Palmetto City. It is a surpassingly lovely view, and one which once seen is never forgotten. An eminent Southern writer has thus described it, and we can not do better than give his description in his own words

"As you enter from the sea, between the islands of Sullivan and Morris, the city opens before you in the form ground, five miles distant—facing it's station. Yer ye, from the ocean. It is built, like Venice, upon data and shoals of sand, and, so low is the site upon which the Jusion that I is built directly in the sea continues all you approach until you enter the harbor. The effect is not a picturesque effect, but not sufficiently to compensate for the rise of which would be produced by an elevated background, or by variety in the character of land or water. As you advance the bay expands, wide and majestic, forming a harbor to the which Nature can be as indebted, were it not for the embarrassments of the bar at the entrance, which forbids the approach of ships of every many draught of water. In is a present project with the Southernmost to propose to be sufficient to be a design this channel as to remove every di. ..ty. In that event, Charleston would instantly acquire a large and imposing commercial marine of her own. In front of you, commanding the channel, is Fort Sumter, a sentinel, the pile of Cyclopean double tier of heavy casemates, rising upon a mole at the head of a sand-bar. In passing Sullivan's Island we can readily distinguish the Mt. Pleasure House, famous as a local watering-place; and the still more famous Moultrie, which also bears the name of Moultrie, distinguished in American history as the scene of one of the first and the most brilliant feats of the Revolution. When a few hundred native riflemen, who had never fired a cannon before, beat off, and utterly discomfited a formidable British fleet, manning each slaughter among them as in proportion to the numbers engaged, was not even to add to that of Thermopylæ and the Nile. On the point of sea Hinderlit—Mount Pleasant village—which also constituted one of the fortresses of '76. On the top the shores of James and Morris Islands, the latter bearing the Middleton of the first, the former the seat of Fort Johnson, which was wrested from the British, prior to the battle of Fort Moultrie, by the enterprise of a small body of citizen soldiery. Here, at the very portals of the city, you encounter Castle Pinckney, covering a small island and every, and here you pass on a bird's-eye view of the city itself. We are now in the noblest city itself—the Charleston City! You see the four essentials at a glance, and perceive its two most prominent characteristics—the verandas, balconies, piazzas, with the ample gardens and their foliage, which relate every dwelling-house, and form a substitute for public squares, in which Charleston is lamentably deficient. But for the largeness of the several lots, and the taste of the people for shade-trees, the deficiency would be fatal at once to the health and the beauty of the place.

"The city is one of many boundaries, arising from this isolation of the dwellings, and from the ample verdure which girdles them."

"OH YES, WE'VE A DANDELION CLOCK, DON'T YOU SEE?"

THE SEXTON'S STORY.

"Now Grandpa, we've been out you your dinner to-day,
And mother said Harry and I could both stay
And play hide and seek for a while without fear—
It does not seem lonely when Grandpa is here.

"And then—won't you tell us that story you told
All about Robin Hale, who was winsome and bold,
Whose love was so strong, whose heart was so brave?"
"Yes, child, by-and-by—when I've finished this grave.

"That will be three o'clock—but you will not know How fast on the grave-stones the shadows will go."
"Oh, yes, we've a dandelion clock, don't you see?
We blow on it thrice—so—now it is three."

"About Robin Hale? Ah, well should I know
That story by heart! It was four years ago
Since I saw him at first, on the old village green,
Where the lads and the lasses at even are seen.

"And I marked his dark eye, with its glances of fire,
Resting on Lucy Lee, only child of the Squire—
Watching long for one look from those sunny blue eyes—
But his words, he or spoke, were all ended in sighs.

"For he was but poor—no houses nor lands
He owned—only courage, and two honest hands:
And Lucy, fair Lucy, an heiress was she—
Too rich to be won by a lad poor as he.

"Then I saw him go forth—at the sunset he came To yonder white tomb-stone behind you (the name Calls 'Mirriam' Benson). A while he bowed low;
Then, rising, he murmured, 'Dear Mother, I go.

"'For there's no one to love me, and no one to care,
Since you went to this grave—oh, would I were there!
Dear Lucy I can not, no, never can win'—
He was gone—only shadows where he had just been.

"Then I met Lucy Lee, and I saw her grow pale
When I spoke of the lad who had gone, Robin Hale;
But she crushed down her tears, never guessing his heart,
Or that love he deemed hopeless had led him depart.

"Soon a new suitor came. She but turned her aside
When he whispered his love and would make her his bride;
Until weary of life—at her father's command—
She gave to Ralph Vane—not her heart—but her hand.

"Wasn't that a brave wedding—the bride all in white?—
But the guests never knew who had witnessed the sight—
I hid him right well, in the old oaken pew
In the church, when the bride and her train glided through.

"With affection undimmed, with a fortune hard won,
Robin Hale had come back. Ere its pageant was gone
He turned him away; and was never more seen
In the church or the yard where the grave is so green."

The story was finished—but stealthy and still
The children came close, pointing up to the hill:
"See, Grandpa, she came with her baby a while,
And leaned on the tablet, not far from the stile.

"And she cried when you told us about Robin Hale:
And yet, she lives yonder—that cot in the vale."
"That house is Ralph Vane's—ah, yes, it is she:
She has heard new too late how he loved Lucy Lee."

BARLOW BROTHERS' BOOKS.

BETWEEN twenty and thirty years ago Reuben and Samuel Barlow commenced to trade together as grocers under the style and title of Barlow Brothers. When the firm first came into being, the sole assistant of the brothers (with the exception of the porter) was a certain Isaac Jackson, who discharged the double duties of shopman and clerk, and who had progressed with the business, until at last he became cash and book-keeper, as well as confidential clerk and general adviser to Reuben Barlow. Although not, like his employer, a "Friend," yet Isaac was one of the shyest and meekest of men; silent and reserved, he had no tastes, no amusements, no hopes and fears, no cares or enjoyments, but such as arose from and had reference to Barlow Brothers, their business, and—pre-eminently and superlatively—their books. He lived on the premises—it did the warehouseman, whose wife acted as housekeeper—and often enough, after the place was closed to the outer world for the night, Isaac used to remain in the counting-house, engaged in posting, balancing, and entering up those cherished volumes. And truly, if he gave much care and attention to them, they well repaid him; they were model books—no blots defaced their broad surfaces; no erasures ruffled their smooth texture; no error could have made just objection to aught there visible, had any such ever seen them, which Isaac would have taken good care to place beyond the reach of possibility; those sacred objects were not to be gazed at by profane eyes, nor handled by careless or flagitious fingers. It was believed that Isaac would rather you damaged himself than his books, and a young apprentice had personal proof of how dangerous it was to transgress in this respect, when once, by way of a joke, as he thought, he dropped the day-book on the floor. Unhappy youth! Isaac, albeit usually slow alike in bodily movement and in wrath, sprang at him and boxed his ears soundly.

"Get—get out of the place," he stammered; "you're not fit to be in it."

And though next day he begged Perkins's pardon—hoped he hadn't hurt him—and gave him a holiday, yet the sudden outburst of temper was a significant index to his feelings.

Reuben Barlow, who was fond of a joke, sometimes used to say that if Isaac were going to be married, he was sure that the cash-book would manage somehow to stop the ceremony; and at other times was accustomed to speak of the ledger as Mrs. Jackson. It was often said that Isaac might have been a partner long ago, had he wished; and it was supposed that a strong reason in his mind for declining that position, was a feeling that, in such a case, it would be infra-dig to keep his own books, and an unwillingness to resign such duty into other hands.

From what had been stated, Isaac's feelings may perhaps be imagined when it is told that Reuben Barlow entered his sanctum one morning, and thus addressed him:

"When thou hast the time, Isaac, I want thee to look at Black and Briggs's account, and see what amounts we have paid them lately."

"What's the matter with Black and Briggs?" quoth Isaac.

"Nay, that is that thou hast to help to discover," returned Reuben: "John Black tells me they find their cashier has been robbing them, and asks me to give him particulars of their account with us, without mixing the matter abroad; therefore, Isaac, name it not to any one at present."

"Been robbing them!" echoed Isaac, lifting up his hands solemnly; "dear me—dear me! Ah, I feared that man greatly—too flighty, too unsteady. Not six months ago he was in this very place receiving a payment, and when he came to write a receipt he pushed that ledger out of the way as if it had been a stone, and well-nigh upset the inkstand over it. Well, well; dear me." Isaac smoothed the leather cover of the insulted volume and turned up Black and Briggs's folio. "Ay, just so," he murmured, "two-fifty on the ninth March, one-twenty on—How far shall I go back; has he been long engaged in this robbery?"

"I fear so," replied Reuben.

"Nay but, in that case," said Isaac, "how is it he hasn't been found out ere now?"

"Why, then must know, Isaac," said Reuben, with a smile, "if thou can't bring thy mind to compass it, that he has falsified the books, and has shown great art in erasing and altering figures to suit his ends."

Altering the books!—erasing! Isaac was dumb for some minutes trying to fathom the depths of such cold-blooded villainy. At last he looked Reuben doubtfully in the face and murmured:

"I suppose—it isn't a—hanging matter, is it?"

"Nay, nay," said Reuben, laughing, "not so bad as that; the Law will lay him by the heels for the money he has taken, and leave what I dare say thou thinks the worst of the affair unpunished. But do thou make out the account, and I will give it to John Black myself."

During the remainder of the day Isaac were a very anxious and preoccupied look, and when brought into contact with the apprentices, who were apt to be careless and frivolous in word and deed, gazed seriously on them, and then gravely shook his head, as seeming with difficulty to refrain from addressing [illegible] he was brooding over the morning's communication, and trying to imagine by what steps any man could arrive at the horrible wickedness of laying sacrilegious hands on such sacred articles as books; and when next day Reuben informed him that sundry discrepancies having been discovered between his account and that kept by the defaulter, he would have to attend at the police-court on the morrow, to prove certain payments, he became quite sepulchral in his gloom.

He did duly attend the police-court, but the case was not gone into fully, the accused being remanded for a week. It was, however, opened, and Isaac heard the attorney for the prosecution declare that the prisoner had been with his employers from a boy; that they had formed the highest opinion of him, had reposed the most perfect trust in him, and were deeply surprised and grieved by his misconduct. Telling this to Reuben Barlow that evening. "Ay," observed the latter, "John Black said to me, 'I would no more have suspected him, Reuben, as he would that Isaac Jackson,'" and Reuben laughed a jolly laugh at the notion. But Issac did not reply as the other expected.

"He had been with them from a boy," he said, half to himself.

"And might have been with them for the rest of his life," said Reuben, "if this had not happened."

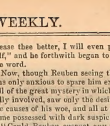
"Ay," quoth Isaac, dreamily; "how did he begin? Isay, how?"

"Nay, I know not, and it matters but little to thee," said Reuben; "and now, Isaac, must close a Brobdingnag shaw? I start to-morrow for Bristol, and shall not see thee till this business is over. I am glad thou has not taken to dry facts, or I fear thou might bear hardly on him. Farewell." And off went Reuben.

At the proper time Isaac attended and duly proved the payments as per account rendered. A shy and reserved man, he was considerably put about by the unwonted turmoil and bustle into which circumstances had plunged him, and the line taken by the prisoner's legal defender didn't tend to clear his brain or steady his nerves. That gentleman, seeing the manner of man before him, made an effort to bother Isaac by some of the stock-inquiries usual in such cases, as whether he, Isaac, ever made mistakes in any business—whether he always made his entries at the time of payment—whether he would swear he had made them particular entries on the proper time—whether the cash had always balanced, and so on; and though, of course, he elicited nothing in favor of his client, he yet produced considerable effect upon poor Isaac, already bewildered by much musing on this affair.

The old man left the court half inclined to doubt, in spite of himself, whether he was, in reality, so correct as he had always been even worse—that is, so then, he, as well as that unhappy man might not one day be tempted and fall. True, he couldn't contemplate, without horror, the idea; but that prisoner—would not he also at one time have felt the same way at such a contemptible notion? He must have been a beginning, and why was he himself more secure than other men? etc., etc. The fact is, Isaac, naturally quiet, unstirred, and brooding on this subject, and above all weak for want of his dinner, which he had been too much interested to get at the usual hour, was under monomaniacal for the time, and looked so woebegone in the evening that the housekeeper on seeing him attacked him at once.

"Why, Mr. Jackson, whatever 'ave you been doing? Not had your dinner? No wonder you look so miserable. Now just you get some supper at once, and then take a drop of spirit and water, and go your way to bed."



It was in vain for Isaac to declare that he wasn't hungry—that he wasn't ill; he was obliged to let the housekeeper's prescription to the letter, for though, after his meal, he felt so much better that he said nothing about going into the office to finish that part of his day's work which had been put—so much for the time—on one side, he was decidedly negatived; and accordingly to bed he went, taking into his custody, as usual, the safe-keys, which he slept under his pillow. He rose so much better next morning that he felt disposed to laugh at his melancholy musings of the previous evening, but when it became time to repair to the counting-house, he had almost got over his fancies, and felt better than he had done for some days.

"It was having to appear against that poor fellow," said he to himself, as he reverently removed the books from the safe. "Now that's over, I hope I shall forget it and him: I almost wish I could think it a mistake on my part, as that man would be sure to suit; but it couldn't be!" and with that Isaac opened his cash-book, and began to count over the cash-balance of the night before: "Ten, twenty, thirty," he murmured, "hundred and six-ty-five—shall I make of mistakes—let me add up again; no, that's all right. Why, bless me, I remember, I had one hundred and sixty-five pounds when I talked, and now, by the book, I ought only to have one hundred and five. How can it be? Such a thing never happened before. Can I be going to err?"

And Isaac sank down upon his stool. Presently he began to examine the items in the book, and at length found that a sum of two hundred pounds paid by him and so entered, had been by the addition of a stroke to the middle cipher changed into two hundred and sixty, thus making him appear to have paid sixty pounds more than he had really done. Isaac fired up in a moment.

"Some of those rascally lads; think it a joke, I suppose. Now I only know which of 'em I'll turn him into the street in one minute: to dare to imitate my hand too! I could have sworn it was my own doing. After all, though, he can't be sure one doing it seriously—what object could he have? No, it must be one of those plaguey boys."

So soliloquizing, Isaac got to work, contenting himself, for the time, by darting such piercing glances at the apprentices who came within his ken as one would have supposed a man in a rage bewhelmed the audacious evil-doer; but without profiting any visible result. Every one even decided that evening, whether or no to give the culprit a chance of compromising himself by rethe crushing exhortation which he would in such case bestow, that he went to his daily work in a comparatively equable and healthy frame of mind. Miserable man! No sooner had his eye glanced on the symmetrical columns of the cash-book than he perceived that the same busy hand had again been at work, and this time to a greater extent than before; numerous fabrications further themselves on his bewildered vision, executed with diabolical ingenuity, both as to the mode and style of the fraud. All the previously existing items, now into fours, eighties into sixes and nines, and all in exact imitation of his own handwriting: he was forced to admit that to his senses not borne witness to the contrary, he should have had to confess his own handiwork. The matter was now indeed serious: no one had access by fair means to the books but himself; could it possibly be, thought Isaac, in his agony, that he was the victim of some to chastise his pride of accuracy in this fearful manner? A cold sweat bathed his face at the thought. If does not appear, however, from what was the object of alterations which appeared to make him richer, nor has it ever since been to had really in his custody? It must plainly be that the money itself would next be by some means abstracted, and he, accused of the fraud, would be confronted by the altered books. And then—what then? Isaac couldn't follow the train of thought further. He knelt and tried vehemently plenter: he would conceal himself in the counting-house that night and examine the matter to the bottom, and then he would see. So said, so done: after remaining working by himself till late, he went as usual to his room, but instead of going to bed, he slipped noiselessly down stairs with the key of the safe in his pocket, and took up his position behind a desk, where he had a little window to command a view of the whole room. Here he remained undisturbed, save by the ticking of the office clock, by footsteps in the street, and now by his own agitating thoughts. Chilled to the bone, oldish and dark, and, perhaps, somewhat a little frightened, he nevertheless sat bravely on, hearing the hours strike one after another, and every now and then looking at his money which lay beside him, and at the [illegible] and the hour until the old church clock, just outside, boomed high in air—five. Glad to find he was not a murderer, and triumphant, though rather disappointed at finding himself no wiser than before, Isaac arose, and Isaac sat down on his own stool, and presently finding his hand bump against the desk before him, he was forced to conclude that he had been asleep, and so it proved; for on striking a match and consulting the clock, it showed a few minutes before six to be the hour.

"Not quite an hour, at all events," said Isaac, slapping his pocket to feel for the safe-key, and another pat out of his fingers' ends. "Impossible. "And every thing is quite still. No one can have been in that room. Nobody could have entered. Well, the men will be here at six, and then I shall get to bed. I wish the scamp had come though, I shall have to see him."

At six, accordingly, Isaac was released, and was now awake. No one had been in the office, his place in the office very little later than his usual hour.

"I Shall I tell Reuben Barlow, or not?" soliloquized he, as he unlocked the safe. "He'll be back to-day, and it seems cowardly to say no."

But on second thoughts he determined that it would be better to discover the plotter before speaking to any one.

"And, at all events," said he to himself, "I can keep matters from getting worse for a few days, and by that time I shall see."

Isaac gave a deep groan, and well he might. In spite of watch and ward the enemy had been at work: the safe-door left yesterday night as locked and symmetry were caricatured and travestied out of all shape. Numerous figures having been perverted, altered, and inserted.

"It must have been in the room with me last night," thought Isaac, as he looked at the ledgers and the clerks were alarmed by hearing a loud thump, and on entering Isaac's office by finding its occupant on the floor insensible in a fit, from which as his life he had fainted. On coming to himself, however, he replied that he had fallen down by very

"Nothing was the matter with him, he had slipped in getting on to his stool," he said, "and fallen." He then went to his counting-house, and with a suspicious glance at those around him, and bidding them all rather ungraciously get to their work and mind their own, sat down to try and think calmly over the matter. It was in vain, and by the time Reuben Barlow returned Isaac had pretty nearly worked himself into a fever. Informed of Isaac's fainting fit, Reuben, neverthe-less, said nothing about it first, beginning quietly to talk about indifferent subjects; but so dispirited and short were Isaac's replies that at last he said:

"I fear thou'rt not well to-day, Isaac?"

"What, I suppose you've been hearing some nonsense or other in the office—you came in, but there's nothing the matter with me."

"Well," said Reuben, feeling that thou'rt not in the habit of lying on thy back on the floor, thou mustn't be surprised at what's said when thou begins to do so;" and observing that Isaac was indisposed for further parley, Reuben left him. Toward the close of business, however, he again visited him, and seeing him putting over the cash-book:

"Doesn't thou think," he said, "thou hast done enough for to-day? Ay, that's right, shut it to."

Isaac having done so rather sharply.

"Nay," he went on. "Never trouble thyself to put the books away, the youth Perkins shall do it for to-night."

Now, Perkins, as may be remembered, was he who had misused the day-book on a certain forlorn occasion, and so supposing that Reuben was joking him, Isaac said, rather sulkily:

"Perkins sha'n't touch them."

"Well, well," said Reuben, mildly, "if it will please thee better, I will even put them by myself," and he forthwith began to suit the action to the word.

Now, though Reuben seeing that Isaac was ill, was only anxious to spare him exertion, the latter, full of the great mystery in which he was so dreadfully involved, saw only the desire to meddle with the causes of his woe, and all at once his mind became possessed with dark suspicions.

"Could Reuben suspect any thing? Impossible! And why should he wish to handle the books?" Whatever might be the reason it must not be gratified. "I'm not going to leave them in the safe at all to-night, I'm going to take them up stairs into my own room. I want to look over them," said he.

"Thou'd far better leave them alone till to-morrow," urged Reuben, "for I am sure thou art not fit—well, well, I'll say no more then with."

So Isaac had them borne up stairs before him, of course with the intention of keeping them under his eye, until he had made up his mind as to what course to pursue. He did keep them under his eye during the night, and carried them into his bedroom when he went there himself, placing them on a chair by his bedside, and carefully locking his room door.

"They're safe for to-night," thought Isaac, as he regarded them mournfully; "but it's dreadful to think that I shall have to watch them in this way constantly."

He took not last look at their fair proportions just before extinguishing his candle, and after putting his hand out of bed once or twice to feel them, Isaac sank at last into the sleep of the worst.

As his last waking care had been for the books, so was his first: he raised himself in bed, and took a glance; there they were—but—but surely not in the same order as when he last saw them. He was out on the floor in an instant, one shoe being on sufficient; he fell back into the bed, and trembled till the couch shook again. Then a ray of hope fell upon him—he had left the door open! Willing to find his memory treacherous, he rose and tried the door; locked even as he had left it. And now, past all hope, despair, became fully convinced that he was the victim of some evil spirit, and shuddered at the thought of his existence during the long waste and middle of the night." Long time took he to dress, and a miserable man at last was when he presented himself at the breakfast table. Though breakfast was a mere form with him, he lingered so long in his bitter mind that the housekeeper, seriously alarmed at this state of things, quietly went and begged Reuben (an early man) to come up stairs and persuade his friend to take attendance at his duties for the day.

"Why, Isaac, what's the matter with thee to-day?" began Reuben, cheerily, but stopped short, shocked at the change in the other's appearance. "Why, man, thou'rt ill indeed, more quickly."

"Nay, not ill," said Isaac, faintly.

"Not ill?" said Reuben, "then thy appearance belies thee strangely. Come, what does?"

Isaac sat silent for a while, and then burst out passionately: "No, no, Reuben, I shouldn't say I was tormented by the devil."

"Be not profane, Isaac," said Reuben, seriously, and then went on: "Thee has not got something on thy mind; would it not comfort thee, Isaac, that I, too, had been ever?"

Thus adjured, Isaac poured out his story in a flood, to the great amazement of the other, who, however, listened to the end without a word. And that which had begotten fear in Isaac Jackson's breast roused only indignation in the stout heart of Reuben Barlow. He made the table with his hand rather more emphatically than beseemed the breadth of his brim and the uprightness of his collar.

"I tell ther, Isaac," he said, with a grim smile, "I have no more to do with spiritual work; but let me see it with mine own eyes."

And off marched Reuben to Isaac's bedroom, returning with the books in a minute.

"Truly," he remarked, "this man—or fiend as thou will have it—hath a marvelous knack of imitating thy hand."

"No man could do it," quoth Isaac.

"I tell ye there's no thee that some man hath done it," retorted Reuben. "I will take my own stand in thy office this night, and if haply I light upon him—"

Reuben involuntarily clenched his fist, and stretched forth his muscular right arm. Albeit, a member of a persuasion which often was signalized by the meanest capacity of his intention to make this outrage the first of a series unexampled.

But Isaac would not hear of solitary watch being kept, "for," said he, "if you go to sleep as I did, all your trouble will be lost;" so that Reuben was forced to let him join in the vigil. They watched in company, therefore, all night, without any disturbance, either to Reuben's disgust, who said at seven o'clock in the morning,

"Well, we've kept thy books safe, but otherwise are just as we were, this man must know when watch is kept, and is wise enough to stay away out of trouble."

"Don't be so sure the books are all right," said Isaac, dreadly.

"What!" cried Reuben, "would thou have me take up thy aboard and profane notions? Let us look for ourselves;" and so saying he opened the safe, and, after casting his eye roving, the books untouched and unaltered.

"Now, what say'st thou?" asked Reuben.

Isaac was obliged to admit himself somewhat reassured, and said that perhaps the mischief-maker had got tired of his pranks.

"Well, thou canst try by giving him the chance to-night," returned Reuben.

Now this, if not absolutely deceitful in word, was decidedly so in intent; for Reuben himself had no thought of giving up the affair until he had obtained some result, and he accordingly made his own arrangements for keeping solitary watch that night, and at a late hour was admitted to the premises by the warehouseman, whom he had taken into his confidence, and of whose good faith he was assured.

He sat undisturbed till the clock struck two, and was beginning to think that his watch would be as ignorant as the night before, when he heard a slight noise, as of some one descending the stairs from the upper floor of the building.

"Now for it," thought Reuben, feeling about in the dark for a ruler, having found which, he got behind the door of the office. The door opened, and some one entered. Reuben heard the tread of a man without shoes. The intruder advanced, picked up a match-box from the desk, as Reuben knew by the sound, struck a match, and lighted a gas-jet. Reuben saw him fill in view, saw him then watched him go to the safe, unlock it, bring forth the books, place them on Isaac's desk, and then deliberately proceed to examine the entries. At this point Reuben advanced boldly and seized the individual by the arm, when—Isaac Jackson and Reuben found himself sitting on his own office stool, clad solely in a long white garment, and with a pen in his hand! while Reuben Barlow stood beside him looking rather grim, and saying,

"Doesn't thou think thou'd be better in bed, Isaac, than playing these tricks?"

No more passed then; Reuben returned the books to their stronghold, put out the gas, saw Isaac safely to bed, and went his way. But the next day gave his book-keeper much amusement and much considerable laugh concerning morbid fancies and heavy suppers. It was in the small difficulty that Isaac nerved himself to face the office for a little time, feeling convinced in his own mind as he did, that every little gathering of the clerks which he chanced to see was by no means "a fortuitous combination of atoms," but a meeting for the express purpose of debate respecting the recent mystery and its solution, particulars of which had in some unexplained manner leaked out. He lived for some little time in desperate fear of his accounts being called for by the reverence ever again troubled him, and he would by this time almost have forgotten it, if it were not for Reuben's jocular occasional [illegible] inquiry, "Barlow Brothers' Books all right, Isaac?"

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION.

The Presidential election took place on Tuesday, the 7th November, and resulted in the choice of Abraham Lincoln of Illinois and Hannibal Hamlin of Maine, by the electors of the United States. The details of the vote have not come to hand; we publish in the editorial the leading facts as known.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE SOUTH CAROLINA SECESSION LEGISLATURE.

The news of Lincoln's election was received QUIET on Columbia, South Carolina, as it was expected.

On the 10th, in the Legislature, Senator Memes offered a resolution that the Governor and Federal Relations Committee report as soon as possible a bill calling a CONVENTION of the people of the State, to consider the relations of the State to the Union. The bill was introduced providing FOR ANY PURPOSES. A bill was introduced providing for free negro labor, and one providing for the purchase of arms. A resolution was offered to appropriate $300,000 for the defense of the State, and the Convention meet on the 15th. Messrs. Boyce, Memes, and Rhett were appointed a committee to draft a declaration of secession.

On the 10th the Governor sent to the Legislature a message earnestly recommending it to indemnify the losses of the citizens of Charleston by the late floods. Resolutions to that effect were introduced into both houses. The Senate concurred in the House resolutions, and appropriated the sum of one hundred thousand dollars already appropriated to purchase arms for the State. Mr. Rhett introduced a bill, calling the Convention at Columbia. It was referred to the Committee on Federal Relations. Mr. Aldrich introduced a bill, compelling free negroes to leave the State or select masters from the white race. A resolution was introduced for raising a million of dollars immediately for the public defense. The resolution was referred to the Ways and Means Committee. Mr. Cunningham introduced a bill to arm and equip the State. Empowers the Governor to issue bonds to the amount of four hundred thousand dollars, at six per cent., to raise immediately the sum of the State. It was finally referred to the Military Committee.

The House adjourned, by an overwhelming vote, to fix on Saturday for a sine die adjournment.

THE SECESSION CONVENTION.

In the Senate, on November 9, Mr. Garlington, from the Committee on Federal Relations, reported a bill calling a Convention of the people of the State to take into consideration the dangers incident to the present position of affairs, and to devise such measures as may be necessary and proper for the safety and security of the rights and liberties of the citizens of the State. The Convention shall assemble on the second Monday in December, and the election shall be held on the fourth Tuesday previous, the number of delegates to each district being equal to the number of the members and representatives in the Legislature. The last section of the bill provides that the Governor shall transmit a copy to the Executive of the slaveholding States, and such other communications in providing for the future safety, welfare, and independence of the South.

After a brief discussion, in which the time fixed, the bill passed by yeas forty-four, nays one. The discussing was confined almost entirely to the time only.

SEPARATE STATE ACTION OR CO-OPERATION.

In the House, Mr. Trenholm's resolutions, to send a commissioner to Georgia, was taken up, when a sharp debate ensued between the co-operationists and separate State secessionists.

Mr. Gray opposed the resolution. Separate action, he said, was the doctrine sanctioned by Jefferson and Madison, and recognized by De Tocqueville. He hoped South Carolina would not send the odious delegation, and each delegate would carry the Palmetto flag—the sight of our regular flag would be sufficient.

Mr. McGowan said South Carolina stood to secede long before Georgia. She was the author of secession. It would be a high honor for South to unite with her Southern sister. The history of Pelopidas and Epaminondas, modern Italy, and Central America proved the truth of the maxim, "United we stand, divided we fall." This was easily, however, to admit by the decision of the Convention.

Mr. Miller thought the attempt to secure co-operation would be dishonorable, and cited the case of the Commission to Virginia. If we waited for other states to lead, slavery would be abandoned, and the South oppressed like Italy by the East India Company. He felt the importance of action, and thought it would be time enough to send commissioners when they had form thy defied by the Union broken. Suppose Georgia declined acting, what policy would his friend pursue?

Mr. McGowan did not indicate any policy. His idea was to precede, not pause, with Georgia.

Mr. Mullins replied that we could not with dignity ask co-operation until we have ourselves acted.

The consideration of the resolutions was then postponed till next day.

RESIGNATION OF SENATOR CHESTNUT.

On the opening of the House of Assembly, on 19th, for business, the letter of Senator Chestnut had been received a communication from Mr. Chestnut, resigning his position as a Senator of the United States.

Mr. Whatley offered a resolution that the resignation be accepted. He said that what other other circumstances would be regarded with regret, could now be only recognized as an act of great devotion to South Carolina.

SUSPENSION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. Dessausure made a report from the Committee on Ways and Means, recommending a bill for the postponement for six months of the bonds to have one-third of gold and silver to two-thirds of their issue.

The report was unanimously adopted.

A similar bill passed the Senate.

THE CONVENTION TO MEET 17TH DECEMBER.

Mr. Allston made a report from the Committee on Federal Relations, making amendments to the Senate bill calling a Convention of the people, by which that action be held on the 6th of December instead of the 6th of January, and that the Convention meet in the Hall of December instead of the 19th of January.

Mr. Black, of York, opposed the amendment, and wanted more time to canvass the Senate bill.

Mr. Thompson, of Sumter, said that the agriculturists in the upper country wanted more time.

Mr. Whatley concurred with resolutions relating to declaring the opinion of South Carolina and inviting co-operation.

Those resolutions were tabled.

The resolutions from the Charleston meeting were introduced, and, on motion of Mr. Memminger, were referred to a discussion ensued on Mr. Aldrich's report from the Committee on Federal Relations.

At the conclusion of the debate the question was put, "shall the Bill for calling a Convention pass and be sent to the Senate?"

Here another discussion followed.

Mr. Aldrich said that all had favored the Senate's Bill, but the amendments had kept twenty-four members brought out mode decided action necessary. Telegraph messages are unsatisfactory, calling on a vote.

A vote was then taken by ayes and noes, when the bill calling a Convention was unanimously passed, the whole number present (one hundred and seventeen), voting "aye."

The State Senate met at seven o'clock in the evening to consider the amendment of the House to the bill calling a Convention. Forty-one Senators were present, and all of them voted in favor of the bill as amended. It was unanimously passed.

THE SECESSION MOVEMENT IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

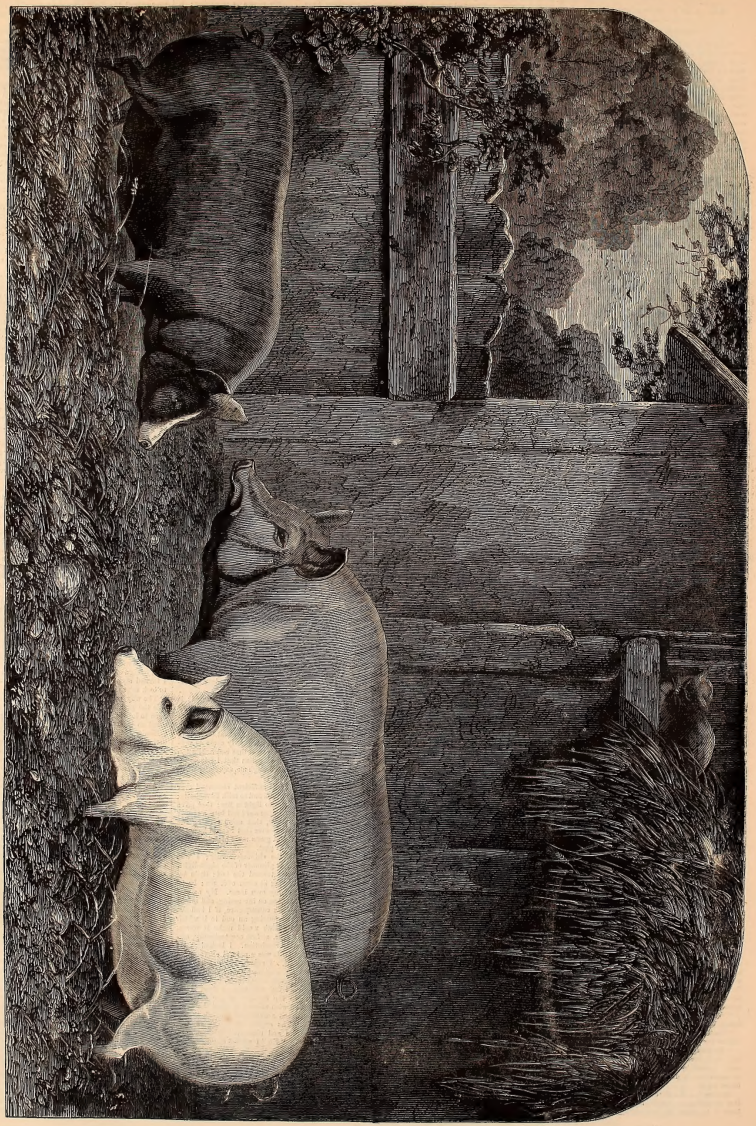
A dispatch dated Charleston, November 8, says: The State Rights flag was raised at the Mercury office at noon yesterday. Large numbers came from the country and the city congregated in the vicinity of that office.

The Colonel of the Regiment, W. Ragsdale, District Attorney for Colonel Memminger, and Colonel F. Colcock, and other patriots were present.

The flag was then raised by Colonel Ragsdale, Judge Magrath bring as our witness, under instructions from the senate, has halted the State Rights flag, and fired a salute of seventy guns.

A large body of citizens called on the resigned federal officers last night. They were greeted with enthusiasm. The officials were addressed in spirited address.

A meeting was held at Columbia, South Carolina, on 8th, which declared to retrench all National Expenditures, and went for nullification.



The Speaker of the South Carolina House on the 7th received a dispatch from Virginia, tendering the services of a volunteer corps in the event of South Carolina's secession.

MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF GEORGIA.

Governor Brown, in a special message to the Legislature of Georgia, thinks that the New Year Address will save the Southern Convention, and does not recommend the appointment of Delegates from Georgia. He thinks the constitutional rights of the people of Georgia have been violated by the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the U. S., justifying, in the judgment of civilized nations the obligation of any government for the restoration of the fugitive protection of their rights. He refers to the patriotism spirit in the ranks of our governments, and thinks the spirit of unconstitutional and unfriendly acts. Urges that the State be placed in a state of preparation for defence, even if the Legislature of Georgia cannot consistently with the federal constitution

UNDER THE SNOW.

IN TWO PORTIONS.

PORTION THE SECOND.

December 14.—We escaped with the fright; the wolves either did not suspect our presence, or were hard pressed to obtain some easier prey. At one time we thought they were burrowing through the snow, to come over civilized in a body; but it is not certain whether they might not be tearing to pieces some animal which they had hunted down on the spot. But what makes it clear the snow is frozen hard, as it is now, it allows the wolves to travel over it rapidly. They do not, consequently, remain long in a place, where little is to be had, but they scour down the mountain and invade the plain, to seize whatever falls in their way in the stubborn of the villages. They departed as abruptly as they had arrived.

Now that the door and the window are again barricaded by a deep accumulation of snow, it is clear that the trap of the chimney is our weakest point. For the present I dare not venture out to breathe the air; which is sad. I have no choice but to remain a close prisoner. To guard against a second attack, and at the same time to be able to light a fire without being suffocated by smoke, I have dried an ox-hide, which I found in the stable, into a circular aperture which I have cut in the trap. It is safe and convenient, but it cuts us off more than ever from the outer world.

Hitherto my grandfather would touch neither coffee nor wine, reserving them for time of need. But our last incidents have taught him to see with that he has consented to try whether they will not restore his strength and his attention. It is welcome to take my share; but I am young, and can do very well without them. A long-continued milk diet, like that which we are now confined, is apt to disagree with persons of his age.

December 17.—"Time passes," my grandfather said to-day, "I wish it approached."

"Approaching!" I answered. "Is not winter come?"

"Not yet, according to the almanac. Winter does not begin till the twenty-first; it is still autumn; but why would I believe that we are in the season of fruits?"

My grandfather has eaten scarcely any thing to-day. I persuaded him to taste a little bread soaked in wine. It is evident that he makes an effort to appear more cheerful than he really feels. What should I do were he to fall seriously ill?

December 22.—It is long since we have heard any noise except our oscillation in the room and our complete. We conclude that a large quantity of fresh snow has fallen, and that the chalet is probably completely buried under the snow. Nevertheless, the iron tube still rises above it; the smoke escapes freely. To-day a few flakes of snow have fallen even through this narrow orifice.

These white messengers of winter are the only things which bring us a communication between ourselves and the world. If our clock were to stop, we should lose all cognizance of time. Our only means of distinguishing night from day would be the speck of light which we can see in the morning at the top of the iron tube. On the other hand, we suffer very little from cold in our silent cave. When we have lighted the lamp, and are busy about our daily tasks before a bright fire, we partly forget our unfortunate condition. At such moments there are even certain of our accustomed ones who would envy us. We have no longer before us Robinson Crusoe, in his desert island? And yet he had not cause for hope that we have. It was a mere chance that some ship or vessel might touch at his island, while we are certain that the wolves will not, some of them, die.

December 25, Christmas Day.—We devoted the day to meditation and prayer. We must be suffering under hallucination to apprehend aught but what the Saviour has done for men. Before His advent how bitter adversity must have been! How sadly it must have been to languish and to despair! The reflection is not mine, but my grandfather's.

If I am spared to descend from the mountain, I shall be able to say to my friends, "If you had known, as I have, what new mental energy is every individual, you would feel toward one another no other sentiments than those of love and charity. Let us banish our temporary animosity all those who will not understand these things, and who stir up anger, hatred, jealousies and war." My soul soon understand their folly; they will learn from experience that it is not good for man to be alone; they will live as they love themselves and each other but without whom life would no longer be a blessing, but a chastisement of Providence."

December 28.—Yesterday, my grandfather had no appetite; but he did not complain of pain. In the evening, after supper, as he was sitting by the corner of the fire, he suddenly turned pale, totter-ed, and sank down. Without my assistance he would have fallen into the fire.

I took him in my arms, and, with an effort of which I did not believe myself capable, I transported him to his bed, where I first seated him, and then laid him at full length. His head and his hands were cold; the blood had rushed toward the heart. I took care not to raise the patient's head, but left it low, and the blood soon flowed back to it. Consciousness returned at the same time.

"Where am I? On the bed?" said my grandfather.

"Certainly; you turned faint, and I thought it best to lay you there."

"He brought me here! Heaven be praised for it! As I become weaker, he grows stronger, he said. I knelt by the bedside for a while. At last he consented to drink a little wine, and felt the better for it.

January 1.—We have been keeping New-Year's Day as well as we could; my grandfather exerted himself to cheer up my spirits. He tried to amuse me with conundrums and riddles. We feasted at supper on potatoes cooked in the ashes, toasted chestnuts, and toasted bread in wine. The gout was not forgotten; I picked out the sweetest hay for her provender; she had a clean bed, a double ration of salt, and a little caress of caresses.

My grandfather wishes to add a few words in his own handwriting:

"In the name of God, Amen!

"It is possible that I may be taken from my friends before I can acquaint them with my last wishes. I have, however, little to say. I give no respecting the disposal of my property; that duty has been performed long ago; but I wish to acknowledge the care and affection of my great-grandson, Louis Lopraz, here present. And as it is impossible for me to make him the slightest Newyear's offering to-day, I beg my heirs to supply the omission by giving him, on my part, my respects and my blessing. Further, I bequeath him, longed to my father; and lastly, my steel seal, on which are engraved my initials, which are the same as those of my golden watch and chain.

"I am convinced that he will value these slight tokens for the sake of the affectionate friendship which exists for us, and which death itself will not cause to cease.

"Such is my will.

"Signed at the Chalet of Anzindes, the 1st of January.

"LOUIS LOPRAZ."

January 3.—My grandfather spoke to me this morning about the state of his health, without disguising any thing. Every word he said is still ringing in my ears.

"My dear boy," he said, after making me sit down by his side, "I can no longer conceal from myself that the decree has gone forth against me. Whether we shall be able to keep united my soul and the portion of dust which is called my body until I can witness your deliverance, or whether that I can tell; but I scarcely dare to hope it. My weakness increases with a rapidity of which you are aware; and it is to be presumed that I shall have you to finish our wild winter quarters alone.

"You will be left in a state more dreaded at our separation than alarmed at your loneliness; you will feel more sorrow than fear. But I have sufficient confidence in your firmness and your strength of mind to be persuaded that you will not fall into a culpable degree of depression; you will do a slight portion, however, of what is strictly se again, and that will keep up your courage. A little reflection will convince you that, after my death, you will be exposed to no greater danger in the chalet than you were before. On the contrary, I have rather been a burden to you. You will no longer have famine staring you in the face. I strongly advise you to wait patiently. Do not expose yourself to the risk of a journey which you are not worth reckoning in so long a captivity; and you may risk all by forestalling the favorable moment.

"My dear louis, I am only uneasy on one account, if I must tell you all. It is the fear of my death upon your imagination. When you behold this form stretched out, cold and inanimate, with a feeling of terror, perhaps of horror and disgust, which is very unreasonable, but which many people can not overcome.

"And why should you be afraid of the remains of your aged friend? Are you afraid of me when I am asleep? I am still your friend. Death does not deliver me capable of harming you; you saw nothing but the necessity of assisting me, and you did your duty like a courageous man. Well, then, if you should see me fall into that final swoon which is called death, preserve the same firmness of mind. My body will require from you only one last service: dare to render it, when nature has warned you that the moment is come. Your strength will be quite sufficient; you gave proof of it the other evening, when you carried me and laid me upon that bed.

"You are that door; it leads to the dairy, where we never go now, because it is useless to do so. You will there dig a grave as deep as you can make it, to receive my body, until you return to fetch it in the spring, and give it a regular funeral in the village cemetery.

"After these sad measures you will find this dwelling very lonely; you will shed many tears; you will perhaps call me, and I shall not answer. You will then open the window, and endeavor to address your thoughts solely to Him who never fails to answer when we invoke him with confidence."

Such were the admirable words I received from my grandfather this morning; and, as if he felt relieved by having given them, he has since been more tranquil, more cheerful, more affectionate. For my own part, I can not believe that so clear and strong a mind can be dwelling in a body which is so near dissolution. The danger has been set before my eyes, but it still seems far distant. May God confirm my favorable anticipations!

January 7.—Darkness has a more depressing effect on us than it has on people in health, although it is said to be injurious even to the robust health. Light was made for man, and man for the light. We have contrived this morning a mode of economizing our oil, without remaining entirely in the dark. We have made a night-light with a thin slice of cork, through which we have thrust a very small wick. This feeble light suffices for my work, and it cheers my grandfather a little. We will make use of this for the future, and only rarely light the large lamp; for, upon trial, I find that I can manage to write with this.

January 10.—It was the will of God! . . . I am left alone with Him, far away from all the rest of the world. It happened the day before yesterday. It is impossible to go on and write the full account of the chalet. The paper is soaking wet with my tears.

January 12.—Yes, this is really the twelfth of January; two days have elapsed since I wrote the preceding lines. . . . My reason is returning; I shall get the upper hand, if I please God. Unless I felt that the Lord was with me and around me, I feel as though I should die, and that of fright alone.

January 15 and 14.—On the seventh I went to bed full of hope; my grandfather appeared to be better than usual: but before I had fallen asleep I heard him groan, and I jumped up instantly. Without waking me, he had risen, and was near him, I dressed myself, lighted the lamp, which stood ready, and asked him how he felt.

"I feel better," he said; "I will be like the other day; or perhaps—" He checked himself.

"Dear grandfather, will you take a spoonful of wine?"

"No, my child; only moisten my temples and rub my hands with vinegar—and—get the Bible. Read me that passage, you know which, where I have placed a slip of paper."

I obeyed. When I had finished it, he interrupted me, made me come near him, took my hands in his, and uttered a long prayer. He pronounced his words with effort, in a feeble voice, and at considerable intervals. He then made me recite some portions of Scripture which I knew by heart; at times he called to mind passages of the Bible and words of the Saviour, which he repeated with a fervor and vivacity which astonished me.

I will add one trifling circumstance, which, however, affected me greatly. Blanchette, surprised, perhaps, at seeing me sitting at an unusual hour, set up a continual bleating.

"Poor Blanchette!" said the dying man; "I must caress her, or she will die. Let her know, my boy, and lead her to my bedside."

I did as he desired. Blanchette, in her familiar way, put her two fore-feet on the edge of the bedstead, begging for some little tid-bit to be given to her. We had accustomed her to take from the hand, in this way, a grain or two of salt. I thought I should be doing what was agreeable to my patient if I gave a little salt in his hand. Blanchette took it instantly, and licked his hand afterward.

"Always be a good nurse! Give plenty of milk!" he said, passing his arm round her neck with an effort, and drawing her head aside. And I led Blanchette away, and fastened her to the manger.

After that he uttered scarcely any connected words; only he made me understand that he wished me to remain close to him, with my hand in his. All is slight, however, in intervals; and, when his eyes spoke to me at the same time, I comprehended that he was desirous that I now stand in need only of God's assistance."

Here my poor grandfather squeezed my hand more forcibly. I answered, as my emotion would answer me, he could only express his joy by a long-drawn sigh.

"I will take care to remember," I continued, "all the advice you gave for the preservation of my life. For the love of you, I will neglect nothing that can tend to my existence and to enable me to escape from the chalet. Farewell, dear grandfather! Farewell, my friend!"

I felt one more feeble pressure of the hand: it was the last; for his hand, which had gradually grown colder and colder. He expired without an effort, without convulsion, and without a sigh.

My most terrible moments, after that time, were not the first. I was alone, I slowly came to myself, and found myself alone in that sad habitation with—that thing. It was then that I felt as involuntary shudder run through me, especially when night came.

In the morning I had sufficient command over myself to wind up the clock and to milk Blanchette; the cold compelled me to light a fire: that grave idea occupied me; I have myself felt into a range of grief. Unfortunately, that same evening the wood was nearly all burnt out. I have since had a wailing of its mournful gusts more plainly than I had done for some time past.

I was within the chimney-corner; I was watching by the feeble glimmer of the night-light, with my back turned toward the bed: little by little, I felt a shivering come over me: I was no longer master of my own ideas. My mental trouble would have gone on increasing, and might have become of serious consequence, if I had not thought of a mode of putting an end to it which many people will think would make it worse. I went up to the corpse, at first constrainedly, afterward with greater resolution. I looked at it: I dared to touch it. It was a painful effort; nevertheless I persisted. I repeated the action several times, and I felt that the shock I had suffered was by degrees more overcome.

From that time I did not cease, at short intervals, to repeat the same trial with my departed friend. I fulfilled with respect to them the same offices which persons accustomed to such things perform coolly. The expression of the countenance was so calm and pleasant that it caused me to start tears. "No," I sobbed aloud, "I am not afraid."

Nevertheless my anguish returned when I felt that sleep was stealing over me; at my age it is impossible to resist it. Was I to go and lie down by the side of the body? My resolution did not carry me so far as that; and I sought, I must confess, a very wretched protection from the superstitious fears which were resuming their sway: I went and took refuge by the side of Blanchette. The warmth and the vital motion which I found in this poor animal, the slight noise she made while chewing the cud, reassured me in some slight degree.

At last I fell into a sound sleep.

The next day, as soon as I woke, I recommenced the struggle of yesterday; I employed myself as much as possible about the goat and my other work, and, above all, I frequently went near to the body. I even held that dear and venerable hand for a considerable time in my hands. The more my fear diminished, the more I felt my grief increase; and I was pleased with myself on observing a certain calmness and a moral change. My thoughts then became directed to the preparations for the burial, and I recalled to mind what my grandfather had said. I believed that it was with a secret intention that he had sometimes spoken of the dangers of precipitate interments; I resolved, therefore, to wait until nature should compel me to accomplish this last duty. The lively affection which I retained for my grandfather kept me from yielding to the cowardly wish to get rid of a painful spectacle at the very earliest moment possible.

But I took my tools and opened the dairy door. "What a Jack-of-all-trades!" I said to myself. "First, nurse of goat, doctor, and now grave-digger! What other terrestrial relatives are spared the sight of I am obliged to execute with my own hands?"

The first few strokes revolted me, and I was obliged to stop short. It was not that my arms refused to work, but my mind was troubled, and deprived me of the requisite energy. Every time I struck the ground a loud echo resounded from the roof, which was vaulted with the rock that was at a cellar. I was obliged to accustom myself to the sound of work, and to the whole day to do an amount of work which ought to have occupied more than a couple of hours. In fact, the ground is sandy and dry, and at last I was able to throw it out with the shovel without being obliged to break it up previously. I took advantage of the circumstance to make a deep grave; for I said to myself—if the chalet has to be left empty for any length of time (whether I escape from it, or whether it is my turn to die next), I ought in any my utmost endeavors to preserve the body from ravenous beasts. I therefore spent as little as possible upon my work, I was standing in a grave as deep as I was high. The clock struck ten. Night was come, and all the black thoughts of fear. But the violent exercise which I had taken soon enabled me to fall asleep. It was only deferred a few minutes by Blanchette's caresses; I was extremely glad to have me with her, and never refuses to serve as my pillow.

On the 11th of January, my first thought on waking was to make an end of my painful task; when I had lighted the lamp I saw that morning seeing away. I was obliged to have recourse to a new remedy with which I ought to have been able to dispense. Instead of breaking up the sand on boiled milk and potatoes, I took a little bread and wine. All this regimen restored the original fulness which I can ascribe to my own previous exercise, but of which I took advantage without delay. I had well earned the means of execution, and every thing had been prepared the day before.

Oh, my dear grandfather, when you taught me, in front of your house, to transport a heavy body by the employment of rollers, was little thought that I should apply your lessons so as an occasion as this. The remembrance of what you then said me was completely refreshed in my memory. I could hear the sound of your voice, in imagination; and when the funereal burden nodded its head, as if in sign of approbation, I was so overcome that it turned my eyes away, like a person who dreads to look over the brink of a precipice.

The way was smoothed: the body was soon beside the grave. The most easy way would have been to let it fall in; but I could not make up my mind to treat it with so little reverence. Every difficulty being vanquished at last, what then remained to be done gave me but little pleasure. I could freely give way to my grief. Seated on the extremity of the grave, with my eyes fixed on it, I wept abundantly by the side of that open grave. I could not resolve to throw in the first shovelfuls of earth without performing some sort of funeral service. I knelt, and searched my memory for passages of Scripture suitable to the occasion. At last, the Lord's Prayer sufficiently accompanied with it to find fitting portions, and such as my grandfather would have selected and, I hope, have blessed, it appeared to me as if I had quitted my solitude. The holy volume responded to my emotion. At last I felt stronger, though exhausted. I collected my thoughts, and no longer deferred what remained to be done. In a short space of time the grave was filled. I spent the rest of the day in carving with the point of my knife the following inscription on a small trifle of marble:

"Here rests the body of Louis Lopraz, who died in the night of the 11th-12th of January, in the arms of his grandson Louis Lopraz, who inhabits with him the cave.

I nailed the tablet to a stake, which I planted on the mound over the grave; after which I closed the door and entered the cave, which, henceforth, I hope it is my only company. Nevertheless, although I feel more at ease now that body is no longer lying on the bed, I find that some remains of weakness still linger in my mind. I combat them by paying visits to the grave, and always without a light. I have resolved to say my prayers there night and morning.

January 14.—Yes, my position is greatly changed; I become more and more aware of it every day. I had a friend and a companion, and yet I dared to complain! God is punishing me for my former discontent. I am left alone—all alone! This thought pursues me the whole day long.

January 16.—I can not shake off my weakness. I left my bed in a state of languor and discouragement, which continues. I write merely for writing's sake. If I told the whole truth, my journal would now be filled with a melancholy picture of despair. I have hardly the energy to guide my pen. My first distress when we were made prisoners here, my fright when the wolves threatened to devour us, and the sad scenes of my grandfather's death and burial, were as nothing compared with the prostration of strength into which I have fallen. I had no conception of this kind of suffering. Even prayer does not help me out of it.

January 24.—Provisions, to drag me out of the weariness of ennui, has sent a new source of disquietude. The goat yields a smaller quantity of milk. I thought myself relieved several days ago; at present, I can not double the fact.

January 25.—My grandfather certainly foresaw the possibility of my being detained here all by myself, and gave me several hints how I should act under such circumstances. One day he said: "What should we do if Blanchette were to go dry? It would be absolutely necessary to pluck up our resolution to kill her, as we have no flesh meat as we could." He followed this up with explanations how we should have to manage to preserve her flesh. Am I to be reduced to this cruel extremity?

January 26.—If matters do not grow worse I may set my mind at ease. Blanchette still gives enough milk for my sustenance. I have several cheeses in store. I have contented the remainder of my stock, and have spent the day in calculating how long it would last, if I had nothing else. It would not carry me through a fortnight.

January 27.—The yield of milk decreases, and the goat fattens in proportion. Consequent on the ease of her milk failing, the poor creature is preparing to sustain my life with her own substance! I am now haunted by the horrible idea: shall I be driven to the necessity of turning butcher? Shall I be obliged, with a strong or weak nerve, science, to cut the throat of the animal which has fed me up to the present? I have now only a half-ration of milk.

February 7.—I have tried every expedient. Once I got a little more milk by giving her a triple allowance of salt, which made her drink more. Now it was impossible to go on so; because I shall require all my milk, if—Oh! Blanchette, I have not heard that bens too fat and well fed do not lay so abundantly as lean ones; so I thought I would try the effect of giving her only a smaller quantity of hay. But it did not answer. She yielded still less milk, and had the vexation of hearing her bleat half the day. It is now not worth while milking her twice a day; so I have waited till the evening, in order to get a little more. But she can hardly let me come near her. I have hurt her teat by pressing it too hard.

February 14.—I could confess my weakness; I shed tears to-day when I tried in vain to milk Blanchette for the last time. When she saw that I gave up the task, she looked at me distractfully, as if I were using herself on her guard against a fresh attempt. I pushed the pail away from me, and sat down by the poor creature. I threw my arms round her, and wept bitterly.

She went on eating all the same, bleating occasionally, and looking at me affectionately. They say that goats do not distinguish persons, and that they never conceal the jealousy and deceitful excitements of dogs; nevertheless, Blanchette is fond of her companion, and I myself confidence in her. She looks to me for food and the necessary attentions to which I have accustomed her; and I must now put a knife into her throat! Inexperienced as I am in such a task, I can scarcely avoid causing her great and prolonged suffering.

God has given animals to man for food; I know it; but it is showing no ingratitude for his bounty if we become attached to those which are rendered us benefits, and which are of a gentle and affectionate disposition. I will, therefore, delay the cruel action up to the last possible moment. I have still a few victuals left, and I will economize them as closely as I can.

February 15.—In the many sorrows pressing on me, it is impossible to keep my journal with strict regularity. My provisions are all but exhausted; Blanchette grows fatter than ever. It goes to my heart every time I caress her. I have made a fresh search in the house; I have looked once up the floor in several places, to try and discover, if possible, some hidden store of provision. All I have gained by this useless exercise is to whet my appetite. The idea that I have scarcely a morsel left to eat makes me, I believe, all the hungrier.

February 17.—Since yesterday the frost has become so strong that I am obliged to keep up a constant fire. Certainly, if this weather lasted, I should have the consolation in shutting up my poor victim's flesh in the stable, where it would hang, without any further preparation. But the weather may change. I must decide upon something without delay. I have only just enough salt left for my butchering purposes!

February 18.—Instead of intense; it recalls the visit of the wolves to my mind. There is nothing now to hinder them from traversing the mountain in all directions. Under these desperate circumstances, it is the only end which makes me shudder. When an overlaying speculation or crush me to-day, I should hail death as a deliverance.

February 20.—I have come to a grand resolution! I will not have the child's blood on me. Before risking my life, I wish to record in my journal what made me come to this conclusion.

Yesterday morning Blanchette's bleating woke me out of a frightful dream. I thought I was standing, with bloody hands, cutting up the poor animal's quivering flesh; her head lay before me; I could nevertheless hear it utter cries of pain. These were what actually did strike my ear. I awoke with my cheeks streaming with tears. How delighted I was to behold Blanchette still living! I ran up to her; she was more affectionate than ever. My joy was not of long duration. I remembered that destruction stared me in the face; indecision was impossible. I took a knife, and set to work to sharpen it on the hearth-stone. I was at my wit's end; I felt as if I were going to commit a murder; and, after advancing unsteadily for the purpose of giving the fatal blow, I stopped short, overpowered by feelings of remorse.

My hands were benumbed with cold, another reason for deferring the act which inspired me with such disgust and repugnance. I lighted a good fire, and pondered as I warmed myself. "If the wolves can travel over the snow," it suddenly struck me, "they should not we travel over it as well?"

This idea thrilled me with joy; then ever stole over my mind. I was about to surrender myself to those ravenous brutes. To avoid making Blanchette pay, I was exposing myself to be come the prey of wolves!

And, if I kill the goat—I afterward considered—can I hope that that will be the last time I am put upon to perform the office? I have sometimes seen the Jura all covered with white as white linen the summer after the snow. An opportunity now offered while the snow is frozen. I had the wherewithal to make my way over it. I had the wherewithal to make my way over it. I had the wherewithal to make my way over it

"I COULD NOT BELIEVE MY EYES."

THE CONSERVATORY.—"HE HOLDS THE ROSE—AND HER HAND AS WELL."

"Did I say one word too much?"

"No, no, indeed," answered Augusta, quickly. Then, laughing, "He is vastly superior to any one here."

They left the room together. Lucy saw Colonel Redworth's eye follow them, glance from her to her companion, back to her, and then rest upon her companion. Isabella—from that moment she was jealous of her friend. She sat down on the nearest seat. Augusta lingered only a moment beside her, and then went to her mother. She, too, felt that there were henceforth rivals.

"Dear," continued the old lady, clasping her hands upon her lap, "I can not follow that winter through, it was shameful to both; they set themselves one against the other, they struggled each to be the loveliest. Sir Thomas and Lady Anne came to town; their weight went with the latter—torn and more wealthy, otherwise I think Lucy would not have been forgotten. As it was, she was. She felt her chance was hopeless; Elsie, in her weak love she knelt and prayed Augusta to have mercy, and—it mocked and scorned. Each night Augusta gained ground; Lucy sat by and watched her triumph. My dear, early in the spring Mr. Redworth married her."

"And she led him a dog of a life ever after, hope?"

"My love, I never wished so. I can not justify Augusta, but I do not judge as I did then. Then Lucy had many admirers, but few lovers. She had little position, and no fortune—then all I thought of was Daniel and the 'one ewe lamb.'

"My dear, I need not tell you that from that day Lucy and Augusta never met, never wrote. Lucy thought her heart would break. My dear, how often we think so when life has plenty of cares and pleasures yet! Pride made her first bear up, then, thank God! the Bible. And she had a father for whom to live, who never again lost his first place in her affections.

"Well, my dear, only three years later, I saw Colonel Redworth's death in the Gentleman's Magazine. The name never met Lucy's eyes again. Years passed on, her father died in a good old age. Time had healed her wound. She smiled now at her simplicity in thinking ever to be the wife of such a man; and rejoiced that the temptation to leave her father alone, yes, to desert him—what must she have done else in becoming daughter-in-law to Sir Thomas and Lady Anne?—had never been set before her. Time, I say, had healed this wound, but there was one he could not heal. This rankling indignation and shame at Augusta's treachery. She still called her friend's conduct by no gentler name. So sharp had been the fight, such had learned well-nigh to hate the other, and they forgot, as we too often do, 'he that hateth his brother is a murderer.' And yet this, when Lucy thought the grave must have closed over Augusta, and that her own time must be short.

"Well, my love, Lucy had grown an old woman. Her ties were very few. My love, when life is waning away, it is hard to feel we shall leave no one behind to mourn us and to miss us—so selfish are we to the end! She was staying for a few days in the new home of one of the few friends left her, the daughter of a friend of early days, now a grandmother herself—one who at the time of Lucy's fiercest trial had been yet unborn. The young people were going to explore an old manor-house twelve miles distant, open to the public by the courtesy of the owner one day in each week. The day came. Mrs. Tylcote was not able to go with them. Poor things! no one could bear them to be disappointed, and Lucy offered to take her place, little used to such doings now.

"She was very sad and lonely just then. Two days before she had heard, as she believed of the death of the last friend left her of her own generation. But the morning was bright and sunny, her young friends happy and merry; and, my dear, before they reached the manor-house, Mrs. Lucy was as happy as the youngest there. My love, never sit still and cling to sorrow when a duty comes in your way—meet it, and it will leave a blessing behind it.

"We explored oak-paneled parlors, and dismal dungeons below the foundation of the present house, which in the reign of Elizabeth had taken the place of the old Norman castle. Finally, the old housekeeper took us the round of the portrait gallery. There were formal, rich-colored Holbeins; narrow Vandykes, voluptuous Lelys, and charming Sir Joshuas; and, my dear, among them, a portrait of Augusta Clinton.

"Elsie, I had been with her when the first sketch was begun, with her when the last touch had been put in. I could not believe my eyes. Yes, this was that portrait, and no other, though strangely had sixty years dimmed and marred its beauties. I stood gazing and gazing, and my heart yearned toward her, my old friend—not, my dear, that that I believed her dead long ago.

"As I stood, the door of a room a little to my left opened. An aged lady came out, stately, and yet bowed beautiful, but exceeding sad. She passed me; I courtesied, to apologize for our intrusion. She looked hard at me as she bowed in return, and passed on. She recognized me with no clew; while I, with that picture before me, knew not my old friend.

"How did it come there? I longed to know, but could not ask. We went down stairs again. We were preparing to start home, when the same lady advanced toward us from a parlor.

"'Madam,' she said, ceremoniously, 'pardon me; but you seem a great admirer of Sir Joshua. There is one in my parlor I do not, in general, show to visitors—but if you would—it is a master-piece—'

"She broke off, and led the way. I followed. Elsie, my heart beat as it had not done since the day I saw Colonel Redworth in the Camberwell assembly. Something in the stately figure I was following seemed familiar; and yet no wonder I knew her not. She motioned me to stand on the rug beside her. My eyes were fixed on hers; she raised them, mine followed hers, to the picture above the mantle-piece. Oh, Elsie! it was Col. Redworth, in a Pumpadour coat, laced with silver.

"'Meg! Meg!' she sobbed—she, the strong, proud woman, who had once so mocked my tears. 'I only had him three years. He was killed by a fall from his horse. They brought him home dead. I broke your heart. This broke mine.'

"She sobbed like a child. I should not wonder if she had never shed a tear for him before.

"'Meg! Meg!' she gasped, 'speak to me. Can not you forgive me? It is one-and-fifty years—one-and-fifty years,' she repeated, 'since I sinned against you. And for eight-and-forty of these years I have been a widow.'

"Elsie, she was my old friend. The friend who more than sixty years ago had loved me. All was forgotten and forgiven before that.

"'If you had not appreciated him,' I said (but, Elsie, think me not better than I am; it was a hard struggle)—'if you had not appreciated him, it would have been hard for me ever to forgive you. As it is, you did but love him too well.'

"She kissed me. Elsie, my heart melted and yearned within me. I flung my arms around her and cried for joy. She fondled and caressed me, half-sobbing. Elsie, we both shared of the day that I had first told her of Thomas Redmayne, and we looked for the last time jealousy in each other's face. Our love was again as if this had never come between us—nay, even the clearer for this long cloud.

"'You have children?' I said at last—I so longed for the face of a Redmayne.

"He left me still a son and daughter. The son so like him. Meg, you who knew me so strong and confident, will wonder—I ruined him by my fondness. He is dead now. Oh, Meg! I have known trouble indeed. I was glad when he died! My daughter died also, and yet she died an old woman, too. Meg, I used to think Death had forgotten me—now, again, he will come all too soon!'

"'Are there none, then?'

"'Yes, my daughter's son. I will show you.'

"We crossed the hall. There were my young party standing at the door awaiting me. I never remembered them even then. She turned the handle, and entered softly.

"See!"

"I looked. There, leaning back in an arm-chair, reading, was a young man of eight-and-twenty or so. He started and rose.

"'Thomas,' she said, 'Mrs. Margaret Fordyce, a very dear old friend of mine.'

"He came to meet me. He was his grandfather all over. His open, gallant bearing, and all, were his. Even that charming voice and smile, which I thought never to have heard or seen again. Yet it was not the same! Well, Elsie!"

"'Oh, Aunt Margaret! This was—'

"Think of the best man you know."

Elsie's eyes glanced to the figure in the chimney-corner. And at that moment her father justified his title to be possessor of "the most charming voice and smile."... He opened his eyes and called his daughter to him.

Isabella flew to his side, and throughout that evening looked wondrously into the face which had unconsciously earned such new interest. But the lesson of Mrs. Margaret's history was not lost upon her.

THE CONSERVATORY.

THE roof is dim with beads of dew,
The autumn sun comes pouring through,
Like golden water tinged with blue.

The vapory air is rich with scent—
A melody of odors blent
Like accords of some instrument

The tuberose yields its languid soul,
And fainter streams of perfume roll
From the white lily's carven bowl.

From clustering Jasmine honey flows,
And a delicious ten-wind blows
From the large yellow China rose.

Thus by all spicy perfumes fanned,
And touched with airs from every land,
Beneath the lucent roof they stand.

"YOU WOULD NEVER GUESS HOW I RECOGNIZED YOU, SIR," SAID SHE.

They both are young and both are fair,
The light of heaven is in her hair,
And he is tall and debonnaire.

She plucks some roses from their stem,
Then slyly looks at him and them,
And gives a gentle, dangerous "Hem!"

"Give me a rose," the youngster cries;
She sudden lifts, then drops her eyes,
And acts a kind of small surprise.

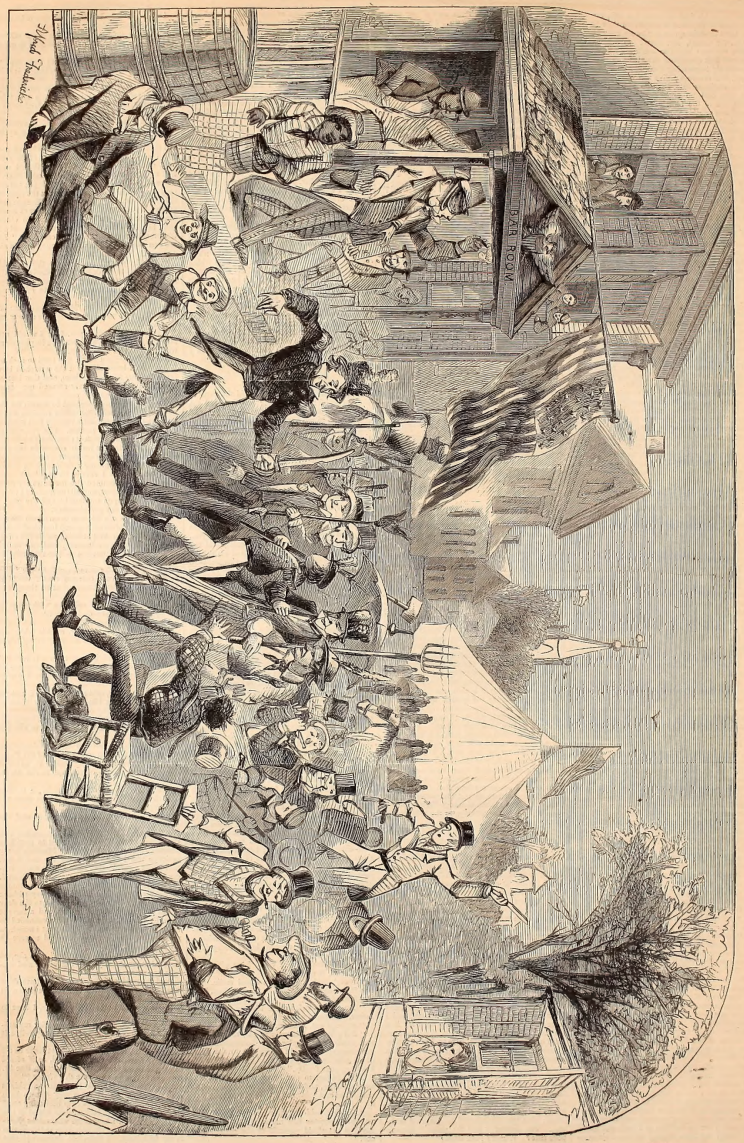
With air as meek as any saint
That Sanzio himself might paint,
She gives the youth denial faint.

But still he pleads, and still the maid
Denies him—yet her hand has strayed
Toward his—love by love betrayed.

So while they talk the hands draw near,
Hers trembles with a nameless fear—
The rose that's there will soon be here.

The way it passed I can not tell:
Denial from her lips still fell,
But he holds the rose—and her hand as well.

His manly cheek with triumph glows,
For well the loving youngster knows
The mystic meaning of that rose.



A DAY'S RIDE:

A LIFE'S ROMANCE.

BY CHARLES LEVER.

CHAPTER XVIII.

I AM about to make a very original observation. I hope its truth may equal its originality. It is, that the man who has never had a sister is, at his first entrance into life, far more the slave of feminine captivations than he who has been brought up in a "house full of girls." "Oh, for shame, Mrs. Potts! Is this the gallantry we have heard so much of? Is this the spirit of that chivalrous devotion you have been incessantly impressing upon us?" Wait a moment, fair creature; give me one half-minute for an explanation. He who has not had sisters has had no experiences of the behind-the-scene life of the female world; he has never heard one syllable about the plans, and schemes, and dress, by which hearts are snared. He fancies Mary stuck that moss-rose in her hair in a moment of childish caprice. Kate left it after her little sister, and showed the prettiest of ankles in doing it, out of the irrepressible gayety of her happy spirits. In a word, he is the one who only sees the play when the house is fully lighted, and all the actors in their proper costume; he has never witnessed a rehearsal, and has not the very vaguest suspicion of a prompter.

To him, therefore, who has only experienced the rough companionship of brothers—or, worse still, has lived entirely alone—the first acquaintanceship with the young-lady world is such a fascination as no words can describe. The gentle look, the soft pressure, the silvery voice, with all the play and action of natures so infinitely more refined than any he has ever witnessed, are inexpressibly captivating. It is not alone the occupations of their hours, light, graceful, and picturesque as they are, but all their topics, their thoughts, seem to soar out of that commonplace world he has lived in, and rise to ideal realms of poetry and beauty in a wonderfully subdued way. I do not know of any thing so truly Elysian in this our first—our very first—experiences of this kind.

Werther's passion for Charlotte received a powerful impulse from watching her as she cut bread and butter for the children. There are very few natures who will smile at this; who can not enter into the intense far-sightedness of that poetic conception; that could in one trait of simple tenderness, a whole history, with its ennobling duties, its cheerful sacrifices, its gracefully borne cares. Let him, therefore, who could not have loved Werther, scoff at Potts, as he owns that he never felt his heart so powerfully drawn to Kate Herbert as when he watched her making her tea for breakfast. Dressed in a muslin that represented mourning, her rich hair plainly braided in the net, and with a reckless motion, she glided about, an ideal of gentle sadness, more fascinating than I can tell. If she bore any particular memory of our little difference, she did not show it; her manner was calm, and even kind. She felt, perhaps, that some explanation was due to me for the rudeness of that old woman, and was not unwilling to make it.

"You know we are to rest here to-day?" said she, as she busied herself at the table.

"I heard it from Charles, and from the courier," said I, peevishly. "I am not quite certain in what capacity Mrs. Keates condescends to accompany that I am treated to such scant courtesy. Probably you would be kind enough to explain this matter for me?"

"I shall certainly not ask," said she, with a smile.

"I certainly promised her brother—I could not do less for a colleague, not to say something more—that I'd see this old lady safe over the Alps. I'm not looking out for new acquaintanceship with the young-lady world as a fascination as no words can describe. The gentle look, the soft pressure, the silvery voice, with all the play and action of natures so infinitely more refined than any he has ever witnessed, are inexpressibly captivating. "I shall certainly not ask," said she, with a bewitching smile.

"Not to you, de—" I was nearly in it again; "not to you," said I, correcting myself, and till I felt on fire. I suspect that she saw all the peril of the moment, for she left the room hurriedly, on the pretext of fetching water. Can any reader explain why it is that one sits in quiet admiration for hours at a picture by Leonardo or Holbein, and never experiences my chagrin or impatience at trials which, if only represented in life, would be positively intolerable? I fear all that art transcends nature, and that ugliness in canvas is more endurable than ugliness in the flesh? Be this as it may, I am very certain I faced a whole gallery of the Dutch school, from Van Eyck to Vanloo, with more composure than one old lady who sat awaiting me in No. 12.

Twice as I sat at my breakfast did François put in his head to say, "Monsieur!" but not a word. "What is the matter? What do you mean?" cried I, impatiently, at the third intrusion.

"It is Madam that wishes to know when monsieur will be at leisure to go up stairs to her."

I almost bounded on my chair with passion. How was I to know that this was merely a question of that dignity with which I ought to surround myself if exposed to such demands as this? That is what I should have done in fact in every illusion in which I draped myself. What availed all the romance of Cervantes to inspire me, when that wicked old enchantress called me to her presence, and in a voice of thunder said, "Sirrah! you are impertinent!" "Shall I interpose Conscience," "it is quite enough to pronounce the coin base without telling me to say at what mint it was fabricated. She knows you, Potts, she knows you!"

There is one great error in castle-building, and I have thought very long and anxiously, and I must own fruitlessly, over how to meet it: it is that one never can get a hero of the right sort to build on. One is always, like an Irish cottier, a tenant at will, likely to be turned out at a moment's notice, and dispossessed without pity or compassion. The same language applies to each: "You know well, my good fellow, you had no right to be there; pack up and be off!" It's no use saying that it was a bit of waste land unfenced and untilled; that, until you took it in hand, it was overgrown with nettles and docks-weed; that you dispossessed no one, and wrecked no one. There it is: "Where's the lease? Where's your title? Where's your lease?"

Now, I am curious to hear what injury I was inflicting on that old woman at No. 12 by any self-deceptions of mine? Could the most exaggerated estimate I might form of myself, my present, or my future, in any degree affect her? Who constituted her a sort of ambulatory conscience to call people's hearts to account at a moment's notice? It may be seen by the tone of these reflections that I was fully impressed with the belief that through some channel, or by some clew, Mrs. Keates knew all my history, and intended to use her knowledge tyrannically over me.

Oh, that I could now retaliate! Oh, that I had only the veriest fragment of her past life, out of which to construct her whole story—just to put it on record, and quiet, and silence, to build up the whole monster, never omitting a rib, nor forgetting a vertebra! How I should like to see her face as I made a most significant sigh, "I knew poor Keates well!" Could I not make even these simple words convey a world of accusation, blended with bitter sorrow and regret?

François again, and on the same errand. "Say I am coming; that I have only finished a hasty breakfast, and that I am coming this instant," cried I. "Tell her this is very far more to repress the more impatient expressions which struggled for utterance, particularly as I saw, or fancied I saw, that the poor lass had over his mouth to hide a grin at my expense.

"Is Miss Herbert up stairs?"

"No, Sir; she is in the garden."

This was so far pleasant. I dreaded the thought of her coming at this interview, and I felt that punishment within the precincts of the jail was less terrible than on the drop before the executioner, with this consoling reflection I mounted the stairs.

CHAPTER XIX.

A SHOCKED expression of face I heard the permission to enter; but scarcely had I closed the door behind me than the old lady advanced, and courtesying in a most profound manner of ceremonial politeness, said, "When you learn, Sir, that my conduct has been dictated in the interest of your safety, you will, I am sure, graciously pardon many apparent rudenesses in my manner toward you, and only see in them my zeal to serve you."

I could only bow to a speech, not one syllable of which I could comprehend the drift of. She conducted me courteously to a seat, and only took her own after I was seated.

"I feel, Sir," said she, "that there will be no end to our embarrassments if I do not go straight to my object and say at once that I know you. I tell you frankly that I hold my brother did not betray your secret. The instincts of his calling are to him second nature—were stronger than fraternal love—and all would be safe with you, madam, I have found a gentleman who is going abroad, and who, I am persuaded, can serve you safely as far as Como." I implicitly accepted the offer, and agreed to set out immediately. I suspected nothing—I knew nothing. It was only before going down to dinner that the paragraph in the Courier de Geneve caught my eye, and as I read it, I thought I should have fainted. My first determination was not to appear at dinner. I felt that something or other in my manner would betray my knowledge of your retreat. My next was to go down and behave with more than usual urbanity. You may have remarked that I was very abrupt, although, shall I confess it?

I tried to enter a dissent to this, but did not succeed so happily as I meant; but she restrained:

"At any cost, however, Sir, I determined that I alone should be the depository of your confidence. I am myself, Sir, a very conscientious stranger; she is, besides, very young; she would be in a most unsuitable position to intrust with such a secret, and so I said, I will pretend illness, and remain here for a day; I will make some pretense with dissatisfaction about the expense of the journey; I will affect to have had some passing difference, and he can thus leave us ere he has suspected. Not that I desire this, Sir: far from it; this is the brightest episode in a long life. I never imagined that I should have enjoyed such an honor; but I have only to think of your safety, and if an old woman, unconversant, unaccustomed as myself, even to penetrate your disguise, why not others more keen-sighted and penetrating? Don't you agree with me?"

"There is much force in what you say, Madam," said I, with dignity, "and your words touch me profoundly." I thought this a happy expression, for it conveyed a sort of grand condescension that seemed to hit off the occasion.

"You would never guess how I recognized you, Sir," said she.

"Never, Madam." I could have given my oath to this, if required.

"Well," said she, with a bland smile, "it was from the resemblance to your mother!"

"Indeed!"

"Yes; you are far more like her than your father, and you are scarcely so tall as he was."

"Perhaps not, Madam."

"But your air, his manner, Sir, the graceful and captivating dignity that distinguished all your house. I would betray you to the eyes of all who have enjoyed the high privilege of knowing your family."

The allusion to our house showed that we were royalties, and I laid my hand on my heart, and bowed as a prince ought, blandly but haughtily.

"Ah, Sir," said she, with a deep sigh, "your present enterprise fills me with apprehension. Do you not already yourself of the consequences?"

I sighed, too, and if the truth were to be told, I was very much afraid.

"But, of course, you are acting under advice, and with the counsel of those well able to guide you."

"I can not say I am, Madam; I am free to tell you that every step I am now taking is self-suggested."

"Oh, then, let me implore you to pause, Sir," said she, falling on her knees before me, "let me thus entreat of you not to go farther in a path so full of danger."

"Shall I confess, Madam," said I, proudly, "that I do not see these dangers you speak of?"

I thought that on this hint she would talk out, and I might be able to pierce the veil of the mystery, and discover what I was for having been very like my mother, and shorter than my father, I was sorely puzzled to divine my parentage; but she only went off into generalities about the state of the Continent, and the condition of Europe generally. I saw from that my best chance of ascertaining something about myself was to obtain from her the newspaper that first suggested her discovery of me, and I said, half carelessly, "Let me see the paragraph which struck you in the Courier."

"Ah, Sir, you must excuse me, these ignoble writers have little delicacy in alluding to the misfortunes of the great; they seem to recognize the littleness of their own station on every such occasion."

You can well imagine, Madam, how time has accustomed me to such petty insults: show me the paper!"

They let me refuse you, Sir; I would not, however blamelessly, be associated in your mind with a man who can offend you."

Again I protested that I was used to such attacks, that I knew all about the wretched hireling creatures who wrote them, and that instead of offending, they positively amused me—actually made me laugh.

Thus urged, she proceeded to search for the newspaper, and only after some minutes was it that she remembered Miss Herbert had taken away to read in the garden. She proposed to send the servant to fetch it; but this I would not permit, pretending at last to conceal in her own previously expressed contempt for the paragraph —but secretly promising myself to go in search of it the moment I should be at liberty—and once more she resumed the theme of my reasons, and my dangers, and all that could be thought possibly bring upon my family, and the grief I might occasion my grandmother.

Now at these few words from whom the ties of family and kindred imposed less rigid bonds, I was rather provoked at being reminded of obligations to my grandmother, and I almost driven to declare that she weighed for very little in the balance of my affections, when I recollected that I had received me from the indirection by a fervent entreaty that I would at least ask a single person what he thought of my present step.

"Will you, do this?" said she, with tears in her eyes. "Will you do it, now?"

I promised her faithfully.

"Will you let here, Sir, at this table, and let me have the prudent memory in my life to recall the incident?"

"I should be an hour or two for reflection," said I, pushed very hard by this insistance of hers, for I was sorely puzzled whom I was to believe.

"Oh!" said she, still tearfully, "is it not the habit of hesitating, Sir, has cost your house so dearly?"

"No," said I, "we have been always accounted prompt in action and true to our engagements."

Heaven forgive me! but in this vainglorious speech I was not false to the spirit of Potts' creed, "Vigilantibus omnia fausta;" or, as some one has rendered it, "Potts answers to the nightbell."

She smiled faintly at my remark. I wonder how she would have looked had she read the thought that suggested it.

"But you will write to him, Sir?" said she once more.

I laid my hand over what anatomists call the region of the heart, and said in the tone of Charles Edward in the prints. Meanwhile my patience was beginning to fail me, and I felt that if the conversation were to last much longer I should infallibly lose my presence of mind. Fortunately, the old lady was to full of her theme to think that I was to be left long without some interruption, with many an allusion to the dear Count and the adored Duchess. I took a fervent hope that I might be ultimately reconciled to them both, a wish which I had tact enough to perceive required the most guarded reserve on my part.

I know I am indiscreet, Sir," said she, at last, "but you must pardon one whose zeal outruns her reason."

And I bowed grandly, as I might have done in extending mercy to some captive taken in battle.

"There is but one favor more, Sir, I have to beg."

"Speak, Madam. As the courtier remarked—but I be possible it is done, if impossible it shall be done."

"Well, Sir, it is that you will not leave us till you hear from—" She hesitated, as if afraid to say the name, and then added, "the Rue St. George. Will you give me this pledge?"

Now, though this would have been, all things considered, an arrangement very like to have suited my life, I could not help hesitating ere I assented, not to say that our dear friend of the Rue St. George, whatever he was, might possibly not be in all the delusions indispensable to my happiness. I therefore demurred—that is, in legal acceptance, I deferred assent—as though to say, "We'll see."

"At all events, Sir, you'll accompany us to Como?"

"You have my pledge to that, Madam."

"And, meanwhile, Sir, you agree with me that it is better I should continue to behave toward you with a cold and distant reserve?"

"Unquestionably."

"Rarely meeting, seldom or never conversing."

"I should say never, Madam; making, in fact, any communication you may desire to reach me through the intervention of that young person—I forget her name."

"Miss Herbert, Sir."

"Exactly; and who appears gentle and unobtrusive."

"She is a gentlewoman by birth, Sir," said the old lady, tetchily.

"I have no doubt of it, Madam, or she would not be found in association with you."

She courteously deeply at the compliment, and I bowed as low, and backing and bowing I gained the door, dying with eagerness to make my escape.

"Will you pardon me, Sir, if, after all the agitation of this meeting, I do not feel equal to appear at dinner to-day?"

"You will charge that young person to give no news of your health, however," said I, insinuating that I expected to see Miss Herbert.

"Certainly, Sir; and if it be your pleasure that she should dine with you, to preserve appearances—"

"You are right, Madam; your remark is full of wisdom. I shall expect to meet her." And again I bowed low, and ere she recovered from another reverential courtesy I had closed the door behind me, and was half-way down stairs.

TRAINING DAY.

THIS is the season of the year at which our militia turn out for training day; and the scene which we engrave on page 733 will be recognized as familiar by all residents of country villages. Its spectacles have been so often described that we will not occupy any space here with a repetition of the old story, but will simply refer to our picture, as telling its own tale in its own way.

THE AMERICAN TURF.—FAVORITE HORSES.

WE publish on page 728 a group of famous champions of the American turf.

The poetic beauty of the head of TOM WONDER warrants his position in the centre of our group. Though not qualified as a trotter for so prominent a position, he is, nevertheless, the fastest pacer in the world.

This group of celebrated entire horses, all so well known in the State of New York, can not fail to interest our readers.

The stanch, unpresuming nature of FATCHEY; the fiery spirit of EDGAR ALLEN; the kind and docile PLOW-BOY, will be readily recognized by those familiar with the originals. Commencing from the left of our engraving, we have EDGAR ALLEN; afterward, FATCHEY, TOM WONDER, TORONTO CHIEF (so much in shadow as to be scarcely discernible), GRAY MESSENGER, and PLOW-BOY—the patriarchs of the present age, to whose descendants we must look for our future trotters.

It would be difficult to design a picture embracing, in six individual animal portraits, so much that is known, admired and loved as the present subject; but our space would forbid a list of their performances and pedigrees, even if they were not too well known to render such description necessary.

SUFFOLK AND ESSEX PIGS.

THE remarkably fine stock we have chosen for illustration on page 729 are the property of Messrs. Mott, and J. W. King, of Newtown, Long Island. They represent the Suffolk and Essex breed, which are the most profitable to the farmer. To those who condemn the pig as an uncouth and uninteresting animal, a glance at the symmetrical proportions of the Essex variety will be sufficient to dispel the idea. The rotundity and beauty of form, the smallness of bone, and abundance of pork which they possess, have placed them at the head of the list; for they are probably the most desirable stock to keep, both as a matter of ornament and profit. Their color is a clear shining black; the ears very fine and pointed, the snout tapering and delicately formed; and the body round, strong, and symmetrical.

To those who are skeptical, we would say—go to the farm of Mr. Mott, of Newtown, and learn the perfection and beauty of pigs. The care and attention, as well as circumstances which pervades his establishment, prove that, in proper hands, even pigdom may be made poetical.

THE NEXT DANCE.

LORD PUNCH TO THE PRINCE OF WALES. "Now, my Boy! There's your pretty Cousin COLUMBIA—you don't get such a Partner as that every Day!"

Yes, dance with him, Lady, and bright as they are,
Believe us he's worthy those sunshiny smiles,
Were ever him the fog of the Strips and the Star,
And gladden the heart of the Queen of the Isles.

We thank you for all that has welcomed him—most
For the sign of true love that you bear the Old Land:
Proud Heiress of all that his ancestor lost,
You restore it, in giving that warm, loving hand.

And we'll claim, too, the omen. Fate's looking askance,
And Fate, only, knows the next time she will play,
But if John and his Cousin join hands for the Dance—
Bad luck to the parties who get in their way.

CANDOR.

Commencement of a New Volume.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
For December, 1860.

THE present Number commences the Twenty-Second Volume of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE. The Publishers are received that in value of matter and luxury of illustration, the ensuing Volume shall fully sustain the reputation which the Magazine has acquired and maintained during more than Ten Years.

In the February Number will appear the first part of a New Story by W. M. THACKERAY, which, it is expected, will be continued in successive Numbers during the year.

The Article on "Ribbons" in this Number is the first of a Series of Papers portraying Life and Character in California and Oregon, by J. ROSS BROWNE, late Confidential Governor of Agents for the Pacific States. They will be profusely illustrated with Drawings by STEPHENS, MCENAN, CRAWFORD, and PARSONS, from the Character Sketches by the Author.

Other Illustrated Papers, depicting Life, Characters, and Scenery in every part of the American Continent, from Labrador to Florida, are in course of preparation by favorite Authors and Artists.

The Publishers trust that the thousands of Voluntary Correspondents by whose aid the Editors have been able to make the "Drawer" a marked feature of the Magazine, will continue their favors; and that new Correspondents will forward such anecdotes and stories as come under their observation.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. IV.—No. 204.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1860. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

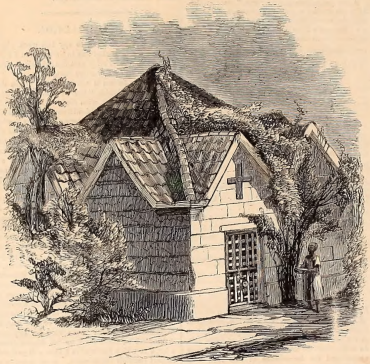
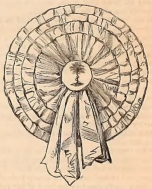
SCENES IN CHARLESTON, S. C.

WE give herewith an engraving of the Tomb of HON. JOHN C. CALHOUN, South Carolina's greatest statesman. The obelisk in the left of the picture is a Monument to the memory of ROBERT J. TRUMBULL, "the intrepid and successful asserter of the Rights of the States, author of the Address of the Convention to the People of South Carolina, and other able productions in support of Constitutional Liberty." He was born 14th January, 1774, and died 15th June, 1853.



We give also an engraving of the OLD POWDER MAGAZINE in Cumberland Street, Charleston—one of the relics of the Revolutionary War. Here, previous to the surrender of the city to the British, in 1780, powder was stowed to the amount of about 100,000 pounds. By order of the American general in command it was taken from this place before the surrender, and secretly walled up in the Custom-house vaults, where it remained safe from discovery during the time the enemy held the city.

This relic of the past is still in good preservation, and is one of the most notable ancient buildings at present remaining in the city.



The reader will find also an engraving of the PALMETTO FLAG, which has been recently hoisted by vessels in the harbor, and in the streets of Charleston, during the secession excitement. And of the famous COCKADE worn by the citizens of South Carolina generally. The last is of blue silk, with a button in the centre, on which is represented a palmetto-tree.

THE RETURN.

A LONG path of moonlight lay upon the sea. Its farther extremity touched the horizon under the moon, and its farther point swept along the shore with the stride of a stranger who was treading the pebbles, sliding its glistening arm over acres upon acres of ocean surface. Out upon the bay, visible in the bright light but spectral, floated the ship whose keel had just touched the sand with its keel, and was now speeding back to the mercy circle of little cars in musical row-locks.

As the stranger walked along the beach there came familiar sounds across the water—the rattle of tackle and the flap of sails; there spiritual voices, entitled to the ownership of the wind, the ship pointed her prow seaward and shot gracefully into the night.

Close by the sea-shore, yet nearly a mile before him, lay a bright New England village. Bright because white, and clean and tidy-like. The light was so clear and brilliant that he could even discern the church-spire as he marched along. The dwellings in themselves were individualized; standing in families, in pairs, or singly, as though they partook of the taste and habits of the race whom they wrapped from the sea-coast storms in their stiff mantles of pine and hemlock.

It was nine o'clock; for the sound of the church-bell came cheerily over the fields and along the edge of the groves. As the stranger approached the village he saw it grow more compact and less strong; his chest heaved and felt with broad and unusual movement. Before he sat upon a bank of earth for a moment, pressing his face in his hands, smoothing his features with their broad palms; but when he resumed his walk there was no less nervous eagerness.

We have called him a stranger, and yet he is approaching his own home. He has been seven years, going out as master of a whaleship to the North Pacific. Four years away, and then ready to return, his ship was driven upon a little island, where only three of all the crew escaped a watery grave.

It was one of those islands rarely touched by any vessel; and hence they had been imprisoned during all these long years, subjects of savagery and oblivion of all the world beside.

When he went out he was betrothed to Millie Grey—Millie, who lived with her mother in the white cottage under the hill, where a creek winds round to meadow, then meadow and wash into with its little waterfall. Millie was sweet and trusting, beautiful with health and the glow of rustic labor.

It had been all confessed; and when he kissed the fresh cheek of eve on the morning of his departure he had said:

"Be true to me, Millie, and when I come back we will live together in our own house on the knoll there by the orchard, darling!"

And Millie had looked into his eyes through her tears and said:

"Be true to you! I should as soon think of dying as loving any one better than you, Willie."

And then she had reached up high with her white fingers, and twined them in his heavy locks, bringing down his head to the level of her red lips, and planting a kiss there which had blossomed through the whole ten years.

But the ten years had made him dead. No delicacy of devotion could require of Millie Grey so long a waiting. So the stranger man never came in his glancing as he passed familiar spots and entered the street.

"She may have died!" and he turned a little aside to search the church-yard, choosing rather to be told by the cold lips of marble than the unassuming tongues of friends. There were many new stones and many new families of graves; but the Returned sought only a plat in the centre. When he went a step nearer two mounds, and then but a short one. Now there were three; but the headstone of the new had not been set.

William turns down a lane bordered by silver-oaks, under the shadow of which he had last walked with Millie Grey.

A light shines out from the window of the white cottage. It is not deserted then." But the fever of fear and hope that had possessed him was met with wrath and waters.

Over against the old home, in the edge of the orchard, is another and unfamiliar cottage. It is quite new, for the slant moonbeams glance from it as arrows light upon shingles. He knows of what within him. "Perhaps it is her cottage." The flash of rushing blood reaches and fevers every part of his frame. His respiration sounds upon his forehead, and his teeth close upon his lips.

Sitting near upon a mound, he wipes the cold dew from his forehead and collects his strength and his courage. Then approaching the windows of her old home he looks in. She is not there. Two children, a boy and a girl, are sitting coolly by the fire, toasting chestnuts in the ashes and looking very happy. They were very little when he went away.

He has left the older cottage, and is creeping to the window of the new. Warily, treadingly, he rises from stooping, and looks cautiously in. The room is bright with the glowing firelight and the presence by the work-stand. It is Millie. A cradle, tenanted, stands in the warm corner. In her arms—in her arms—lies a curly head, with rosy cheeks and dimpled chin, fast asleep. Millie is looking steadily, tenderly, into the fire. That face, so beautiful, so true to his long memory, thrills his whole being, and, in keenest distress at the loss of his most precious earthly possession, William forgets what he is doing, and stands close before the window, gazing in. Millie turns toward the window. "Good God! she has seen me!" and he starts to escape. She has seen him. The face—so haggard, so like the long dead—wrenches a piercing cry from her lips; and, man that he is, he can but turn back to her.

He enters the door. Millie shrinks, shuddering, to a corner of the room.

"Heavens! are you afraid of your old—your old friend? I am William. I won't hurt you. Let me go in peace."

Millie, trembling, afraid, and yet battling the inbred superstition of the times, meets him—or, rather, follows him; for he is shrinking away—and touching his shoulder, loses every fear, and falls in a flood of tears upon his neck.

Gently placing her in the chair by his side, William takes her hand in his, and says, gravely, "Millie, I don't blame you; you have done right; but I must go. Good-by. God bless you!"

"William, what is it? How can you? Why do you talk so? Don't you love me? Haven't I loved you always, and kept myself for you, though I thought you were dead? Oh William! what have I done that makes you seem so strange?" And Millie, flitting from hope to fear, from joy to utter distress, calls in her pride and stands, very tremulous but very queenly, before him.

William glances at the little creature whom all this excitement has awakened, then at the cradle with its bed. But just then a matronly little woman appears.

Well, it came out that the new cottage, the little white garden and the quilt in the cradle, all belonged to Millie's younger sister.

A few years after the "stranger" crept stealthily to the window of a similar cottage, and, peering in again, saw Millie with her foot on the rocker of a cradle and a little nose in her arms. This time he was right in thinking them not ours.

THE COURSE OF TRADE.

THE best bankers' bills on London were sold during the week in New York at 9½ per cent commercial bills, attached to the bills of lading of the goods which they represent, at 9¾ @ 10. In order that our commercial readers may understand the importance of this fact, it is necessary to explain that the par of exchange between New York and London is 108½; that is, 9 per cent premium. For a short period, during the crisis of 1857, bankers' bills fell to 105 @ 106; with this exception, they have not been quoted so low for a long series of years. Now, as we said, the rate for the best bankers' bills is nearly 5 per cent. discount, and commercial bills, secured by bills of lading, have been sold at over 9 per cent. discount.

The phenomenon is due to two causes. Our imports of foreign goods have been lightunprecedentedly below those of last year to the same date; our exports of domestic produce from this port very heavy—$28,000,000 in excess of those of the corresponding period of last year. The reduction in our imports has diminished the demand for, while the increase in our exports has swelled the supply of, foreign exchange. This has naturally had its effect upon the market.

But the immediate cause of the fall in bills has been the commercial panic which commenced a few days before the election, and which has been increased by the proceedings of the Secession Senators and Representatives have been and are unwilling to part with their money pending the present excitement. At a moment like the present, when the rate of discount rising in our ears on one side, and menaces of coercion whispered ominously on the other, every man retains his money, every bribe forth, and the wise men who have money decline to part with it. This produces what is called a panic. A case in point is this kind. Mr. Smith, who owns a cotton plantation in Georgia, has 1000 bales of cotton, worth $45,000. It will cost John Smith $2500 to move his cotton to market, $10,000 to pay certain notes which mature as the cotton ripens, and $15,000 more to pay his factor's advances: all this the factor at Savannah or Charleston is expected to pay on receipt of the cotton. As he has not so much money, he raises it by shipping the cotton, on receipt, either to his New York banker, or to the British agents of that banker, and draws instantly, at sight, for nearly the whole value of the cotton on the New York house. At ordinary times the New York house accepts, sells its own bills for the amount drawn for by the Southern factor, and makes a handsome profit on the operation. In times of panic it must either dishonor the bills drawn by the Southern factor, or sell its own at what they will fetch.

Thus far, the New York houses have generally accepted, and made the sacrifice that accompanies it. How long they will continue to do so remains to be seen. When they refuse, shipments of cotton must cease. What effect this emergency—coupled with the derangement in the British money-market which must flow from the inevitable import of coin from England to New York—will have upon the price of our leading staples, the next few weeks will show. It is safe, at all events, to say that these are times in which no man should allow anything to hazard. The country never was richer, or trade sounder than at present; but all this will not avail to prevent failures, if confidence be disturbed.

GOOD READING.

We need scarcely to say last week about the literary treats we are in preparation for the readers of the Weekly and the Monthly. The topic will bear a few more remarks.

So far as Europe is concerned, we begin this week in the Weekly "GREAT EXPECTATIONS," by Charles Dickens, with McLenan's graphic illustrations; and Monday will contain Mr. Thackeray's new novel, and a new serial by the Author of "Adam Bede," who stands at present in the very front rank of British novelists. No one can afford to miss any one of these three tales; if, after having read them, more stories are wanted, they will be found as usual, native and foreign, First Impressions, in the pages of the Weekly and Monthly.

As to history, the Harpers are publishing the history of "The United Netherlands," by J. Lothrop Motley, who, now that Prescott is dead, is undoubtedly the first living American historian. This work is a sequel to his history of the Dutch Republic, and should be read by all who take an interest in the great people from whom has risen the Knickerbocker young.

Then in travels, we have just had Burton's delightful book on the Lake Regions of Central Africa; and we have shortly, as soon as the political smoke clears away, Du Chaillu's equally fascinating work on Western Equatorial Africa, the unexplored home of the gorilla. Simultaneously with these may be expected Atkinson's valuable work on the Amoor River, a book to which the war in China will probably impart great importance. And, apropos of the negro question, Sewell's "Ordeal of Free Labor in the West Indies" will furnish texts for the speeches of our orators.

Here is something to make the winter pass pleasantly, and to console us for the bitterness of political conversesies.

OUR FRENCH FRIENDS.

OUR French friends of the Paris Illustration have been publishing portraits of our Presidents, accompanied with biographical sketches. They are not only entertaining, but instructive. Thus we are told that Hon. Atsem Lincoln was born "at Hazlin, where his family are still highly respected;" that, "having directed his attention toward industry, he is consequently known as the Napoleon of," that he offered his services "during the war of the Black-Hawk-Mar;" and was subsequently elected "to the legislature of Illinois." We learn from the Hon. "Josh Bell" was born, we learn, "at Harlw," went to a university at the same inscrutable place, then to that of Cumberland; early established himself as a lawyer "at Franklin-Will;" allowed himself to be run for Congress, with the support of "General Jakson;" as Senator, he pursued "unalterable principles in reference to Pacific Railroads, but opposed the "Constitution Lecomplis" to be now resides "at Hoshville," with his "many daughters, all well-educated." The Hon. Stephen Douglas was born "in Illinois," and is dismissed in a paragraph. Of the remaining candidate, Mr. "John C. Brekenridge," we are simply told that his father had occupied a high political position (this will be news to Dr. Breckinridge), and that the son entered the United States Senate "when very young."

It is always delightful to see how well they understand us, and how thoroughly acquainted they are with us and our people—over there in Paris.

THE HIN ON THE VACANT LOT.

We live in a hut on a vacant lot,
Father, and mother, and I;
'Tis away up town, and a dreary spot,
With old stone quarries hard by.
Father is lazy, and mother she drinks,
And I am ragged and thin,
And I look like a thief, for 'tis hard to be pure
When circled around with sin.

'Tis a desperate place, this vacant lot,
A region of famine and woe;
The fattest found a struggled child
In the quarries not long ago.
And father is sometimes out all day,
And comes staggering home at night
With money and things that he hides away,
For he never came by them right.

Mother is always at me to steal,
And urges her plea with a curse;
She tells me to sneak through the city crowds,
And pocket a watch or a purse.
And father beats me because I say
That I'd rather any day die;
I never have robbed, and I never will rob,
And I'll tell you the reason why.

There came to our hovel three years ago
A man with a sweet mild face,
And he had a lady look in his hand
That he tried to read in our place.
But mother she swears at the mild-faced man,
And drives him out of our den,
And told him never as long as he lived
To darken her door again.

But something made me follow the man,
I think he beckoned to me,
And he led me down to a quarry's cleft
Where none of my people could see;
And he read to me things from the holy book
That I never had heard before,
And somehow a peace came over my heart,
And it didn't feel half so sore.

They may curse and beat me as much as they like,
I know what they don't know;
I know that things in the end come right
For those that suffer below.
No matter how ragged and hungry I am,
With no home to like or to love,
I know there's a vacant lot for me
In the beautiful land above.

THE LOUNGER.

OLD MASTERS.

LIES are perpetually bringing the truth into discredit. How shall we know him when we see him? I have been invited so many times into Wall Street and Broad Street to great auction sales of the old masters, and the old masters were in such abundance, and the old masters, if these were really they, were such botchers, and lounglers, and daubers, that we are tired to death of the old masters, and hate the old masters, and don't believe they are old masters at all.

When what a secret anxiety every private collector has about getting some genius! There is not a Titian, a Raphael, a Vandyck in the country that is not offered to him. "You know," discourses a young lawyer; and all the men who understand that kind of thing, you know, are entirely unanimous. Not the slightest doubt, you know; and there is no objection. What stunners these old chaps were, hey?"

And you feel in your inmost soul that the man doesn't believe it, that you believe in his old masters, and broods over it, and broods until he becomes savage and misanthropic, and finally cuts them all down to Leeds, who sells old masters at ten dollars a square yard.

For all that, Sir, there are old masters. Giotto was an old master; so was Cimabue; so were Fra Lippo Lippi, and Andrea Orcagna, and the Gaddis, and Fra Angelico, and Masaccio, and Ghirlandajo, and Signorelli, Andrea del Sarto, Fra Bartolomeo, Leonardo da Vinci, Giorgione, and Raphael. These were all old masters. These are the men whose works make half the interest of Italy, and illustrate most of the other half. They have written the spiritual history of the country upon all its church and convent walls; in baptisteries, and capelas, and cemeteries; in galleries, palaces, and private houses, from the dawn of modern times down to the decline of that age. These have been no "young" masters to rival their fonie or their genius. They made Christian art, or Christian art made them. Without a more truly, the story of Christianity controlling the national mind inspired the great historic epoch known as Italian Christian art.

And of all the arts in the most interesting. It is cognate to our sympathies. We are children of the same spirit. We, too, have our art, and our literature, Christian art, more luminous and spiritual, expresses itself in painting. Then it has, accidentally, all the charm of association. Who, for instance, Raphael is Florence! Michel Angelo is Rome. Whoever brings the old masters to us, carries us nearer to Italy and to the early days of Christian history, opening a gallery of such enjoyment as we have not yet had.

Mr. Jarves has done this. He has lived several years in Italy, and, peculiarly favored, has been collecting pictures upon a principle which is precisely a historic sequence. The intention is to show by illustration the progressive development of the greatest, and, in one sense, the only school of painting in the world. For that purpose, in the highways and byways of Italy, he has been procuring specimens of all the "old masters" already named, and of many more. It is the first effort to found a historical gallery of art in America; for it begins with the Byzantine works of the 12th and 13th centuries, in "encaustic" and "tempera" (tissues of methods taken from materials), and descends regularly to Domenichino and Guido, the masters of the Bolognese or last illustrious Italian school.
